IN a recent number of this journal, on November 25, 1880, there appeared a memoir and portrait of Grace Darling, whose piety and courage have excited widespread admiration in every part of the world and among all classes of society, so that her name will never go out of mind. Four years ago, on December 1, 1876, a somewhat similar deed of noble courage was enacted by a young lady on the coast of West Australia, Miss Grace Vernon Bussell; and although the intrepid exploit was not attended with so much peril to the life of the heroine, it nevertheless justly earned for her the title of the Australian "Grace Darling."

The circumstances were these:

THE SCREW STEAMER

Georgette, when on a voyage from Fremantle to Adelaide, had sprung a leak, and was with difficulty steered on to the coast, where she grounded at a spot 180 miles south of Fremantle. Before reaching the coast the vessel's life-boat was lowered, but it leaked so much, and was so difficult to manage, that eight persons who ventured into it were drowned, and it was abandoned as useless.

The coast in that direction is wild and desolate, with no shelter for vessels, and heavy surf almost always dashing on the shore. More than a score of miles may be traversed by one who ventures over the rough country near the coast without a human habitation coming into view.

The Georgette had been chartered to convey a cargo of jarrah timber from West to South Australia, and she had eight-and-forty passengers on board, many of whom were women and children. These, together with the crew, were in imminent danger of their lives. Persons who have ever been exposed to a peril of this kind will have ineffaceable memories of the consternation of the moment when the conviction became general that the good ship might go to pieces at any minute, and not a soul be left to tell the mournful tale. So it was with the people on board the Georgette. They could see the shore, but death seemed to yawn between them and solid ground.

About eight miles north of the place where the vessel struck the rocks and got stranded, stands Wallcliffe, the residence of Alfred P. Bussell, Esq., J.P., and providentially it happened that one of his daughters, Miss Grace V. Bussell, then riding on horseback through the bush in that vicinity, accompanied by a colored servant, Sam Isaacs, saw the wreck and turned her horse's head in the direction of the shore. A boat had been launched, but had capsized in the heavy surf, and the crew were an hour in righting it and returning to the ship. They then took a line from the ship, and, putting some women and children into the boat, paid out the line to try once more to get to the shore.

But the boat swamped again, and the women and children were all in the water when Grace Bussell rode out of the bush and down the steep cliff to the water's edge.

The Australian breed of horses is one of the largest in the world. The animals are high and big-boned, of great strength and courageous spirit. Cruel treatment in breaking them in frequently gives them the dangerous habit of "bucking"—that is, placing their four feet together, arching their backs, and springing up with a force that sometimes throws off the best riders. But when they have not contracted this vice, they are safe and docile. It was on such a horse that Miss Bussell, followed by her servant, and beyond the second line of roaring breakers, which completely submerged the animal and soaked her through from head to foot, almost knocking her from her seat every half-minute. But though her horse stumbled over the rope, and her peril was great, she forced her way on to the boat, and, with as many women and children clinging to her and the horse as was possible, she made her way back to the shore and safely landed them.

So fierce was the surf that it took four hours to land fifty people, and every boat engaged was capsized. The brave girl's presence of mind did not forsake her amid the wild scene of tumult and despair. She had to go and return several times before the whole were rescued; but, with a purpose that never faltered, she was enabled at last to bring all safe to land.

Most of the wrecked people were taken to Mr. Bussell's house, and there tended with such kindness and hospitality that at the next meeting of the Legislative Council a sum of £100 was voted for presentation to this gentleman, who (if he be, as we hope he is, still living) is one of the oldest and most respected settlers in West Australia.

We regret, however, to have to add that the excitement and bustle, and the deprivation of needful quiet produced by the sudden influx of so many guests into Mr. Bussell's house, had so injurious an effect upon his wife's health, which was in a very delicate state, that her death, which took place a few weeks after the shipwreck, was generally attributed to the agitation connected with all the circumstances. A feeling of public regret and of sympathy with Mr. Bussell in his bereavement was expressed in all the Australian newspapers at the time, and they agreed in speaking of Mrs. Bussell as one of the most highly-esteemed ladies in West Australia.

Wherever the story of Miss Bussell's intrepid heroism was read or told it excited but one feeling—that of genuine admiration for the kindliness and courage which the Australian Grace Darling exhibited. And it is pleasant to think that the bravery of her faithful servant did not go without recognition. For the Royal Humane Society, on the 8th of January, 1878, not only voted their silver medal to Miss Bussell, but their bronze medal to her brave man-servant, who, on the wild morning when the wreck was seen, also went off from the shore on horseback to rescue the perishing.

Mr. Bussell's residence at Wallcliffe is near the town of Busselton (which apparently derives its name from the Bussell family), and which is a post-town with a telegraph and post-office, and is the capital of the agricultural district of the Vaasse. It is 30 miles south of Bunbury, and 140 miles from Perth, the capital of West Australia.

A SINGULAR INCIDENT

is recorded in the reports of the Law Court in Busselton, given in the West Australian Times for February 16, 1877, which shows how the active pursuits of wealthy Australian settlers' daughters, like Miss Bussell, resemble those of the women of patriarchal times, when Rebekah, the heiress of Nahor, drew water for Eliezer's camels, and Rachel acted as shepherd to her father Laban's flocks of sheep (Gen. 24 and 29).

This legal case in the Busselton court was as to the disputed ownership of a cow called Sally, which one George Cross claimed as his own, and accused a Mr. Brockman, J.P., of having wrongfully disposed of. Both Miss Bussell and her sister gave evidence as to the animal belonging to Mr. Brockman and his friend Clarkson so conclusively that the magistrates at once decided the case in Mr. Brockman's favor.

Miss M. C. Bussell, in her evidence, said, "I am often out on my father's run. I know all my father's cattle. I always take notice of stray cattle, so as to know them. I am sure this cow Sally had Clarkson's brand on it."

Miss Grace V. Bussell, the heroine of the present story, deposed: "I remember Mr. Clarkson purchasing a lot of cattle from George Cross. The cow Sally was among them. Mrs. Brockman and I assisted to drive them in, and I saw it driven in with the rest, and branded with Clarkson's mark. I afterward saw it worn out with the journey to Boadgerup; and Clarkson left it in possession of John Brockman."

The foregoing incident indicates that the Misses Bussell are not languid, lackadaisical young ladies, reclining on a sofa and reading novels all day, and ready to faint at the sight of a drove of harmless cattle advancing toward them, but are energetic and spirited young ladies, who probably think nothing of riding twenty miles in a day on horseback over their father's extensive cattle run, and can identify all his numerous cattle.

Nor are such healthy outdoor pursuits incompatible with literary culture and mental acquirements. On the contrary, they stimulate intellectual and domestic activity by giving the mind a vigorous body to live in and agreeable variety of occupation. Perhaps these two Australian sisters can write a composition, and teach in the Sunday-school, and sing hymns as well as town-bred young ladies, to whom riding on horseback into foaming breakers and boiling surf would be an impossibility.

Although few young ladies have opportunities of saving the lives of shipwrecked persons, as Miss G. V. Bussell did, yet many of them can engage in of rescuing the perishing by helping in enterprises of benevolence and charity, by ministering to the necessities of the destitute feeding the hungry, clothing the ragged, visiting among the poor, comforting the mourners, instructing the ignorant, lifting up the fallen, and seeking out and endeavoring to save those that are lost.

In every large town of the United States there are angels of mercy who brave the dangers of small-pox and typhoid fever and diphtheria at the bedsides of the dying with a bravery equal to Grace Darling's or Grace Bussell's; and in this city of New York there are ladies who diligently go through the wards of the hospitals or visit the squalid homes of the destitute with a patience and self-sacrifice equal to Florence Nightingale's. But while the world only hears of Grace Darling or Florence Nightingale, God knows every one of them. And there is a day fast coming on when He will "make up His jewels." Then "they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12: 3).

By speaking about Jesus and carrying the Gospel promises to the surrounding world, which for the most part is lying in an unconverted, Christless state, we may save the souls as well as the bodies of our fellow-creatures; and "he that winneth souls is wise" (Prov. 11: 30). And not only at home but in foreign lands "the fields are white to the harvest." China, which has one fourth of the world's population, has only one missionary to of its inhabitants; "and what are they among so many?"

The mass of mankind are in danger of a spiritual and eternal shipwreck, worse even than that which threatened the people on board the Georgette, and in response to the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," valiant soldiers of the blood-stained banner of Christ are needed to haste to the rescue, and to carry to them the glad tidings of salvation through a crucified Saviour and the blood of the Lamb. "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that He would send forth laborers into His harvest" (Luke 10: 2).

A Swearer's End.—In the year 1836, before the days of steam-power, the sailing ship Constitution left New York bound for Charleston, Savannah, and Liverpool, England. A violent storm overtook the ship on its passage to Charleston, and the waves carried away a mast, stove in the deck-houses, and washed several horses and cattle overboard. When the storm had abated, the captain, a skilful seaman, but a Godless man and a scoffer at sacred things, not the least awed by the danger he had escaped, remarked lightly to some of the passengers, "We have seen hell to-day." The profanity seemed to pass, but "He that is higher than the highest regarded it" (Eccles. 5: 8), and that captain's days were numbered. The Constitution was thoroughly repaired in Charleston, and then sailed for Liverpool; but again encountering a storm off the Irish coast, it became a total wreck, and the captain, who had made so light of hell, was taken to his account.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

JOHN SNOW'S WIFE.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

"MILK O! Milk O!"

Very musically did John Snow ring out this cry in a certain small street in our great city. He was clearly proud of it. And, to judge by the ineffectual attempts of small boys to imitate it, others thought well of it too. My own opinion I have already expressed.

Now it is a fact well known to all public speakers, be they statesmen, lawyers, preachers, or milkmen, that much speaking affects the throat. And nowhere is the throat more exposed to what is popularly called "dryness" than in the public street, with its blazing sun or piercing winds. Add to these inconveniencies the weight of two huge milk-pans, and what wonder that, of all men, milkmen should be often thirsty? And as John Snow was no exceptional milkman, you will not be surprised to hear that such was his frequent malady.

Now you will probably say, "Easy enough to satisfy a milkman's thirst. There's the milk—and here's the cup. What more is wanted?"

You and I would doubtless agree in replying "nothing." But, somehow, John himself held aloof from such a response. And, had you watched him, you would perceive this very singular fact, that he never had recourse to his milk-cans. Why, I could never gather. I have sometimes thought that it spoke badly for the quality of his milk; or, rejecting this as a base suspicion, that he was reared somewhat too liberally on that article. Be the cause, however, what it may, the fact was beyond all dispute that John's thirst never drew him to a milk-pan. Where it drew him I one day discovered as I was crossing a portion of his rounds.

Before me, in my very path, there stood two milk-cans—ownerless milk-cans to all appearance. They rested very suspiciously outside a public house. I hushed my suspicions for a time; but when I reached the spot I could do so no longer, for with my own eyes I saw John Snow draining with great relish a pint jug. I passed on. Before I had got on very far there came forth such a stream of "Milk O" from John's refreshed throat as gave me quite a start. It seemed to say "Nothing like beer for clearing the throat."

Now I had never spoken to John Snow in my life. But considering, whether rightly or wrongly I know not, a milkman to be a public man, I had always taken an interest in him. And never more so than when, day after day, those deserted milk-cans stared me in the face. I took the trouble to inquire about him from those who would be likely to know. And these were two of the answers I received.

"John Snow! Oh, yes, sir, I know him well; a very good-natured fellow. A splendid wife he's got; puts his hand to his mouth too often though; getting worse too, they say—four little children—a good trade."

"John Snow! Have known him ever since he was a boy; brings my milk; getting very irregular though. Sometimes an hour late; very obliging man; taken to the drink, I'm afraid. Sorry for his good little wife; but must get my milk elsewhere."

Not very long after, the worst reports were confirmed by my own observation. Walking up the street one day, whom should I see before me but John Snow duly yoked, and apparently carrying a heavy burden, for he stooped under the weight, and moved from side to side rather unsteadily, I thought. Quickening my pace, I overtook him, and found, to my surprise, that his buckets were only half full, and that he was drunk.

I passed on. I had gone but a few steps when there came a crash. Looking back, I saw John on the ground in the midst of a great pool of milk, and his cans upset beside him. I went back, and after setting him upon his feet sadly left him, fully resolved to call upon him at the first opportunity.

A fortnight after I found myself at his house—as pleasant and cosey a home as one could wish, with a neat little garden in front.

Mrs. Snow herself came to the door. A neat, clean, homely little woman she looked, with a good common-sense face, which it pleased one to look upon. I told her my errand. "Would I come in?"

"My husband cannot see you, I am sorry to say, sir," she said sadly when I had sat down.

And then, after a little sympathetic questioning, she told me all.

"We're ruined, sir, quite ruined. During the last fortnight there has been a stream of mishaps. Everything has been going wrong. Customers have been leaving us. And, to crown all, we have lost two of our best cows."

I asked her how it had happened.

"Well, you see, sir, my husband, when not quite himself, gave them wrong medicine. They had colds." And then she showed me a bill which was to be posted up that very day. There was to be a sale of their effects. Even the best of the household furniture was to go to pay their debts. "Oh! sir," she continued, "John is such a good kind husband too. He gets almost mad when he comes round and thinks what he's done. And now he drinks to drown his thoughts."

"What are you going to do?" I asked.

"I don't know yet. I'm waiting. There's One who will not forsake us, I know. I've been praying to Him night and day. I don't fear the future, sir."

I shall never forget the grand simplicity of this stricken woman's faith in her God. In all my own troubles I love to recall it. It rebuked my own faithlessness as it was never rebuked before. She asked me if I would kneel down and pray for her husband. And we did pray. We placed the poor erring one at the feet of Him who, when He was on earth, never turned from those who sought His healing touch.

As I passed out I caught a glimpse of the poor drunkard, asleep in the bright clean kitchen. Tender, loving hands had been busy there, for over his unconscious form that patient wife had drawn a warm covering, and under the flushed and heavy head she had placed a soft pillow. Drunkard though he was, he was her husband still.

I have said that John Snow was a good-tempered, obliging man. And it was strictly true. But that was before the drink had mastered him. All was reversed now. And the more he drank the more sour and ill-tempered he became. He grew rougher and more unbearable every day.

There was a time when his four little ones ran to the door to greet him on his return home. One after the other they would claim their kiss—and nowhere were they more delighted to be than on their father's knee. Now they looked askance at him, and shrank away. Even the youngest, though only just able to toddle about, looked grave when her father entered, and clung to her mother's skirts as though for protection.

John Snow's was a sad home now. A nightmare seemed to sit upon it when the master was there. The very kitten would stop its gambols when John Snow's unsteady step was heard. At such times the fitness of things seemed almost to demand that all the doorways, windows, and furniture should be painted black, and the inmates robe themselves in that same gloomy hue.

Oh, John Snow! John Snow! wilt thou still caress the serpent which has poisoned thee? Wilt thou continue to curse the home which shelters thee? Shall thy children grow in dislike, until they learn to loathe thee? Let thy manhood speak. Up, man! and shake off the fetters which have bound thee.

And yet there was light in that sad home, and a bright light too—a light which the children loved to gather around and warm themselves by, a light which shone brightly even on the poor drunkard who bore the name of husband. John Snow's wife was that light.

It has been a question often raised, why good husbands are so often encumbered with bad wives, and why so many good wives have their lot bound up with such pitiful unmanly husbands. It is not a question which can be easily answered. But this much we can say, that a good wife never shines so brightly as when set off by the shadows of her worse half. And truly was this the case with John Snow's wife. The deeper her husband sank, the higher she seemed to rise. And the only eyes which seemed incapable of estimating her worth were those of him who possessed her as his very own.

It was a terribly sad sight, and yet a very grand one, which was presented to the eye by this pure noble woman and her degraded husband. Whatever he earned was almost immediately dropped into the rum-seller's till. He moved day by day in one little narrow circle, of which the centre was himself and his thirst. He seemed utterly indifferent as to whether his wife and children lived or died, so far as his maintaining them went. Well might the neighbors cry out "Shame! shame!" upon him.

It may, however, seem very strange, but the only voice which spoke well of John Snow was his wife's. She was never heard to murmur or complain. She would have bitten out her tongue rather than have spoken a single word against him. Amid the strife of tongues, and the torrents of abuse, and the "shame! shame!" which enveloped John Snow's name, there was one quiet little voice heard striving, though vainly, to hush it all.

"He's got a good heart, has my husband," she would say. "It's the drink that's quarrelsome and sour and selfish; not my John. He's the same still underneath. And, by and by, when he drinks no more, I know he'll shine out as good and kind as ever." And so she treated him as she would have treated a jewel incrusted with the mud and slime of the streets; she accounted him still a treasure, handled him lovingly and carefully, and strove to make him better.

But hers was a hard life for all that. On her shoulders rested the support of the whole family, including John himself. They had no bread but what she and her sewing machine earned. I have often passed her house late at night, but never without seeing a light in her little work-room. When she slept no one knew. She seemed always to be at work. And yet her four children were as clean and neat, and her house as tidy and bright, as though she had nothing else to concern herself about.

And then there was John to look after; to keep out of mischief if possible; to guide to his home when too drunk to guide himself. One of the most common sights was this gentle woman supporting her staggering husband homeward. Hearts bled for her as they watched her slowly and silently moving on, her lips ever and anon moving dumbly as though in prayer to Him who knows well the weight of earth's burdens, because He has borne them Himself.

And when he has fallen down, and has laid weltering in the mud, and her feeble strength was unequal to the task of raising him to his feet, many were the hands willingly put forth for her sake. These hands were sometimes rough and harsh, as might be expected. And very touching was it to hear her pleading for more gentleness, and for softer dealing with him. "Please do not hurt him," she would say. And she would look so gratefully upon these kind helpers, and thank them so sweetly, that drunken John Snow was handled as gently as a tender baby.

Once when they had raised him to his feet, and she was stooping to brush away the dirt from his coat, he raised his hand and struck her. It was a cruel blow. It fell upon her cheek. She grew ghastly pale, and would have fallen had not the by-standers caught her.

He had never struck her before. And it seemed for a moment as though a change had come over her, for her eyes flashed, and her lips half opened to say some indignant thing; but in a moment she remembered that he was her husband still, and covering her face, she breathed a prayer to the strong One, and then grew strong again to do and to suffer for him whose wife she was.

And thus the weeks and months passed away, he drinking, and she praying, and not ceasing to pray, because no answer had come as yet, but gathering fervency and earnestness as the time wore on, because there was greater need for her prayers.

ANTE-MORTEM RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, January 2, 1881.

"Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."—I. TIMOTHY, 4 : 8.

The way to meet a New Year—An Effective Partner in the Firm—Godliness good for a Man in this Life—I. For his Physical Health—It gives Buoyancy—Induces Industry—II. For his Intellect—Christianity the Great Central Fire—It Inspired Poetry, Art and Music—III. For the Disposition—The change Religion Works—Two New York Merchants—IV. For Worldly Business—A Mighty Auxiliary to Lawful Business—A Merchant who would not Compromise—A Bank Cashier's Rescue through Prayer—The Divine Tonic—Religion gotten fifty years too late.

THERE is a gloomy and passive way of waiting for the events of the opening year to come upon us, and there is a heroic way of going out to meet them, strong in God and fearing nothing. When the body of Catiline was found on the battlefield it was found far in advance of all his troops and among the enemy ; and the best way is not for us to lie down and let the events of life trample over us, but to go forth in a Christian spirit determined to conquer.

The papers are already made out, and to-morrow some of you will enter into business partnerships, and others of you will take higher position in the commercial establishment where you are now engaged, and others will enter upon new enterprises, and there will be in these cities ten thousand business changes. You are expecting prosperity, and I am determned, so far as I have anything to do with it, that you shall not be disappointed, and therefore I propose, as God may help me this morning, to project upon your attention a new element of success. You will have in the business firm, frugality, patience, industry, perseverance, economy—but there needs to be one member added, mightier than them all, and not a silent partner either—the one introduced by my text : "Godliness which is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come."

I suppose you are all willing to admit that godliness is important in its eternal relations ; but perhaps some of you say, "all I want is an opportunity to say a prayer before I die and all will be well." There are a great many people who suppose that if they can finally get safely out of this world into a better world, they will have exhausted the entire advantage of our holy religion. They talk as though religion were a mere nod of recognition which we are to give to the Lord Jesus on our way up to a Heavenly mansion ; as though it were an admission ticket of no use except to give in at the door of Heaven. And there are thousands of people who have great admiration for a religion of the shroud, and a religion of the coffin, and a religion of the hearse, and a religion of the cemetery, who have no appreciation of a religion for the bank, for the factory, for the warehouse, for the jeweler's shop, for the broker's office.

Now, while I would not throw any slur on a post mortem religion, I want this morning, and in the first Sabbath of the new year, to eulogize an ante mortem religion. A religion that is of no use to you while you live, will be of no use to you when you die. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." And I have always noticed that when the grace is very low in a man's heart he talks a great deal in prayer meetings about deaths, and about coffins, and about graves, and about churchyards. I have noticed that the healthy Christian, the man who is living near to God, and is on the straight road to Heaven, is full of jubilant satisfaction, and talks about the duties of this life, understanding well that if God helps him to live right He will help him to die right.

I. Now, in the first place, I remark that

GODLINESS IS GOOD FOR A MAN'S PHYSICAL HEALTH.

I do not mean to say it will restore a broken-down constitution, or drive rheumatism from the limbs, or neuralgia from the temples, or pleurisy from the side ; but I do mean to say that it gives one such habits and puts one in such condition as is most favorable for physical health. That I believe, and that I avow.

Everybody knows that buoyancy of spirit is good physical advantage. Gloom, unrest, dejection are at war with every pulsation of the heart, and with every respiration of the lungs. It lowers the vitality, it slackens the circulation, while exhilaration of spirit pours the very balm of Heaven through all the currents of life. The sense of insecurity which sometimes hovers over an unregenerate man, or pounces upon him with the blast of ten thousand trumpets of terror, is most depleting and most exhausting, while the feeling that all things are working together for my good now and for my everlasting welfare, is productive of physical health.

You will observe that Godliness induces industry, which is the foundation of good health. There is no law of hygiene that will keep a lazy man well. Pleurisy will stab him, erysipelas will burn him, jaundice will discolor him, gout will cripple him, and the intelligent physician will not prescribe antiseptic, or febrifuge, or anodyne, but saws and hammers and yardsticks and crowbars and pick-axes. There is no such thing as good physical condition without positive work of some kind, although you should sleep upon down of swan, or ride in carriage of softest upholstery, or have on your table all the luxuries that were poured from the wine vats of Ispahan and Shirzah.

Our religion says, "Away to the bank ! away to the shop ! away to the factory ! do something that will enlist all the energies of your body, mind and soul." Diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, while upon the bare back of the idler and the drone comes down the sharp lash of the apostle as he says : "If any man will not work, neither shall he eat."

O ! how important in this day, when so much is said about anatomy and physiology and therapeutics, and some new style of medicine is ever and anon springing upon the world, that you should understand that the highest school of medicine is the school of Christ, which declares that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." So if you start out two men in the world with equal physical health, and then one of them shall get the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ in his heart and the other shall not get it, the one who becomes a son of the Lord Almighty will live the longer. "With long life will I satisfy thee, and show thee My salvation."

II. Again I remark that Godliness is GOOD FOR THE INTELLECT.

I know some have supposed that just as soon as a man enters into the Christian life, his intellect goes into a bedwarfing process. So far from that, religion will give new brilliancy to the intellect, new strength to the imagination, new force to the will and wider swing to all the intellectual faculties.

Christianity is the great central fire at which Philosophy has lighted its brightest torch. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is the fountain out of which learning has dipped its clearest draught. The Helicon poured forth no such inspiring waters as those which flow from under the throne of God clear as crystal. Religion has given new energy to Poesy, weeping in Doctor Young's Night Thoughts, teaching in Cowper's Task, flaming in Charles Wesley's hymns, and rushing with archangelic splendor through Milton's Paradise Lost. The religion of Jesus Christ has hung in studio and in gallery of art and in Vatican, the best pictures—Titian's "Assumption," Raphael's "Transfiguration," Rubens' "Descent from the Cross," Claude's "Burning Bush" and Angelo's "Last Judgment." Religion has made the best music of the world. Haydn's "Creation," Handel's "Messiah," Mozart's "Requiem."

Is it possible that a religion which builds such indestructible monuments, and which lifts its ensign on the highest promontories of worldly power, can have any effect upon a man's intellect but elevation and enlargement? Now, I commend Godliness as the best mental discipline—better than belles lettres to purify the taste, better than mathematics to harness the mind to all intricacy and elaboration, better than logic to marshal the intellectual forces for onset and victory.

It will go with Hugh Miller and show him the footprints of the Creator in the red sandstone. It will go with the botanist and show him celestial glories encamped under the curtain of a water-lily. It will go with the astronomer on the great heights where God shepherds the great flock of worlds, that wander on the hills of heaven answering His voice as He calls them all by their names.

GOOD FOR THE DISPOSITION.

III. Again I remark, that godliness is profitable for one's despotism. Lord Ashley before he went into a great battle, was heard to offer this prayer : "O ! Lord, I shall be very busy to day ; if I forget Thee, forget me not." With such a Christian disposition as that, a man is independent of all circumstances. Our piety will have a tinge of our natural temperament.

If a man be cross and sour and fretful naturally, after he becomes a Christan he will always have to be armed against the rebellion of those evil inclinations ; but religion has tamed the wildest nature ; it has turned fretfulness into gratitude, despondency into good cheer, and those who were hard and ungovernable and uncompromising have been made pliable and conciliatory.

Good resolution, reformatory effort, will not effect the change. It takes a mightier arm and a mightier hand to bend evil habits than the hand that bent the bow of Ulysses, and it takes a stronger lasso than ever held the buffalo on the prairie. A man cannot go forth with any human weapons and contend successfully against these Titans armed with uptorn mountain. But you have known men into whose spirit the influence of the Gospel of Christ came, until their disposition was entirely changed. So it was with

TWO MERCHANTS IN NEW YORK.

They were very antagonistic. They had done all they could to injure each other. They were in the same line of business. One of the merchants was converted to God. Having been converted, he asked the Lord to teach him how to bear himself toward that business antagonist, and he was impressed with the fact that it was his duty when a customer asked for certain kind of goods which he had not, but which he knew his opponent had, to recommend him to go to that store. I suppose that is about the hardest thing the man could do ; but being thoroughly converted to God, he resolved to do that very thing, and being asked for a certain kind of goods which he had not, he said : "You go to such and such a store and you will get it." After a while, merchant number two found these customers coming, so sent, and he found also that merchant number one had been brought to God, and he sought the same religion. Now they are good friends and good neighbors, the grace of God entirely changing their disposition.

"O !" says some one, "I have a rough, jagged, impetuous nature, and religion can't do anything for me." Do you know that Martin Luther and Robert Newton and Richard Baxter were impetuous, all-consuming natures, yet the grace of God turned them into the mightiest usefulness? A manufacturer cares but very little for a stream that slowly runs through the meadow, but a long torrent that leaps from rock to rock, and rushes with mad energy through the valley and out toward the sea. Along that river you will find fluttering shuttles and grinding mill and flashing water-wheel. And a nature, the swiftest, the most rugged and the most tremendous, that is the nature God turns into greatest usefulness.

O ! how many who have been pugnacious, and hard to please, and irascible, and more bothered about the mote in their neighbor's eye than about the beam like ship-timber in their own eye, who have been entirely changed by the grace of God, and have found out that godliness is profitable for the life that now is as well as for the life which is to come."

IV. Again I remark that religion is good for a man's

WORDLY BUSINESS.

I know the general theory is the more business the less religion, the more religion the less business. Not so thought Doctor Hans in his "Biography of a Christian merchant," when he says: "he grew in grace the last six years of his life more than at any time in his life; during those six years he had more business crowding him than at any other time." In other words, the more worldly business a man has, the more opportunity to serve God. Does religion exhilarate or retard worldly business? is the practical question for you to discuss. Does it hang like a mortgage over the farm? Is it a bad debt on the ledger? Is it a lien against the estate? Does it crowd the door through which customers come for broad-cloths and silks?

Now, religion will hinder your business if it be a bad business or if it be a good business wrongly conducted. If you tell lies behind the counter, if you use false weights and measures, if you put sand in sugar, and beet juice in vinegar, and lard in butter, and sell for one thing that which is another thing, then religion will interfere with that business; but a lawful business, lawfully conducted, will find the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ its mightiest auxiliary.

Religion will give an equipoise of spirit, it will keep you from ebullitions of temper—and you know a great many fine businesses have been blown to atoms by bad temper—it will keep you from worriment about frequent loss, it will keep you industrious and prompt, it will keep you back from squandering and from dissipation, it will give you a kindness of spirit which will be easily distinguished from that mere store courtesy which shakes hands violently with you, asking about the health of your family when there is no anxiety to know whether your child is well or sick! but the anxiety is to know how many dozen cambric pocket-handkerchiefs you will take and pay cash down.

It will prepare you for the practical duties of everyday life. I do not mean to say that religion will make us financially rich, but I do say it will give us, it will assure us of, a comfortable sustenance at the start, a comfortable subsistence all the way through, and it will help us to direct the bank, to manage the traffic, to conduct all our business matters, and to make the most insignificant affair of our life a matter of vast importance glorified by Christian principle.

In New York City, there was

with his fellows, who had written over his banking house, or his counting-house room "no compromise." Then when some merchant got in a crisis and went down—no fault of his, but a conjunction of evil circumstances—and all the other merchants were willing to compromise—they would take seventy-five cents on the dollar, or fifty cents, or twenty cents. Coming to this man last of all, he said: "No compromise; I'll take one hundred cents on the dollar, and I can afford to wait." Well, the wheel turned, and after a while that man was in a crisis of business, and he sent out his agents to compromise, and the agents said to the merchants: "Will you take fifty cents on the dollar?" "No." "Will you take anything?" "We'll take one hundred cents on the dollar. No compromise." And the man who wrote that inscription over his counting-house door, died in destitution.

O! we want more of the kindness of the Gospel and the spirit of love in our business enterprises. How many young men have found the religion of Jesus Christ a practical help? How many there are in this house to-day who could testify out of their own experience that Godliness is profitable for the life that now is. There were times in their business career when they went here for help, and there for help, and yonder for help and got no help until they knelt before the Lord crying for His deliverance, and the Lord rescued them.

In a bank not far from our great metropolis—

A VILLAGE BANK

—an officer could not balance his accounts. He had worked at them day after day, night after night, and he was sick nigh unto death as a result. He knew he had not taken one farthing from that bank, but somehow, for some reason inscrutable then, the accounts wouldn't balance. The time rolled on and the morning of the day when the books should pass under the inspection of the other officers arrived, and he felt himself in awful peril, conscious of his own integrity but unable to prove that integrity.

That morning he went to the bank, early and he knelt down before God and told the whole story of his mental anguish, and he said, "Oh, Lord, I have done right; I have preserved my integrity, but here I am about to be overthrown unless Thou should come to my rescue. Lord, deliver me." And for one hour he continued the prayer before God, and then he rose and he went to an old blotter that he had forgotten all about. He opened it, and there lay a sheet of figures which he only needed to add to another line of figures—some line of figures he had forgotten, and knew not where he had laid them, and the accounts were balanced, and the Lord delivered him. You are an infidel if you do not believe it. The Lord delivered him. God answered his prayer as He will answer your prayer, Oh! man of business, in every crisis when you come to Him.

Now, if this be so, then I am persuaded, as you are, of the fact the vast majority of Christians do not fully test the value of their religion. They are like a farmer in California, with fifteen thousand acres of good wheat land and culturing only a quarter of an acre. Why do you not go forth and make the religion of Jesus Christ a practical affair every day of your business life and all this year, beginning now, and to-morrow morning putting into practical effect this holy religion and demonstrating in your life that godliness is profitable here as well as hereafter?

HOW CAN YOU GET ALONG WITHOUT THIS RELIGION?

Is your physical health so good you do not want this divine tonic? Is your mind so clear, so vast, so comprehensive that you do not want this divine inspiration? Is your worldly business so thoroughly established that you have no use for that religion which has been the help and deliverance of tens of thousands of men in crises of worldly trouble? And if what I have said this morning is true, then you see what a fatal blunder it is when a man adjourns to life's expiration the uses of religion.

A man who postpones religion to fifty years of age gets religion fifty years too late. He may get into the kingdom of God by final repentance, but what can compensate him for a whole lifetime unalleviated and uncomforted? You want religion to-day in the training of that child. You will want religion to-morrow in dealing with that western customer. You wanted religion yesterday to curb your temper. Is your arm strong enough to beat your way through the floods? Can you without being encased in the mail of God's eternal help go forth amid the assault of all hell's sharpshooters? Can you walk alone across these crumbling graves, and amid these gaping earthquakes? Can you, waterlogged and mast-shivered, outlive the gale?

Oh, how many there have been who, postponing the religion of Jesus Christ, have plunged into mistakes they never could correct although they lived eighty years after, and, like serpents crushed under cart-wheels, dragging their mauled bodies under the rocks to die; so these men have fallen under the wheel of awful calamity, crushed here, destroyed forever, while a vast multitude of others have taken the religion of Jesus Christ into everyday life, and first, in practical business affairs, and secondly, on the throne of heavenly triumph, have illustrated, while angels looked on and a universe approved, the glorious truth that "godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life which now is as well as of that which is to come."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have Postponed their visit to New Orleans on account of the success with which God has blessed their labors in San Francisco. As the Evangelists have definitely arranged to visit Great Britain next summer their stay at New Orleans, will be very short.

AFFINITY BETWEEN COMMUNISM AND INFIDELITY.

A FRENCH Communistic leader has just closed in death a melancholy and strangely dramatic career. Among the Communists of 1871 was a "Commissaire Central" named Parmentier. After the revolt he was supposed to have fled, and he was condemned to death by one of the Versailles court-martial. But he had not even left Paris. His wife, a workwoman in a match factory, sheltered her husband in a garret, on the sixth floor of a house, and this garret, during a period of nearly ten years, the prescribed Communist never left. The neighbors were wholly ignorant that Madame Parmentier had any one living with her.

About a month ago it was feared that there was something wrong with the woman, as for a long time she had not been seen. The police, accompanied by a medical man and a locksmith, speedily made their appearance on the scene. The door of the room was broken open, and at first those who sought to enter were driven back by a fearfully noisome odor. When they did enter a shocking spectacle presented itself. On the bed lay the corpse of Madame Parmentier, and by her side was the dead body of an unknown man. He was, however, speedily recognized as the Communist Commissaire Central Parmentier, condemned to death in 1871.

The unfortunate couple, who had been many days dead, had committed suicide by suffocation with the fumes of charcoal. This an illustration of the fact that Communism and Infidelity are closely allied in their daring defiance of all laws, human and divine, and tempt their unfortunate votaries first to an atheistic despair and then to eternal death. The prophecies of Revelation inform us that during the closing years of this dispensation Communism and Infidelity will prevail universally, and be potent factors in causing the final Great Tribulation. In Ireland we already see in the Land League agitation a wonderful manifestation of Communism.

A CHINESE FESTIVAL.

THE Ten Kings of Hades is the name of an annual farmers' festival which is held at Shing-hien, China, many thousands of people attending. One such has been held recently, and Mr. Meadows, the missionary, says: "For miles around the roads were lined with pedestrians, chair-bearers, and coolies. The streets from morning to night were thronged with both young and old, all bent on paying homage to the frightful-looking gods carried along. It was a fruitful season for gamblers and idlers of every description; fighting and bloodshed were common. One man stabbed his uncle in a quarrel over ancestral property at the very time of the worship of the dead.

At this festival the people pay visits to their deceased ancestors' graves, and perform worship on a large scale, and vie with each other in the display of their worship. One Sunday morning we were startled by horrible yelling and such fighting as is seldom seen. The Shing-hien people fight with bludgeons, knives, or murderous field implements. We dare not open our chapel doors at such times, and our worship has to be carried on very quietly. The native Christians instinctively feel this, and perform their devotions in subdued tones, though at other times they are rather demonstrative in their worship and preaching.

At times, during this very festival, they made me fear for them, as they addressed their friends and neighbors in no measured terms. They never make any apology for speaking the truth about Jesus dying, rising again, and living for sinners, nor for telling them that they will all perish except they repent and believe the Gospel. Heaven, hell, death, and judgment are realities to the Shing-hien converts, not shadows, nor fine-spun theories. Oh, how painful it is to see farmers and hillmen, and young women, together with gray-headed old dames, all wending their way to the different temples and shrines to worship senseless idols!"

PROPHETIC PROSPECT FOR 1881.

A Humbling View—Certainty of God's Prophecies—Fulfilled Prophecies — Unfulfilled Prophecies—The Present Prospect—1. The Eastern Question—2. The Next Great War—3. The Campaign in Afghanistan—4. The State of Ireland—Apprehension for America—Polar Expeditions—Meteorological Phenomena.

THE beginning of 1881 shows us the world in a more alarming condition than it has appeared in even in years when a war has been imminent between two great nations. Were it not for the unfailing word of Scripture prophecy, we might be at a loss to account for the growing rampancy of wickedness and the hopelessness of the struggle of right against wrong.

It requires no small measure of humiliation to take a true view of human nature as it has been since the Fall. Consequently, worldly philosophers prefer to see in the spread of civilization and in the increasing justice of legislation signs that the love of truth is becoming universal, and that individual selfishness will not always dominate human affairs, while far too many Christian believers persist in putting a figurative interpretation upon every declaration of God's word which does not seem to encourage the hope that the Church is now on the way to victory. But the teaching of the Bible is that deliverance, not victory, is to be the hope of the Church.

There is

in whatever God once declares will come to pass. At a time when the Israelites were flushed with conquest, and their name was a terror to the mightiest nations upon the earth, Moses recorded the decree that they would become "a proverb and a by-word among all nations" (Deut. 28 : 37). That has been literally fulfilled in the reproachful term "a Jew." Moses also wrote, "The Lord shall scatter thee among all people from the one end of the earth even unto the other" (ver. 64). And that has literally come to pass. He said, further, "Ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you" (ver. 68). And profane history tells us that even that extraordinary prediction was literally fulfilled in the Alexandrian slave-market after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus.

Once more, when Tyre was one of the magnificent capitals of the world, the Lord God declared, "I will make her like the top of a rock ; it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea" (Ezek. 26 : 4, 5). And these words, in no figurative or spiritual sense, but exactly and literally, describe the site of that great city to-day. Again, when Babylon was "the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency," its doom was announced with minute particularity, viz., that it would be overthrown and never be inhabited again, that the wandering tribes of the desert and the shepherds on the plains would avoid it, and that it would become a habitation of wild beasts (Isa. 13 : 19-22). All that has come to pass, as any eastern traveller can see to-day, not in a spiritual or general sense, but literally and particularly.

Regarding the Lord Jesus Christ, it was foretold that He would come in the tribe of Judah and in the line of David, and that He would be born of a virgin. Events proved that "Judah" meant Judah, and not the Jewish race ; and that "David" meant David, and not any royal line ; while "a virgin" typified no social or spiritual condition, but simply meant Mary, the wife of Joseph, in her virginity. The numerous prophecies regarding the life and death of our Lord were equally explicit, and their fulfilment was equally literal.

These are a few examples of fulfilled prophecy ; and they afford us an indication of the way to interpret

UNFULFILLED PROPHECY.

The principal predicted but unaccomplished events are :

1. The restoration of the Jews to their own land, with an extension of territory ; and their establishment there with pre-eminence among other nations.

See Isa. 2 : 1-4 ; 11 : 10-12 ; Jer. 3 : 17, 18 ; 31 : 8, 36, 38 ; Ezek. 20 : 34, 42 ; 34 : 13, 14 ; 47 : 13-23 ; 48 : 29 ; Dan. 12 : 13 ; Zech. 12 : 6 ; 14 : 4, 8-11 ; etc. Some of these passages describe Jerusalem and the Holy Land after Christ comes, and when the Jews will have accepted Him as their King and so placed themselves at the head of the Christian Church.

2. The growth of anarchy and irreligion till the foundations of authority are undermined and the very existence of the Church is threatened. The rise of a man, the Antichrist, who will do with the anarchy in Europe what Napoleon I. did with the revolution in France, and will then carry his assumption of authority to a greater length than any previous tyrant in the world has done.

See Isa. 26 : 20, 21 ; Jer. 30 : 7 ; Dan. 7 : 8 ; 8 : 8-12, 23-25 ; 11 : 36-45 ; 12 : 1 ; Matt. 24 : 12, 13, 21 ; Luke 18 : 8 ; 21 : 26 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 3, 4, 8, 9 ; 2 Tim. 3 : 13 ; Rev. 13 : 11-17 ; etc.

3. This tyrant's war upon the people of God and the new-built Jerusalem. The appearance of the Son of God at the crisis of the siege, and His deliverance of His people.

See Jer. 30 : 7-10 ; Ezek. 39 : 9-16 ; Dan. 7 : 11 ; Zech. 12 : 2-10 ; 14 : 2-5, 12-21 ; Matt. 24 : 30 ; Acts 1 : 11 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 8 ; etc.

We have only selected passages for reference in which the events spoken of are described with remarkable distinctness and uniformity ; and it is a reasonable presumption that they are subject to the same rules of interpretation with the other prophecies which have been already so exactly fulfilled. Readers who have the patience to look up the verses we have cited may be surprised to find several particular and even trifling incidents foretold in almost the same words by different writers.

Now let us take a glance at

of the world, and see, on the one hand, how far it agrees with what the prophecies just quoted tell us is coming, and, on the other, with what we might expect if there were any power in education or civilization to overcome sin.

1. What is known in Europe as the Eastern question has not advanced one step toward a solution since the beginning of 1880. The succession of the Liberal Government in England, to which many people looked for a speedy settlement of Turkish difficulties, has been followed by no measure of consequence in that direction. Matters seem to be standing still until the development of God's further purposes. There is no prospect whatever of an improvement in the financial condition of Turkey, and without such an improvement there can be no change for the better in its administration. Meanwhile the insurrectionary spirit excited in the subject populations by the late wars gives safe promise of another outbreak at no distant day ; and that will call for or lead to the armed intervention of some of the great powers of Europe, with the usual danger of a war between those powers themselves.

2. The imagination palls at the thought of the next European war, for which twelve millions of armed men are kept waiting in silent mockery of the hope that the reign of peace is in a fair way to begin upon the earth. A few days ago one of the daily papers, not over-well versed in the Bible, but with a shrewd practical view of the condition of public affairs, wrote as it follows :

"The world has never yet seen war on a national scale. There have been, as in 1812-13-14, many armies, and those numerically as well as otherwise formidable, engaged simultaneously on one theatre. In 1870 the Germans employed several large armies, and the French, too, made considerable levies. But all the conditions of war are different from what they were in the Napoleonic era, and since 1870 several nations have turned or are turning almost their entire population into soldiers. When war occurs again among the great Continental powers there will be such a sight presented as never was seen before. There will be in the first line a chain of armies furnished with superb matériel ; in the rear will be the reserves of trained troops exceeding in number the biggest armies of former times ; and these reserves will rest on a succession of strong fortresses and intrenched camps held by enormous garrisons."

If we remember with this that every year adds to the improvements in the torpedoes, mitrailleuses, Gatling guns, and other engines for wholesale destruction of human life, it will appear that God knew more about the nineteenth century before the Christian era than we know about it now.

3. The Afghan war is standing still like the Eastern question. In this swiftly-moving age twelve months more have gone past without a settlement of the relations between Afghanistan and the Indian Government. At the time we write this article it is uncertain what security the new Ameer, Abdurrahman Khan, has for his throne, and in what sense the British frontier is to be protected ; while the rebel leader, Ayoob Khan, is at large, able to boast of having destroyed a British force near Candahar, and to laugh over the slaughter in cold blood of a British officer whom he had captured as a prisoner of war.

4. Lastly, the condition of things in Ireland seems enough to open the eyes of the blindest to the gloomy prospect before the world and to the corruption which lies beneath the veneer of its civilization. It is for the first time in history that a Government has tolerated total insecurity of life, liberty, and property without the excuse of war or revolution. A large part of Ireland has been for months past in a state corresponding with the state of Paris during the Commune or of North India during the Mutiny of 1857, with this difference—that in the last two cases the murder and violence were stopped as fast as guns and soldiers could stop them, whereas to-day in Ireland the authorities seem to have neither the ability nor the disposition to interfere to any effectual purpose. A lethargy born of an increasingly blunted national moral sense has apparently taken possession of the Government. Even a few years ago such a condition of things would not have been possible ; but the principle of the supremacy of the people above the law is gaining ground, and the world is hastening to the state in which it was before the Flood—"corrupt before God and filled with violence" (Gen. 6 : 11).

It is doubtful if any nostrum of legislation can now restore civil order in the country. The leading London papers are agreed in expressions of opinion like the following : "Coercive acts a few months ago would have been effective, but now they will be useless. The people have learned their power too well to be cowed. This revolution cannot end without bloodshed unless capitulation be made to the Land League, which is out of the question. The rising may be small and ineffective, but it is considered inevitable by many who are familiar with the state of the country. It is beyond question that no land bill, however extreme, will satisfy the Land League, and the movement should be considered in all its significance. According to the clear and repeated utterances of members of the League Executive, the Land League movement is not a movement for the purpose of bringing rent down, but a movement for the purpose of making the tenants the owners of the land."

Thus it seems not unlikely that the priest-ridden and turbulent population of Ireland will be separated from the authority of the British Government, which reduced to peace and prosperity the cognate race of Scottish Highlanders ; and this will be brought about, not by any peaceful method in conformity with the pretensions of civilization, but by outrage and bloodshed and other characteristic exhibitions of unrestrained lawlessness.

If this should take place, it will be a remarkable step in the fulfilment of the old prophecy in Dan. chap. 7, and Rev., chap. 13, which says that a king of practically unlimited power will rise out of the ten kingdoms that constituted the Roman Empire, and will rule over the same territory. Now Ireland was not included in the Roman Empire, whereas England was ; so we should be justified in considering the severance of the former from the latter at the present juncture as a significant occurrence.

Before concluding these observations on the civil and political indications of the New Year, we will remind our readers that the past year has been signalized on by an official protest of the United States Secretary of War against the defenceless condition of our sea-coast, and against the shortsightedness of letting our fortifications and munitions of war fall far behind the standard required to meet the armaments of European nations who may one day be our enemies. Is not this the beginning of an apprehension that America may not be able to keep out of the national convulsions that are to precede the coming of our Lord?

It also seems proper to note the continued rapid spread of the spirit of invention and discovery, and the increasing enterprise to explore every unknown limit of the globe. One Arctic expedition has recently returned from its eminently successful search (see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 11th); another has been for some months locked out from the world in polar ice; a third is to set out from England in the present year; while the greatest problem of modern geography, viz., the exploration of the Antarctic Circle, is also to be attempted this year by an Italian and an English expedition, both employing the latest resources of science and the highest available talent to increase the chance of success.

We are entering the most remarkable period of this century for the display of SIGNS IN HEAVEN.

Four comets are now, or will soon be, visible through telescopes, and one at least of them is expected to show its strange torch in the sky. Four eclipses will occur in 1881, the dates and particulars of which will be found in the ALMANAC at the end of this number. A small black speck made its appearance near the edge of the sun in August last, and developed into a cluster of spots which was easily visible through a small telescope, and moved in fantastic shapes toward the centre of the sun's disk. The appearance was caused by a tremendous storm of some kind in the atmosphere of the sun, and it was attended with violent magnetic disturbances in the earth, interfering with the operation of telegraphs and submarine cables. Former experiences lead astronomers to expect that these magnetic storms will continue for a considerable time, and that there will be a magnificent spectacle of auroral streamers in the northern sky.

The intelligence of our readers will guard them against astrological or superstitious ideas in connection with these phenomena. The fact is sufficient that God, who foresaw the political history of the nineteenth century, foresaw also its meteorological phenomena; and He has declared that a combination of events and signs (Luke 21 : 10, 11, 25–27.) will precede the coming of the Son of Man. Notwithstanding, these things will take place so naturally, and will be explained so plausibly by the wise men of the world, that the last day will come as a snare "on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth" (ver. 35). Therefore the warning is seven times repeated in the Gospels, Watch.

The Complications which Beset the Irish problem are many-sided, and it is difficult to form a fair estimate of their relative weight. The actions of the Land League are indefensible, but it is impossible to withhold pity from the Irish poor who are its instruments. They have drifted into poverty so abject that their lives are passed in continual dread of starvation, and they are ready in their ignorance to join in any scheme that promises relief. Under the harsh land laws that prevailed many years ago, many of which are now repealed, the estates of poor landowners passed into the possession of wealthy lords and capitalists, and men are now found everywhere throughout Ireland toiling for a miserable daily wage on the land their forefathers once possessed.

But the success of the Land League would arouse a similar agitation among the agricultural laborers of England, whose condition is only one remove better than their Irish brethren. Thus the situation is surrounded with difficulty, and communists throughout the world are watching its developments with keen interest. If the agitation is successful in extorting concessions, we may expect the movement against lawto rear its head in other lands.

MRS. BAGHDASARIAN AND HER ORPHANAGE IN ASIA MINOR.

The Famine and Case of Rescue.

THE Christian work which Mrs. Baghdasarian is conducting among the destitue children of Broussa, is one of considerable interest. Broussa is the capital of Bithynia, the country in Asia Minor of which the Apostle Peter speaks (1 Pet. 1 : 1). The city is situated on the slope of Mount Olympus. It was for a long period the metropolis of the kings of Bithynia, and derives its name from Prusias, the protector of Hannibal, one of the early monarchs, who reigned two hundred years before Christ.

The present population of Broussa is seventy-three thousand of whom eleven thousand are Armenians, six thousand Greeks, two thousand Jews, and the remaining portion Turks. The houses are built of wood. The streets are narrow, but clean. When seen at a distance, with its domes and minarets, contrasting with the snowy summits of Mount Olympus rising behind, it is in the highest degree picturesque. It has, at various times, been destroyed by fire, and partially by earthquake. Its staple trade is the manufacture of silk, which is of so peculiarly fine a character that it is highly esteemed and in great demand among the countries of Europe. The number of persons employed in raising the silkworm and weaving the silk amounts to about thirty thousand. The city has two hundred Mohammedan mosques, a Greek church, a Gregorian Armenian Church, and a large institution conducted and superintended by Roman Catholics. The Protestant Armenians have a church, infants chools, boys' and girls' schools, and a fine seminary, but, owing to lack of funds, progress has been but slow.

ENGLISH AND AMERICANS.

During the terrible famine which raged in Asia Minor during the years 1874–75 the people became so destitute that they were obliged to eat the grass of the field like cattle, and many were the victims to the cruel ravages of famine. The sympathies of the English and Americans were roused, and liberal help was dispensed through the agency of the missionaries. Despite the heroic efforts and aid which came from every quarter, the famine spread like a terrible fire, consuming man and beast alike. It was computed that the famine extended over forty thousand square miles, and that one hundred and fifty thousand persons perished. Hundreds fled to the capital and other large cities, and many orphans were left destitute. Broussa was one of the cities of refuge for poor, famine-stricken people.

At the end of the year 1874, when the famine was at its height, and Broussa was filled with refugees, the Rev. Mr. Baghdasarian accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Evangelical Church in the city, a professorship in the New Evangelical Seminary, and to take charge of the day-school. Seeing the terribly neglected condition of the female children who come to Broussa in search of God, his heart yearned to do something for them, especially on one occasion, when a number of these wretched little starvelings ran after him, crying, "Bread! bread!"

After long consideration and prayer he resolved upon opening a Home in Broussa, where some, at least, of the little destitute wanderers might be gathered in and taught to know and love the God and Father of the orphan. On the 31st of July, 1875, the work was commenced, and the Home was opened with one little Armenian orphan girl four and a half years of age; but though the work was evidently of God, many difficulties, disappointments, and trials of faith were experienced before the home was fairly established.

In a very short time there were six Armenian girls and one Greek girl under the roof of the New Orphan Home, with twelve day pupils, so that a little mission work was going on, as all the girls belonged to the Old Oriental Church. Christians as well as others sympathized with the work when they saw the once dirty, neglected ones, neatly clothed and looking very happy, walking to the Protestant Church on the Sunday. But the Greek and Armenian bishops became much excited, and anathematized the Home from their altars and pulpits. At length, by great tact, and in answer to prayer, this kind of opposition ceased, and the work gradually increased.

There are now more that fifty children in the Home, and the following is its organization: Regular school hours are kept from 8.30 to 12 A.M., and from 1 to 5 P.M. The school is opened with Bible lesson, singing, and prayer. The lessons are Bible and secular history, catechism, Armeian, Turkish, English, arithmetic, geography, and writing; and music to those who are to become teachers. Needlework and knitting are taught in all their branches. The girls take the household work by turns, and are thoroughly instructed in washing, cleaning, cooking, etc., the object of the Home being to train the girls to become useful members of society, and to make them the bearers of evangelization among their own people, as Christian mothers, servants, teachers, and Bible-women. Children from five to twelve years old are received, and can remain till they are fifteen. The whole is under the kind and skilful management of Mrs. Baghdasarian.

Here are specimens of what some of the girls once were, and portraits of what they now are:

Little Anna, seven years old, was found by a man on a heap of rubbish, eating whatever she could find. The poor little thing looked scarcely human; she was sewn up in rags. When the rags were cut from her it was discovered that her attenuated body was eaten into holes by vermin, and her head was covered with sores, which caused her hair to fall off. By patient nursing, after eight months' residence in the Home she had become a pretty, clear-complexioned, lovable girl, and her head is now covered with brown, curling hair.

Marian, another orphan, was found in the streets of Broussa begging. She had run away from one to whom she had been sold, and who had been in the habit of binding her to a pillar and whipping her most cruelly. She is a most clever girl, sews beautifully, and is gentle and obedient.

Another child, Yevpymia, came with a bad disease of the ears and fingers, and it was feared that the former would drop off. She has now grown a most fair and pretty child. Synhie, another destitute little girl, was at first rather obstinate. She went repeatedly to the matron and told her that if she did not open the door and let her out she would dig up the pavement and throw the stones at her head. These vicious habits have been overcome, and Synhie is now a warm-hearted, energetic child, and is very clever in her studies and in her work.

These are but samples of many cases which could be adduced; but enough has been said to commend the "Asia Minor Home for Orphan and Destitute Girls" to the sympathy and prayers of our readers.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Happy New Year to the Thousands of our readers! Our acquaintance with most of them continues this year, and may we, in the good providence of God, mutually be spared to see the end of it. Others of our readers, for reasons of choice, interest, or circumstances, go another way; and on them too may there come abundantly the blessing of God; "it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it."

The Attention of Congress is to be Claimed by two measures of importance at an early date. The first relates to the Interoceanic Canal Project, which is expected to take precedence of other subjects, owing to the alarm excited by the financial success already attained by M. Lesseps for his Panama scheme. In connection with this question the House Committee on Foreign Affairs has a report under consideration calling for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty with Great Britain. The report says the treaty "has been shown to have led only to great misunderstandings and controversies with the Power with which we were unwisely led to make it. It has always been equally inoperative, either to guarantee the independence of the Central American States or to advance the general interests of commerce."

The second measure relates to Inter-state Commerce, and on this subject the Committee on Commerce has three bills under consideration. That of Mr. Reagan, the Chairman of the Committee, is directed against discriminations and unfair preferences by the railroad companies, and also the pooling of freights which deprives the shipper of the protection he would otherwise have in the competition of the companies. The bill of Mr. McLane differs from Mr. Reagan's in that it proposes to establish a Board of Commissioners of Inter-State Commerce. The third bill, advocated by Mr. Henderson, differs in points of detail from both bills but adopts the main principles of Mr. Reagan's measure.

The Representatives of the Poncas who Appeared before the Senate Special Committee last week signed a paper that they had requested to be drawn up, in which they declared their desire to remain on the lands now occupied by the Poncas in the Indian Territory and to establish permanent homes there, and also express their willingness to relinquish all their right and interest in all the lands formerly owned and occupied by the Ponca tribe in the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Dakota. In compensation for the land given up and the injuries they sustained by removal in 1877 they ask Congress to appropriate the sum of $148,000.

It is feared that the step the Poncas have taken has been prompted by desperation. They have for three years ceaselessly striven to return and being now hopeless, have decided to take what is offered lest they lose even that. Bright Eyes, who is in Washington, when asked her opinion of the real sentiment of the Indians said:

"I know they want to go back to Dakota. Not one of them is satisfied to live anywhere else; but, since the unprovoked murder of Big Snake, they are afraid they will be killed unless they acquiesce in the wishes of the Interior Department. I object to the present arrangement, because the lands promised our people in the Indian Territory are the property of the Cherokees, and are not for the United States Government to bestow."

The Death of District-Attorney Benjamin K. Phelps occurred on December 30th. He had been ill for more than four months but no apprehension of a fatal result was felt until December 21st, when his wife, who had been an invalid during the past two years, died suddenly. The shock overcame Mr. Phelps, and though he insisted on being present at the funeral ceremony in the house he fainted before it concluded and was carried to his bed, from which he never rose again. Mr. Phelps was the son of Rev. Dudley Phelps, a Congregational minister at Haverhill, Mass., and was born in 1832. He graduated at Yale College and subsequently practised law in New York, being a partner of the firm of which General Arthur was a member. He was elected District-Attorney in 1872 and re-elected in 1875 and 1878. He was generally respected in Court for his fair and considerate conduct, and though engaged in many celebrated criminal trials never exhibited undue animus against the prisoners it was his duty to prosecute. He was a member of the Church at the Broadway Tabernacle.

A Grave Cause for Alarm Exists in the Power wielded by the heads of the Mormon Church. The views of a gentleman residing near Cedar City, Utah, who served in the Southern army during the war, as published in a contemporary, reveal a condition of affairs which menaces society throughout the land. He has seen the evil as it really exists, and he says, "I consider that the strides of the Mormon Church toward political power is a subject for the gravest alarm. The evil is scarcely understood in the States. Stealthily and quietly the church is laying sure foundations for immense future power. Some day when the Democrats and Republicans are struggling fiercely for the control of the government Utah will certainly be admitted, and the first polygamous State admitted will not be the last one, by any means. Something must be done immediately—something strong, radical and sweeping. There is danger ahead—danger to the whole country, danger to its morals, its institutions and its future."

The Trial of Mr. Parnell and his Friends was commenced in Dublin on December 28. The Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench announced at the opening of the proceedings that he should take no part in the trials, owing to the misconception of his remarks on a previous occasion when Mr. Parnell applied for a postponement of his trial. The case is being tried before Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, a judge noted for the fearlessness of his character and for his learning and judicial abilities; he has received many threatening letters. He is assisted by Mr. Justice Barry, a judge who is also generally respected in Ireland. The jury is composed of eight Roman Catholics and four Protestants, one of whom is a member of the Society of Friends. The opening speech of the prosecuting counsel was marked by the absence of denunication; it was a calm and dispassionate examination of the public speeches of the parties prosecuted, in which he showed that outrage, murder and conspiracy were the direct result of their policy and preaching. Less excitement has been caused by the trials than was expected, owing to the prevalent belief that the jury will disagree, if they do not acquit the accused.

The Silence and Secrecy of the British Government on the subject of the policy it is proposed to adopt toward Ireland are made a ground of complaint by the English press. It is hoped that some indications of that policy may be disclosed in the Queen's speech to be delivered to-day. It is argued that if the government proposes to disarm Irish hostility by concessions, those concessions ought to be made known as early as possible so that their beneficial effect may be enjoyed without loss of time.

The state of Ireland has, however, become too serious to be pacified by concessions. The agitation started with the grievances of the farmers, but it has been suffered to grow until its demands include total separation from England. The Dublin Express said recently in an editorial article:

"If rent were to be abolished to-morrow, and the estates of every Irish landlord confiscated in the interest of the occupying tenantry, it would make no difference so far as the development of this agitation is concerned, it would not check the forces which are rushing onward towards the ideal of an independent Irish Republic hostile to England and friendly to America." Under these conditions it is obvious that Ireland will only remain under British rule by force and even force may fail if it be not promptly applied. Thus the idea of a separation between Great Britain and Ireland, which appeared so improbable when, some years ago, students of prophecy first expressed their conviction that it would occur, is now discussed as possible, if not certain.

A Sudden and Urgent Request for Troops has been sent to the British Government by the governor of the Cape Colony in South Africa. The request was accompanied by the information that a small British force had been attacked and routed with a loss of one hundred and twenty men by the Boers. A consultation was immediately held in London between Mr. Gladstone and the Duke of Cambridge, who commands the army, and it is supposed that assistance will be sent to the Cape. It is, however, a matter of difficulty, as the available forces in Great Britain have been reduced in order to increase the garrisons in Ireland.

The Boers, who are now attacking the British at the Cape, are old enemies of the English colonists. As long ago as 1833 they threw off British rule, and after a battle in which they were beaten, they moved northward and founded the Transvaal Republic. As the Transvaal became settled and prosperous, and strong in a military point of view, an official recognition of the Republic was forced from England, and Pretorious, who was the leader of the Dutch, died in the belief that he had founded a nation. When the Transvaal was annexed by England recently, the inhabitants protested, and while stating their desire to live in peace with the British, they announced their intention of defending their independence with force of arms if necessary.

Foreign Topics. Negotiations between Russia and China have made such progress as to induce the hope that further hostilities may be averted.—The prospect of war between Turkey and Greece is considered ominous. Newspaper correspondents in Greece say that the public is so excited that unless Turkey yields, a conflict is inevitable.—Telegrams from Holland state that several dykes burst on Wednesday, December 29, and a large tract of country is submerged. No less than eighteen villages are under water and those of the inhabitants who escaped have been rendered homeless. Relief committees have been formed.—Twelve persons, four of them women, have been tried by the Belgian authorities for the offence of decoying girls from England for immoral purposes. They have been convicted and sentenced to a punishment so light as to suggest a doubt whether the crime was not connived at by the officials.

A Portrait of Signor Gavazzi, the Distinguished Italian Patriot and evangelist who has done so much to spread a knowledge of the Gospel throughout his native land, and who is now on a visit to this country, will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with a sketch of his eventful life.

The Bible and Prayer Union. Any Request for prayer sent to us under this head in future will be sent on to the "Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, New York." But our readers are reminded that it will be more convenient to send their communications to that address direct.

A Boy's Testimony for Christ.—A Christian father in Brooklyn not long ago obtained employment for his son, twelve years of age, in a stockbroker's office in New York, and the boy was sometimes sent by his master on errands to the office of another stockbroker who was in the habit of using the name of God in profanity. One day the boy said to the profane broker, "Sir, I wish to say something to you, but I think you will be offended." "No, I won't," said the other, "say it right out." So the boy said: "My father is a Christian, and he never swears; and if you don't swear, perhaps you will become a Christian too, and Jesus will love you." The broker was far too much astonished to make any reply, but he afterward requested the boy's employer always to send him when he had a message to his office. So an acquaintance ripened between the boy and the broker, who had quietly but quickly dropped his wicked practice, and not long after the broker asked the boy's father to let him take him into his own office, where the boy has now an excellent prospect before him in Wall Street.

A Bitter and Unwomanly Attack has been made on the clergy of America by the French Actress, Sarah Bernhardt, whose visit has caused so great a sensation in theatrical circles here. In conversation with a reporter recently she uttered grave aspersions on the ministers of religion in the United States and in Canada, and announced her intention of commencing suits against them under the law of libel if they persisted in condemning her moral character. As Miss Bernhardt's visit has been successful from a popular as well as from a pecuniary point of view, it must be inferred that her anger has been excited by the fact that she has not been received into society in America as she was in London. This is the only grievance she can have, and she may be right in attributing it to the influence of the ministers. Whatever may have caused the lack of social recognition, the fact is creditable to American society. Dr. Talmage announces that as his name has been used in an unprovoked and unwarrantable manner by Miss Bernhardt, he will next Sunday deliver a sermon on theatres and their influence.

An Impressive Phenomenon was Witnessed at Pittsburg, Pa., on December 23d. Until after noon on that day darkness settled over the city so dense that it was necessary to burn lights in the houses and stores and even to light the lamps in the streets. Snow several inches in depth lay on the thoroughfares and deadened the noise of vehicles and the footsteps of pedestrians. The darkness and silence together had a strangely solemn effect, and many citizens were seriously alarmed by the thought that the day of judgment had arrived. Later in the day the darkness lifted, but a day is fast approaching when for the impenitent there will be real cause for alarm. Of this day we are fully warned (Matt. 24 : 29), but how many there are who live in carelessness and disregard the warnings, and neglect the refuge offered them.

A Mother and Son were Present at the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting lately under peculiar circumstances. Some years ago the mother was there alone. Her son was in the penitentiary and she had sent a request that prayers might be offered for his converson, and she went to unite in those prayers. The prayers were answered; before his term of imprisonment expired, the young man had given his heart to God. He now came with his mother to join with her in offering thanks to God for His pardoning and sustaining mercy.

The Work of the Rev. E. Payson Hammond, and his wife in Manitoba and Northern Dakota has been signally blessed by God, and it is estimated that over a thousand conversions have taken place. The Rev. John Scott of Emerson, Manitoba, writing of the movement says, "Evangelistic services began on the last of October, and are still going on with blessed and glorious results in Winnipeg, Kildonan, Portage, La Prairie, Emerson and Pembina in Northern Dakota. Night after night for six weeks the largest buildings in Winnipeg were crowded to the door. Saints have been quickened and edified, and many notorious sinners have been turned to the Lord. The fire kindled in Winnipeg is spreading like a prairie fire over this region.

"At Emerson, as in Winnipeg, the people come to evangelistic meetings from every quarter—Protestants, Roman Catholics, Infidels, saloon keepers and whiskey sellers all come. As rain seldom falls from November to April, many enjoy the bright dry winters of the West. In December Mr. Hammond, with the ministers of Winnipeg, preached in the open air when the thermometer was between 10 and 25 degrees below zero without suffering any bodily harm."

A New Jersey Doctor Perished in the Snowstorm which, accompanied by a blizzard of exceptional severity, visited the Atlantic States last week, causing the mercury even in New York to sink seven degrees below zero. On Thursday December 30th, a workman on his way to the marble works at Plainfield, N. J., noticed something black half-covered with snow in an avenue. On inspection it was found to be the body of Dr. George Smilie of Plainfield. He had been out late the previous evening on a professional visit, and in returning, had lost his way in the blinding snowstorm, and had apparently wandered a considerable distance. He was near-sighted, and when he sank exhausted in the snow was within three minutes' walk of his home. To be so near his destination and yet to miss it makes the calamity inexpressibly sad, but in spiritual matters there are every day worse calamities. There are multitudes of people who attend the preaching of the Gospel to whom it might be said, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God" yet who do not enter in, but perish in their sins.

A Bed of Death was that Selected by a tramp on Sunday, December 26, at Paterson, N. J. It was a bitterly cold night and being almost frozen to death the man threw himself down to rest on a heap of cinders which had been carted from the Passaic Rolling Mill and cast on a vacant lot. The gas from the smouldering heap soon rendered him insensible and during the night the fierce wind blowing across the lot fanned the cinders to a glow and the stupefied man was completely roasted to death. Hs fate typifies that of many who seek comfort and pleasure in dangerous places and becoming enamored by vicious delights, lose consciousness of their peril, and finally sink into eternal death.

A Railroad Around the Great Desert of Sahara is projected. Three French engineers have surveyed the route of the proposed line, which it is intended shall run from Algiers to the Niger and thence to Senegal, girdling the desert by the way. Such a scheme a few years ago would have been received with ridicule, but since the discoveries of Livingstone and Stanley have opened up the dark continent it can no longer be regarded as Utopian. The project may be regarded as another evidence of the spirit of enterprise and discovery which we are taught by prophecy to recognise as a sign that the close of this dispensation is at hand.

A Wife's Dilemma About the Theatre was solved for her, in answer to prayer, recently. She had been converted, but her husband had not given his heart to God. He invited her to accompany him to the theatre but she refused, whereupon he commanded her to go out with him. She felt compelled to obey, but pleaded with the Lord to help her. The man went to one theatre, and found the house full; in an obstinate fit he proceeded to go to another, his wife walking prayerfully by his side. Suddenly he said, "It is too late, I am tired; I will not go at all," and has never attempted to go since. Thus the victory was gained in gentleness and by prayer.

The Ninth Anniversary of Jerry Mc Auley's Mission in Water Street, New York, was held December 26th. Many remarkable testimonies were given by men now in respectable stations in life and who are resting on Jesus for salvation, who were rescued from lives of sin and dissipation by the blessing of God on the mission in Water Street. The expenses of the past year slightly exceeded $3000, which have been covered by voluntary subscriptions.

ALIVE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live."—PSALM 119:144.

Rumor of the Preacher's Death—Anxious Inquiries—Mrs. Spurgeon's Joy—A Practical Lesson—The Text a Humble Prayer for Life—I. In its Simplicity—Adapted for General Use—By an Awakened Sinner—By a Christian Struggling Against Temptation—By a Suffering Christian—By Workers—By Aspiring Minds—By Expiring Saints—II. As more Fully Opened up—A Want Confessed—Desired as a Free Gift—For General Use—A Special Understanding of the Word—The Essentials of Life, Light, Liberty, Love—III. The Argument of the Prayer—A Pledge of Life—The Seed of Life—The Food of Life—The Glory of Life—This Enlightened Age.

YESTERDAY afternoon I was the subject of a somewhat singular circumstance. An esteemed friend and relative came over to my house, evidently laboring under great disturbance of mind, and having inquiries to make of a very important order. I was at the time walking in the garden, so that I did not see him, and he appeared to have great difficulty in mentioning the subject of his concern to my wife. At last it came out that he had seen a gentleman who had informed him that it was generally rumored that I had been taken ill with heart disease and had died in a very short time.

My friend came to the point by cautious degrees, and asked at length if I was seriously ill. "No," was the joyful reply of my beloved, "he is much the same as usual." Then it was clear I was not dead, and the great fear was removed. The question was put, "Would you like to see him?" But my kind friend was perfectly satisfied, and was too full of joy to wish to linger; he would go back and answer with certainty the many inquiries which continued to be made at the Tabernacle. How the report originated I am quite at a loss to tell. It has evoked much kindness, but it is rather odd to feel called upon to assure your friends that you are yet alive; I can but show myself and ask my friends to see for themselves if I look like a dead man.

When the peculiarity of the position had given place to other thoughts, it struck me in a solemn manner that the report might have been true, and my death will assuredly be a fact one day unless our Lord should come speedily. Only sparing mercy from God's right hand has prevented it being true at this moment. We do not realize our mortality unless we are startled into a recognition of it. We believe others to be mortal, and are not much surprised when they fall; but we have a secret notion that no axe will for the present be laid at our root. Yet reason would lead a man to say, "It happens to many suddenly to die, why should it not happen to me?" I regard the incident as a call to me to stand ready to depart at any time. Let it be a warning to you also to set your houses in order, for in a moment death may surprise you.

A practical lesson may be gathered from the very natural scene which followed my friend's departure. I came in from my walk and found myself suddenly seized by my wife with both hands; grasping the front of my coat, she turned me round and looked at me steadily with a most tender gaze, declaring that she must take a double look at me and hold me before her eyes, to be quite sure that to her unutterable joy. This special outpouring of thankfulness might have been lost had it not been for the rumor, and so far it is well.

May all of you be moved to the same feeling toward your dear ones whenever they come home at night alive. What would you do without them? What desolation would it cause in the house if a messenger hurriedly rushed into your house with the news of their sudden death! How we ought to love those who are spared to us, and to praise God to think they are still alive! Suppose they were suddenly removed; have we valued them rightly? Try and act toward them as you would act if you knew that they would die to-day. If husband or wife had died, what a sorrow it would be if an unkind word had been spoken, or a difference had arisen, just before the last look! What a painful cause for future regret!

Let your affections to those about you gush forth freely as you reflect that God has spared them to you. Bless God, good woman, that you are a wife and not a widow! Bless God, Christian man, that you sit side by side with your dear spouse, and have not to go weeping to her grave. What a blank! What a darkness! What a gloom would come over your household if either of the parents should be suddenly taken away! Therefore praise God and be thankful, and let us try to live toward one another, and toward our brethren and sisters in Christ Jesus, in such a way as we should wish to have done if they were suddenly to be taken up.

Pray for your pastor the more earnestly because you might this morning have missed him from your midst, and he will try and preach more earnestly to you because you may be gone before he will have another opportunity of addressing you. Let us continue knit together in love as long as we live; for the tie which now binds us together may soon be snapped. Out of a painful rumor may thus come a great blessing to families and congregations if it shall cause an increase of mutual love, and an outpouring of united gratitude for sparing mercies. So much for a lesson as to this mortal life.

By this incident I was further led to turn a heart-glance upon myself, and to say, "I wonder whether there is any question as to whether I am alive in the higher sense?" That I am alive as to my natural life is clear enough; but is my spiritual life equally evidenced? This is a very needful inquiry, for it is easy enough to make a fair show in the flesh and yet to be alienated from the life of God. Many abide in death, even as the apostle saith, "To be carnally-minded is death; but to be spiritually-minded is life and peace." The inquiry came home to my own heart, and therefore I suggest it to yours, for it may profit you.

My subject is life; may the Lord of life help me to speak of it after a lively manner. A consideration of the text will help in the inquiry as to whether we live unto God or no; and it may further help those who sigh after the divine life to discover the way of divine quickening. Let us again read the text, "The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live."

Here we have a touchingly humble prayer for life: "Give me understanding, and I shall live." We will first consider this prayer in its simplicity; secondly, I shall try to open it up more fully; and, thirdly, we will go deeper yet, and search into the argument upon which the prayer is founded. There is a something about God's testimonies which will impart and sustain life; hence the putting of the two sentences together: "The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live."

I. First, then, let us consider

THIS PRAYER IN ITS SIMPLICITY.

Without diving into its depths, let us see what lies upon its surface. This prayer is adapted for very general use. It would suit a child, and be equally becoming from a venerable father. It might fall from the lips of those in whom there is but the faintest sign of grace, and it might as fitly be used by those in whom grace is ripening into glory.

We ask you to notice, first, that this is a suitable prayer for the awakened sinner. He discovers himself to be guilty, and he perceives that there is a punishment for sin, and so far he understands his position. Alarmed by his conscience, he thinks he sees the Judge upon the great white throne about to pronounce the final sentence, and he knows what it must be, for it is written, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die;" so far he understands well enough. He hears also that there is life—life in Christ Jesus, life for guilty men; but his mind is much confused with many terrors, and with the horrible dread of the sure consequences of his sin. He has sufficient faith in the revelation of God to know that there is life in a look at the Crucified One; but he does not quite understand what that look means. He knows that there is salvation in one name and in no other; but he does not quite comprehend what that faith is which obtains for a sinner the virtue of that saving name.

Then is his time to pray, "Give me understanding, and I shall live." He wants illumination for his darkened mind, that he may see the way of salvation and run therein; that he may look to Christ, and by understanding the doctrine of his substitutionary sacrifice, may be enabled at once to trust in Jesus and live. Christ is our life; but we need understanding, or we shall miss it. It is a blessed understanding which enables a man to feel that though the sentence of death may be in his members, yet he must and shall live if he believes in the Lord Jesus.

Equally applicable, however, will this be in the case of one who is a Christian, and who is struggling against temptation. Perhaps, my brother, you are placed in a position where you are fiercely and you may fear that you will not survive it. It comes with such force that you are staggered by its power; you feel that you cannot bear up under such pressure; you despair of your spiritual life. Well, then, ask God to bring home His word to your hearts, that you may act wisely, and may meet the rebuke of the ungodly and the temptations of the wicked prudently, baffling the adversary by your sacred vigilance.

Possibly the temptation comes from within you. There are passions within you which at times violently rebel, and you are in anguish while you struggle to mortify them, though mortified they must be. Your soul abhors evil, and wrestles against the lustings of the flesh, agonizing that you may walk before God in integrity, pleasing Him in all things. At times you are hardly beset, and Satan himself draws near to aid the flesh with his fearful insinuations, or even by injecting blasphemous thoughts. Then is your hour of peril, for you are pressed out of measure, while the enemy howls at you, "The Lord hath forsaken you quite! Thy God will be gracious no more!"

Ah! then you need to know how to handle your weapons, the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and that master weapon of all-prayer. Perhaps you feel yourself so confused that you do not know what Scripture to plead in prayer, nor do you know what you should pray for as you ought. Well, then, remember the blessed word of Scripture, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Let this be your prayer: "Give me understanding, and I shall live, despite the assaults of the enemies."

Do you not think that this prayer will often well up from the heart of the suffering believer? To some of our dear brothers and sisters life is one long pang, for bodily disease has fixed its fangs in their flesh. There are others whose life is always from hand to mouth, and sometimes bread is scant in the cupboard, so that grinding poverty breaks them to dust. These are sore ills, as those know who have to bear them. Some, too, are subject to domestic trials, watching daily the pining away of one they love; or bereavement has followed bereavement till they seem left alone in the land.

Beloved ones, who have been called to suffer in these ways, have you not cried out at times, "I shall never be able to bear it; I shall die of a broken heart under these great afflictions. Oh, that I might hide me in the grave!" You fear that you will perish if the pressure continues; but you will do no such thing. God will help you to bear your burden by sustaining your soul. If the load be not made lighter, the shoulders shall be made stronger, and this shall be done by your having a clearer understanding of the word of God, and a fuller experience of its supporting power. You do not so much need health, or wealth, or freedom from trouble, as more understanding of the Lord's mind and will in all the dispensations of His providence. Breathe, then, the prayer to your heavenly Father, "Give me understanding, and I shall live."

I thank God that a large number now present are not so much sufferers as workers. Now I know that you who are working for God and trying to win souls often feel as if you were not half alive. I am compelled to make such a confession personally. I want to get alive to the utmost; not only having life, but having it "more abundantly." I have some life in me, thank God; but I want it to quicken me more completely. Sometimes we get into a sleepy state, and then the Spirit chides us, and we cry, "This will never do."

"Dear Lord! and shall we ever live
At this poor dying rate?
Our love so faint, so cold to Thee,
And Thine to us so great?"

We need quickening, brethren; do you not feel that it is so?

Is not this a very proper and blessed prayer for aspiring minds in the church of God, of whom I trust there are many present? Such men are not satisfied with themselves, but press forward to that which is yet beyond and above them. They have not reached that imaginary climax which some prattle of, who dote upon their fancied perfectness; but their motto is "Onward, Upward, Heavenward." These dwell on high, but their cry is "Higher, higher." They walk with God, and therefore say,

"Oh, for a closer walk with God."

They are calm and happy, but yet they sigh for a still serener frame; they have power in prayer, but they long for more of a wrestling spirit, and for greater prevalence with God.

If there be any here who are fired with such divine ambitions, what better prayer can they use than this, "Give me understanding, and I shall live?" For if God teach us rightly to use the divine Word, so as to mark, learn, and inwardly digest it by the understanding, then shall we be nourished into complete manhood, and shall go from strength to strength!

Do you long for this? The way to it is not to be found in dreams, and visions, and fanatical excitements, and delirious conceits, but in a calm, quiet, solid, and deep understanding of the revealed Word of God. Our Lord prayed, "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth." No other means are needed for the fullest development of holiness; you only require the Word to be unveiled by the Spirit to your mind and understanding, and in the utmost sense of the term you shall "live."

Last of all, when we shall not be so much aspiring saints as expiring saints—when we come to lie upon our last bed, and to look into the unseen, then may we still pray after the same fashion. When the eye shall begin to open to the light of heaven, and things but darkly seen before grow clearer in the dawn of the eternal day; when the songs of angels begin to break upon the opening ears of the soul, and heaven is drawing near, for grace is ripening into glory, and glory is coming to welcome its heir—then may we pray to live through the understanding and experience of the divine Word. How blessed it will be to have such an understanding of divine realities that we shall stay ourselves upon the promises, shall rejoice in the everlasting covenant, and derive strong consolation from the oath of God.

Thus, I think I have shown you that this prayer sounds well on every note of the scale. You may sound it out of the depths of seeking penitence, and you may run up to the very highest note with the expectancy of glory, and the Word will sound well on any note you touch. From the wicket-gate of humble faith up to the gate of pearl which admits into the golden city you may go on praying, "Give me understanding, and I shall live."

II. The time is come when under our second division the prayer is to be more fully opened up. "Give me understanding, and I shall live." Here is because it is deeply felt; the suppliant owns his need of understanding. Has that want been felt by you, my brother? It certainly exists, "For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt." The wittiest, wisest, best instructed man who has only human learning, if he knows not God, has reached no farther than that acme of all carnal wisdom spelled in four letters, "fool." We are all fools till God gives us understanding. A sense of our own folly is the door-step of all wisdom.

The prayer is evidently put upon the footing of free grace. He prays, "Give me understanding;" it must be a gift from God. The prayer is directed to God, for God alone can give understanding. Teachers can enlighten an understanding which already exists, but they cannot give one. Masters and instructors can profit nothing till we have an understanding with which to receive knowledge aright. Any man who is taught in the Word can teach us the letter of Scripture; but no man can give us an inner understanding of its spirit; that must be a revelation, and it must be wrought in us by Him that made the light and the sun, or we shall never come to an understanding of the Word.

Let it always be known that all light is from the Lord Jesus Himself: "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men." "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." All real understanding of the Word of God must come to us as it did to the disciples on the road to Emmaus, of whom it is written, "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures." The author of the sacred volume must himself expound it to the heart and understanding, or we shall be rather blinded by its light than made to see thereby.

Brethren, the Psalmist speaks of understanding in a general way—"Give me understanding"—as if he wanted the faculty for use in many directions. In every transaction of this life we need to be prudent, for we are surrounded by a thousand snares and pitfalls, and if we do not exercise discretion we shall be taken all unawares and become the prey of our enemies. We bear within our own natures so much to confuse and confound and entangle that if we are not taught prudence and understanding we shall certainly never escape from the mischief that is within us. We are frequently who cannot tell where they are.

It happened but the other day near Milan that so dense a fog covered the railway that a number of workmen who were employed upon the line heard the sound of an approaching luggage train and rushed to get away from it; but at that very same moment an express train, which they had not heard or seen, came rushing upon them, and cut them to pieces. Such is our condition at times; we try to get away from one temptation, and we fall, into another; we hope to escape one form of evil, and we rush into another. Haste breeds heedlessness, and warmth of zeal is apt to beget indiscretion, so that we daily need a good share of understanding as a ballast to our sail.

We must not be ignorant of the devices of the devil, nor childish in yielding credence to the falsehoods of men. We need in all the walks of life to exercise understanding; and, thank God, we may learn to do so, for the Scripture saith, "The Lord giveth wisdom; out of His mouth cometh knowledge and understanding. He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous; He is a buckler to them that walk uprightly. He keepeth the paths of judgment and preserveth the way of his saints."

Still, while the understanding sought for in the prayer is evidently of a general character, the former portion of the verse links it with a special understanding of the Word of God; and, oh! beloved, we need above all things to understand what God has revealed. Take care first that you know it. Search the Scriptures; let them be the man of your right hand. Prevent the night-watches while you search them; prevent the dawn of the day by meditating upon them.

Next, believe the divine revelation. Be it your prayer that you may so understand the Lord's statutes as fully to accept them by faith. Believe the teachings of the Word as realities, not locking them up in the dark dungeon of a forgotten creed, but making them bright realities in the life and liberty of your Christian action, and full of influence upon every movement of your mind.

Knowing and believing, it will be time to advance to meditation. Consider the words of God; weigh them, test them, dive into them. The richest ore lies deepest. There may be sands of gold sparkling upon the surface of the Bible, but the great nuggets are reserved for those who dig deep both by day and by night. Consider well the words of eternal life, and then go on to obey their teaching. You will never have an understanding of the Word unless you practise it. He who doeth the will of God shall know of the doctrine.

To this must be added experience, for who understands the Word till he has experienced its truth and power? But what a blessed knowledge of a promise you receive when it is fulfilled to you! How you understand the reality of prayer when you have received an answer! How you know the meaning of communion with Christ when your face shines with having seen Him! How you understand the secret consolations of the Holy Ghost when in deep water you have felt their wondrously uplifting power!

Permit me now to say that no man who is at all awakened can really live unless he knows the Word of God and understands its inner meaning. For this reason: Do you call it life to live without light? You may have been in the sepulchral dungeons of Venice, where not a ray of light ever came to the unhappy prisoner. To linger there, do you call that life? To live without the light of God is just such an existence. We have heard of men who have been immured in dungeons for forty years, wearing constantly the manacles, never breathing the fresh air—do you call that life? Can there be "life" where there is no liberty? Alas, some men have never been free, but have remained captives to their lusts, never knowing the liberty wherewith Christ makes men free. Call you such bondage life?

Another essential of life is love. To have nobody to love, and nobody to love you—is that life? Yet many a soul feels that it cannot be contented with earthly love, and if it has not the love of God, the love of Christ, the love of the Spirit, it is loveless. Call you that life? Infinite love is a necessity of an immortal spirit. Without light, without liberty, without love there is no life. But more; many men exist without peace, driven to and fro like a sere leaf by the tempest. Never resting, they are as a rolling thing before the whirlwind. Call you that life? "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Is that life?

And then to have no grand object, no object worthy of yourself—to be living in this world merely to get enough bread and cheese to eat, just keeping yourself breathing and your family breathing—is that life? No heavenly object, no ambition worthy of an immortal spirit, do you call that life? Death before you, which you dare not think of! No hope, unless it be the ghastly figment of annihilation! Dreadful hope! To me a thought most horrible! To live without hope is not life; far rather call it death. Lord, give me understanding of thy everlasting testimonies, then I shall live, but I shall never live till thou dost grant me this boon.

III. Now we will take the third step and go deeper, laying bare

THE ARGUMENT OF THIS PRAYER.

What does he mean by saying, "The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live?" I think he means this—that the Word of God when it is practically and experimentally understood by the mind is a pledge of life. Do you think that God would take one of us to be His child and teach us His word, and then after all permit us to be condemned to die? Is that His fashion? Did you ever hear of a judge who instructed a criminal in the arts and sciences laboriously for years with the view of executing him when the task was done? Nothing of the sort. If the Lord has taught you it is because the Lord has bought you, and He will not lose the purchase of His blood.

The next argument is this, an understanding of the Word of God is life, because we are told that the Word of God is the "living and incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever." Very well, then, if that seed is sown in my heart, my heart must live forever. There can be no death where the seed is incorruptible. If the Word of the Lord be living within us, then there is within us a life eternal. Be ye sure of this, then—if you have enjoyed a vital experience of God's Word, you have within you a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

Furthermore, the Word of God is not only the seed of life, but it is the food of life. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God shall man live;" and if you live on the word that cometh out of God's mouth you cannot die. How can you? For in the Word you read of the "flesh," which is "meat indeed," and that "blood" which is "drink indeed;" and the Incarnate Word himself hath said, "Because I live, ye shall live also." There is forcible argument here.

Once more, the understanding of God's Word is the very flower and crown and GLORY OF TRUE LIFE.

When a man so understands God's Word as to experience it, and to practise it, he has reached a high point of spiritual culture, and his life will be loaded, like Aaron's rod, with buds and blossoms and fruit unto God's glory. He will be such a man that he shall only need to take one step and be in heaven. He is a shock of corn fully ripe, each single stalk bowing its head toward the earth as if it asked to be ingathered. Let us pray God to give us an understanding of His blessed Word, for then we shall be ripe for glory, and in the highest sense it will be true that we shall "live."

I cannot make out the notion of certain professing Christians, that a change comes over Christianity as the ages move on; that there is a Christianity for the first century, and a revised Christianity for the present era. We have become very enlightened of late! You are aware that this is the marvellous nineteenth century. We have invented the electric light, and none can deny that we are the most enlightened people that ever lived on the face of the earth! It is not, of course, pride on our part to say so, for we are very modest. Among us there are men who are wonderfully brilliant—Paul was but a farthing candle compared with them. They understand by culture and thought so much that it is an honor to speak with them. The Gospel that was preached to the poor, which childlike persons understood by the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, is in their eyes a very poor business. They sneer and turn up their cultured noses at what they call "the simple gospel," as if a simple gospel was meant for simpletons.

Well, now, to my mind, this is the very bliss and blessedness of the Gospel, that the righteousness of God's testimonies is everlasting, that though it has been tried by criticism and tested by experience, it remains the same in its spotless purity and in its divine infallibility to this day. If God should be pleased to lengthen out the life of any one of you till you are as old as Methusaleh, you will not have to say, "I must die now, for the Gospel is worn out. I must perish now, for the righteousness of the Word of God has been disproved." Thus saith Jehovah, "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." We may catch the echo of His proclamation, and say, "Because the Word which reveals our God never changes, therefore we shall live."

Do you want a better gospel, any of you? Go and fish for it, if you do, but not in the waters of truth. Do you want any nobler promise, any surer covenant? Wander through the deserts of salt till your skeleton lies bleaching there, for that will be your sole reward if you turn away from the feast of fat things, of wines on the lees well refined. As for me, I bless God that the righteousness of His testimonies is everlasting, and by them I mean to abide all my days, God helping me.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN CHINA.

THE China Inland Mission, of which accounts have been published from time to time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is still pushing forward vigorously in the work for Christ in that dark land. A letter recently received from Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the chief of the mission, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal of May 22d, 1879, says:

I have lately been visiting our stations in the Cheh-kiang province, and the beautiful scenery has vividly reminded me of Switzerland. The hills here, of course, are not nearly so high, and there are no glacier views; but they are very fine, and the almost tropical beauty and fertility compensate for some drawbacks. But, alas! in this beautiful land no one heeds the Maker of it all. Except a few sheet tracts posted in front of some rest-sheds and temples by some of our own native helpers, I did not see or hear for days of any witness for the Lord.

All is of earth, earthy indeed. When will even the passing evangelist reach the hundredth part of China's villages and towns with his message! We found few of the country people who understood the Mandarin dialect, or the Ning-po. While one could just make one's wants known, that was all; any attempt to communicate spiritual truth was met with a blank look, or by "can't understand." In many places where now we have little churches this was formerly the case, so one must hope that erelong these dark places may be enlightened too.

At each station I have lately visited I have been introduced to Christians converted since my previous visit, and in many places there is promise of a coming harvest. Our great need is for more spiritual power in those now in the field—missionaries and native helpers—of more native Christians filled with the Spirit, living for Christ alone; and of more foreign missionaries to lead the way. There are plenty willing to hear, but few fitted for speaking of Christ as a "living, bright reality," from the overflow of a heart full of unintermitting joy in the Lord. Yet this surely is our portion, and our duty. There is no such thing in nature as an intermitting communication of life—as from the vine to the branch, from the body to the members. Should there be in grace? Does not Christ give us His peace, His joy—Himself—to be our constant life, and peace, and joy, and power? "In Thy name shall they rejoice all the day." "They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance."

The Rev. J. Dalziel, of the same mission, writing from Shanghai on October 14th, 1880, says:

During the short experience which my wife and myself have had in this port, incidents have occurred which, to us, have been of a deeply interesting character, and which should be cause of gratitude and praise to God on the part of the Lord's remembrancers. Gladly would we relate them did time allow, but work presses in a place like this. Our hearts have been cheered and our faith strengthened by letters from America and England, with the record of the converting power of God in the case of some whose names and faces we have forgotten. But the seed had life in it, and it bore fruit. And as with us, so with many others who "labor" on: they have the joy of hearing, if not of seeing, the blessed results of the glorious Gospel of the grace of God in Christ Jesus.

The other day a letter reached us from a missionary in one of the northern ports of China, telling of one sailor who was spoken with while lying here sick in his hammock; the interest aroused by the conversation resulted in his yielding to Christ.

It is most interesting and encouraging to note the links in the chain of circumstances which leads to the conversion of one soul. Often we find in the case of an awakened conscience that there is or has been a praying mother, or father, or relative, or teacher. We joyfully acknowledge our sincere conviction that the blessing resulting to our labors in the Gospel here is chiefly due to the abounding spirit of prayer by which we are continuously surrounded.

The sailor-lad in question was asked by my wife if he had not a praying mother. This is an avenue by which generally a ready access is had to the heart of our sailor friends. The question touched a chord which vibrated; he burst into tears, and acknowledged that he had. This was quickly taken advantage of, and converse upon the "one thing needful" was freely entered upon, which was not forgotten, as the sequel proved. On hearing an address some time after on "What think ye of Christ?" and having the question put by a comrade, "What think you of Christ?" he replied that he thought a great deal more than ever he did. He there and then accepted the Saviour, and joined the praying band on board his ship, now numbering twelve.

Amid the many and varied discouragements which we meet, the Lord continues to encourage us by such tokens, in the certain conviction that His work shall prosper.

Kindly permit me, while striking this note of praise, to seek a continued fellowship in prayer among the readers of your paper with us in this blessed work of rescue to which the Lord has called us in this port.

A MODERN PRODIGAL.

By George Brearley.

WE had been holding tent services for the militia, and while two evangelists were preaching in the tent, I stood in the highway to speak a word with the men as they strolled about after the duties of the day. One of these appeared to be a desperate character. He said, "Sir, I appreciate your good intentions, and no doubt you have done some of these fellows good; but I am past hope, I am everything that is bad; I am ready for anything this minute—I am desperate."

I replied, "When a sinner is ready, to perish, there is a Saviour ready to save; and if you are ready for anything, are you ready to accept salvation from God?"

"It's no use for me to be ready, because I am too bad for God, if there be such a Being."

"If there be such a Being?" I replied. "Is not the fact of your present state a proof that you fear that Being?"

"Listen to me," he said; "I was born in a grog-shop. My father kept an hotel in the city. I lived in that house till I had acquired the love of drink, and had learned to be wicked. My father put me to an academy, and I had a classical education. I was articled to a man who had the first business in the town. I had every prospect of going ahead, when my father died suddenly, and I was left with $10,000 at my disposal.

"I at once left the business, and took my money with me to London. I went to one of the 'hells' which abound in that great city, and I lived a fast life for a few days. Some of those who frequented that place soon got me to play cards with them, and I lost $4,000 in one night. I became desperate at my loss, and at once sailed for New York. I arrived there, glad enough to be away from such a place as I had left in London. But I fared no better in New York, for in less than a year I was penniless. Without food, employment, or a friend in the world, I sank lower and lower, and was a vagabond for years.

"At length I managed to get a sum of money to pay my passage back to London. But the curse of God seemed to follow me. I could get no employment, and I tramped the whole way from London to this spot on which I stand, and joined this set of roughs to eat a bit of bread. I am desperate—ready for anything."

I listened to this sad tale, and thus replied, "I have your history recorded in a little book. If you will stand still I will read it to you; it won't take long." I then read the incident of the Prodigal Son.

He said, as I finished reading, "It's very like mine."

"Yes," I replied, "but there is one thing he did which you have not yet done." "What is that, sir?"

"He arose and came to his father, and confessed his sin, and obtained forgiveness. He got a home in his father's house, was clothed with the best robe, and all the household was called on to rejoice over his return. The same blessing awaits you."

He wept, and said, "I am too vile."

I replied, "Christ came to seek and to save the lost. None can be worse than lost."

"But my sins are so many and dreadful."

"'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow,' saith God."

"There may be hope for some, but not for me."

I read, "'Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' That embraces any one who will take God at his word."

His eyes filled with tears, while his bosom heaved with the inward struggle, and he gasped out, "Oh, God, may such a wretch as I come to Thee?"

I read, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out."

He said, "Lord, I do come to Thee! Save me, pardon me, keep me!"

My tears fell fast over that lost one, which I trust the Good Shepherd had found. I gave him a New Testament, marked with such texts as John 3 : 16, Acts 13 : 38.

THE PENITENT PIRATE.

SOME few years since an East Indian trader was attacked while cruising in the Indian Ocean by a piratical schooner, and the attack being sudden and unlooked-for, the merchantman fell an easy prey into the hands of the pirates. The captain and several of the crew were slain during the conflict, and the rest being gagged and heavily ironed were laid in the pirates' boats for removal to their own vessel, and then the murderous gang proceeded to the ship's cabin, intending there to complete the work of destruction, and see of what treasures they could possess themselves.

As they descended the companion-way, they heard a soft voice evidently engaged in supplication; and the chief, directing his followers to halt at the entrance, went noiselessly forward to ascertain whence the voice proceeded. Bending low to avoid observance, he peeped into a door that stood ajar, and there knelt a fair young woman, with a beautiful boy at her side, one arm clasped caressingly around the child, and the other raised in earnest supplication.

"Oh, God of all mercy!" said the beseeching voice, "as the face of tearful agony met the pirate's view, save the life of my child, if such be Thy holy will; but rather let him perish now by the assassin's knife, than fall a living prey into such hands to be trained up to a life of sin and infamy. Let him die now, if such be Thy decree; but oh let him not live to dishonor Thee and perish at last eternally!"

The voice ceased, choked with tears of agony, and there stood the pirate, transfixed to the spot by the tumult of his own emotions. In imagination he was again a child; his own pious mother's prayers and instructions, for long years forgotten, rose before him; and God's Spirit sent such an arrow of conviction to his heart that, instead of carrying out his murderous designs, he sank upon his knees, and cried out for mercy. After assuring the lady that no harm should be done her, he hastened to the deck, unbound the captive crew, and restoring them to their ship, returned with his men to their own.

Shortly afterward he surrendered himself to the British East India Government; but so great was the remorse he suffered for his past crimes that before his trial came on, he was attacked with fever that in a few days proved fatal. Before his death he made a full confession of the crimes of his past life, manifesting the deepest penitence in view of his guilt, and he expired humbly trusting in Jesus for mercy and acceptance with Him. Thus was his pious mother's prayers answered at last, and her erring child saved, as we may trust, even at the eleventh hour.

The Rapid Extension of Socialism and Communism among the masses in all lands is exciting serious alarm among European statesmen. Prince Bismarck, in the course of a conversation with a French minister is reported by the London Standard to have said, "We have to fight a common enemy which threatens us on all sides and which has the means of hiding itself and preparing its blows even behind ministers."

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

MAY LINDSAY, the heroine of the story, is the orphan daughter of a physician. After her father's death her half-sister, Maggie, went to reside with her aunts, but May resolved on earning her own living. She received an offer of marriage from Claude Ellis, an old friend to whom she was sincerely attached; but he had during his college life imbibed skeptical opinions upon religion, and after a struggle with herself she refused his offer on that account. She accepted an engagement as companion to Evelyn Trafford, the invalid daughter of Sir William Trafford, of Alliston Hall. There her duties were light, and she grew to love Evelyn, who treated her as an equal and a friend. Evelyn had a girlish love for her cousin Donald, but her father disliked him because he was idle and extravagant. He was a clerk in a bank, and after living a dissipated life for some months he absconded, having robbed the bank. Evelyn sank into despondency, and in order to arouse her Sir William Trafford took her and May Lindsay on a visit to Palestine. During the journey the two ladies entered a store to make a purchase, and the man who came to serve them turned abruptly and left the store, and they believed he was the runaway bank clerk, Donald Trafford. They were assisted at various points in their journey by an experienced Christian traveller, Mr. Stanley. Meanwhile Claude Ellis had married a friend of Evelyn's named Miss Alice Fitzgerald.

Was it a Mistake?

"DONALD," said Sir William, starting from his seat—"Donald in that shop! Surely not! Surely you must have been mistaken. I cannot think that he would dare to come to a place like Port Said, where so many English people are continually passing through. Oh no, Evelyn, child, you must be wrong."

"No, Sir William," I said, "we certainly saw Mr. Trafford; I am quite sure we were not mistaken."

At this moment Mr. Stanley returned, and we could not talk any more about it. But Sir William seemed lost in thought, and did not enter into the conversation, which Evelyn and I tried to keep up.

"Miss Lindsay," he said at last, "would you show me in which of those shops you made your purchases just now? Evelyn dear, you sit still here till we come back. Mr. Stanley, may I leave my daughter in your care for a few minutes?"

I thought Mr. Stanley was not sorry to be left in charge; but Evelyn had turned as pale as she was before, and was trembling from head to foot.

Sir William and I left them on the seat near the fountain, and walked toward the row of shops.

"I really think you must have been mistaken, Miss Lindsay," he repeated; but I told him that I was sure that Mr. Trafford had recognized us, for he had strangely and suddenly disappeared, and had left a Frenchwoman to wait upon us.

I waited outside, while Sir William went into the shop. He came out in a few minutes, looking very much relieved.

"It is quite a mistake, Miss Lindsay," he said; "Donald Trafford is not here; I have made full inquiries."

Then he told me that there was no one but the Frenchwoman in the shop when he went in, but that he had asked to see the young Englishman who was waiting in the shop about a quarter of an hour before. The Frenchwoman, however, had declared him that there was no Englishman there, nor was there any one who could speak English. It must have been her husband whom the ladies had seen; he was in the shop a few minutes ago, and he was an Italian—his name was Signor Rialti. Sir William had asked to speak to her husband, and she told him he had been suddenly called away on business; he was away now, and would not return till Monday.

"Then Signor Rialti is evidently the name Mr. Trafford has taken," I said.

"Oh, I think not, Miss Lindsay," said Sir William decidedly; "you and Evelyn have been mistaken. I have no doubt that the young Italian has a strong resemblance to Donald Trafford, and that that circumstance has led you both to imagine that it must be he."

But though I was silenced by Sir William's very decided manner, still I was far from being convinced; for I was firmly persuaded in my own mind that it was indeed Evelyn's cousin whom we had seen that morning.

Mr. Stanley seemed to notice, with the ready perception which he always showed, that something had happened to disturb us, and that we should like to be left alone, for in a few minutes he made an excuse about having to call on some one at the other end of Port Said, and took leave of us.

"Well, Evelyn," said Sir William, as soon as we were alone, "you were quite wrong. You need not have been so agitated, dear; it was quite a mistake;" and he told her what he had heard in the shop.

"It is all a tale, papa," she said, when he had finished; "Donald is afraid of being found out, and he has put her up to telling that story, in case any inquiries should be made about him. He would not be back till Monday, did she say? Of course not; he knows quite well that the steamer will not start until early on Monday morning."

But Sir William would not be convinced. His wish was, I think, father to the thought, for he would have been very much puzzled as to how he ought to act had he indeed found his nephew, and he was therefore only too glad to believe that he was still in ignorance of Mr. Trafford's hiding-place.

I saw Evelyn glancing several times at the French shop as we sat there talking of other things, and I was glad for her sake when Sir William proposed that we should return to the ship.

We spent a very comfortless Sunday on board the wretched little steamer. It was impossible to find any quiet place below, for the saloon was filled by the large party which we had seen at the hotel at Port Said, and most of them spent the day in playing cards and chess, and in talking over their journey in loud voices; and they made so much noise that we found it was utterly useless to attempt to read or to be quiet there. So we went on deck and found a shady corner, where we were at least in comparative quiet.

But the lower deck was the scene of great confusion and noise, for a number of pilgrims, who were on their way to Jerusalem, were coming on board. There were Greek pilgrims, Latin pilgrims, and Moslem pilgrims, all of them dressed in what seemed to us the most fantastic manner. They were regular Easterns and dreadfully filthy, and they were all jabbering their various languages at the top of their voices.

Mr. Stanley told us that as Easter draws near the steamers are crammed with these pilgrims, on their way to the different shrines and holy places. They come from great distances and go through wonderful fatigue, and spend large sums of money to obtain, as they vainly hope, forgiveness of sin.

"I often think," Mr. Stanley said, "that their earnestness puts us to shame."

"Yes," said Evelyn, as she watched a fresh detachment come on board, "and do you not long to tell them how sin can really be forgiven?"

"I do indeed," said Mr. Stanley; "but, Miss Trafford, have you any idea what a difficult matter that would be? How many different languages do you think I should have to learn before I could speak to all these pilgrims?"

We thought perhaps five or six would be necessary, but Mr. Stanley told us, to our astonishment, that he had just had a conversation with a gentleman who had taken the trouble to go round the vessel in order to find out what were the different nationalities of the people on board, and he had made the discovery that there were men from no fewer than thirty different nations in that one steamer.

We sailed from Port Said on Sunday evening, and came in sight of Jaffa at six o'clock the next morning. We were up very early, for we were longing to get our first view of Palestine. It was a lovely morning, the sea was as smooth as a mill-pond, and the view was exceedingly beautiful, as the sun rose behind the Judean hills.

Jaffa looked a very pretty place as we saw it from the deck of the steamer, with its white houses overlooking the blue Mediterranean, a green circle of orange trees round it, and the quiet hills beyond.

But we had little time to realize the fact that we were now gazing at the very spot from which Jonah took ship for Tarshish, and where Peter lodged and saw that wondrous vision, and where Dorcas lived and made garments for the poor, in those far-off Bible days. We had very little time for thought of any kind, for as soon as we came in sight of Joppa, numberless boats came out to meet us, as they had done at Alexandria, and after the usual tumult we secured one, and were rowed to the shore, which was a mile and a half away. This is not at all a safe undertaking in stormy weather, for the only entrance to the harbor is a very narrow opening between most dangerous rocks.

The harbor of Joppa is a natural one, and has never been improved since the time of Solomon, when the timber, which Hiram cut down in the Lebanon, must have been brought to land through this very passage between the rocks.

When we drew near the shore we saw crowds of Arabs waiting for us, screaming and fighting and wrestling in savage earnestness. They seemed ready to tear us in pieces rather than lose the chance of carrying our luggage to the hotel. It really was a terrible sight to those unaccustomed to Eastern vehemence. Evelyn was very much frightened, and clung to her father, and even Sir William seemed agitated and alarmed. But Mr. Stanley's quiet voice reassured us.

"Oh, it is nothing," he said; "you don't know what Arabs are yet; they always make a noise like this. It is nothing unusual, I assure you," he added, laughing, as he fought a passage for us through the howling crowd, and led the way to the little Custom House, which was already crowded with the travellers who had arrived before us. We had therefore to wait outside for some time; but Mr. Stanley kept the Arabs who had followed us at bay, and gave Evelyn a camp-stool to sit upon, for she was looking faint and tired, and the heat, even at that early hour, seemed to us to be very great.

At last the Turkish officer was at liberty to receive the "baksheesh" which Mr. Stanley had ready for him. He passed our boxes without opening them, and we were allowed to proceed to the hotel.

It was a tiring walk, for the streets of Jaffa are covered with hot, burning sand, in which your feet sink every step you take. They are very narrow, and every now and then we looked round to find ourselves nearly knocked down by a huge camel, with boxes on its back, which had come noiselessly behind us over the soft sand; or a mule, laden with luggage, and rushing frantically along, was determined to pass us, and pushed its way through our midst in the most resolute manner.

Mr. Stanley had advised us to go as far as Ramleh that day, as it is forty miles' ride from Jaffa to Jerusalem, and he thought we should be too tired if we went so far in one day. Accordingly that afternoon he hired horses for us, and we mounted for our first ride in Palestine.

It was no easy matter guiding our horses through the crowds of Arabs, the strings of camels and mules, and the heaps of filth, in the streets of Jaffa. We were glad to leave the town and get into the road, which took us through one of the orange groves by which Jaffa is surrounded. Everything looked so strange and Eastern, and the scent of the oranges was delicious. We passed through the Plain of Sharon, and at about five o'clock in the evening we reached Ramleh, after rather more than four hours' ride.

There are some moments in our lives which it is impossible for us to describe. We never forget them, and the impression which they leave behind never fades from our memories; but still when we try to speak of them to others, even to those whom we love best, words fail us, and seem too weak to express what we mean.

I will not therefore attempt to describe what was the rush of feeling which passed through my heart when, for the first time, I came in sight of Jerusalem. Others who have had a like privilege will understand what I felt, as Mr. Stanley made us pull up our horses on the top of a hill, about half a mile from the city gate, and said to us, "Well, what do you think of Jerusalem?"

Neither Evelyn nor I could answer him. Sir William had many questions to ask about the houses and buildings on the road leading to the Jaffa Gate, but we scarcely heard what they were saying. At that moment it seemed to us a matter of very small importance which was the Austrian consul's house; which was the Pacha's country residence; which was the German deaconesses' school, and which were the Russian church and convent.

All these details interested us afterward, when we were more familiar with Jerusalem; but at that moment, when we were able, for the first time in our lives, to say, "This is Jerusalem!" we had neither time nor thought to spare for any interest in the modern buildings of the city.

THE PROPHECY OF ZACHARIAS.

S. S. Lesson for January 16th, Luke 1:57–80. Golden Text, ver. 78. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHEN the child was born which God had promised to Zacharias, the prophecy of the Angel Gabriel was fulfilled, "Thou shalt have joy and gladness, and many shall rejoice at His birth," for we read that his mother's "neighbors and her cousins heard how the Lord had shewed great mercy upon her; and they rejoiced with her." But, perhaps, there was not one among them all, with the exception of Mary, who could enter into the deep hidden joy which filled the hearts of Elizabeth and Zacharias. The personal favor which they had received at God's hands in being blessed with a child was indeed a source of joy, but God's purposes of mercy through this child were as yet a secret between Him and His two servants. Those things in which our God permits us to enter into His heart are understood by very few even of His children around us. There is a "secret of the Lord" which is with "them that fear Him." "He made known His ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of Israel." (Ps. 103:7). Zacharias and Elizabeth understood His ways in the birth of their child; the neighbors saw only His acts.

When they came to circumcise the child, they called his name Zacharias, because it was his father's name. But his mother knew that God had a will about the matter, and said, "Not so; but he shall be called John." The officious friends thought only of the family honor, and attempted to turn Elizabeth from her purpose by reminding her that none of their kindred were called by this name; but she was not to be moved. They then applied by signs to his dumb father, who wrote in answer, "His name is John," for that was the name of God's choice. "And they marvelled all." But their wonder was doubled when Zacharias's tongue, which had been so long bound, was loosed immediately, "and he spake, and praised God."

Whenever the power of God is especially manifested, then there comes fear upon those who know not God. The little effect which our lives as Christians have upon the unconverted is a sad but sure sign how very little of God's power we have among us. "Fear came on all that dwelt round about them;" people talked about these things and laid them up in their hearts, saying, What manner of child shall this be? "What manner of child" could he be who was filled with the Holy Ghost? We are only told, "the hand of the Lord was with him." "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2 Cor. 23:17). A man or a child full of the Holy Ghost must be unlike others, but in what way John the Baptist manifested the hand of the Lord and the power of the Spirit is not revealed to us; only it is said, "the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel." Was it that his heart was full to overflowing with a burden which no other soul could understand, and which found no vent or utterance except in the complete loneliness of the desert where only God could hear him? Could God tell out His heart more to this child than He could to any of the priests, as was the case with the child Samuel in his time?

"And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost," and now the whole of this little family was full of the Spirit of God. First the infant John (ver. 15), then his mother Elizabeth (ver. 41), and now his father. Oh, that it were so with every family among God's children! Zacharias "prophesied, saying, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for He hath visited and redeemed His people." The joy of this holy man was not personal; his joy as a father was no doubt included, but the burden of his song of praise was outside of himself. He did not say, "the Lord hath visited me, but His people." What is it then for the Lord to visit His people? When we visit any one we leave our own homes and enter into theirs, that we may come into near and personal contact with them. These are times of God's special visitation, sometimes in mercy, sometimes in judgment; there are times when God comes blessedly or fearfully near, to countries, cities, churches, and individuals. Those who love God rejoice at any token that He is near, and they can trace and welcome His hand even in judgment; those who know Him not, fear when God draws near.

Zacharias saw redemption in the visitation of God. "He hath visited and redeemed His people." The Redeemer was not yet born, but the man who was full of the Holy Ghost saw God's purposes as though they were already fulfilled, for he knew that what God would do was as though it were already accomplished; the Lamb of God to the eyes of faith was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. 13:8). Therefore he would add, "And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us, in the house of His servant David; as He spake by the mouth of His holy prophets, which have been since the world began." What then were these promises? There was, in the first instance, the promise of God in Eden, regarding the seed of the woman that it should bruise the head of the serpent (Gen. 3:15), and later Jacob said in his blessing upon Judah, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto them shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10), then the star and the sceptre of which Balaam prophesied (Num. 24:17), all spoke of the coming Messiah. But in David's time, and after his death, the tide of prophecy rose higher, and the Lord stated more specifically how redemption would come by the Messiah who was to be of the House of David. Thus we read, "His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven" (Ps. 89:36, 37). We read of the "rod out of the stem of Jesse," and "the branch out of his roots" (Isa. 11), of the righteous branch which God will "raise unto David. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is the name whereby He shall be called THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS" (Jer. 23:5, 6; see also 33:14–16; Dan. 9:24–26; Mic. 5:1-4, etc.). The old priest built on the spoken and written Word of God, and saw it by faith as though already fulfilled.

But in the words which follow he praised God for the great purpose of Redemption. "That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us . . . that we, being delivered out of the land of our enemies, might serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him, all the days of our life." This man of God did not look upon salvation as a means of obtaining personal joy and satisfaction, but that "being delivered" we might serve. Are there not many who long for more of God's grace, the power of His Spirit, deliverance from temptations, and so forth, in order that they may be happier, not in order that God may be glorified, their end is in, and not out of themselves. But the true, just end of all redemption is that we may serve. The Thessalonians turned to God from idols "to serve the living and true God and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 Thess. 1:9, 10). Christ gave Himself for us "that He might purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Tit. 2:14).

But Zacharias, inspired by the Holy Ghost, looked upon the service of God as a true path of liberty, a service "without fear." Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, ... let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water (Heb. 10:19–22). This is no position of fear; sanctified by the renounced will of Jesus (Heb. 10:10), perfected by His offering (ver. 14), the freedom from conscience of sins, which the sacrifices under the law could not bring about, becomes ours; and thus with "a conscience void of offence" we can "serve Him without fear," with a heart which by His great grace does not condemn us.

But our service is "in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life." The unspeakable grace of our God which delivers us from the condemnation, power, and even conscience of sins, through the redemption of Christ Jesus, leaves no loop-hole for the commission of further sin. There is no choice of paths; the only way opened by Christ is holiness and righteousness before God. We are, so to speak, shut up to God, and the instant we turn away to any self-reliance, self-pleasing, or self-consideration, we fall into self-condemnation and into a miserable sense of powerlessness, and if the temptations of the enemy meet with such a state of things in us, we fall, as Peter sank upon his miraculous pathway, when he looked at the winds and the waves, instead of remaining shut up to Jesus.

Righteousness and holiness before Him—that is according to God's standard, which is clearly se before us in the example of Christ and in th Word of God, and this is to be "all the days o our life." When any one seeks to be holy, b making the most strenuous efforts, without stand ing in the full grace of Christ's redemption work there are times in which he feels the strain to great, and relaxes for a while as though to tak breath for further efforts, or it may be there is natural reaction from the pressure he puts upo his will and inclinations. But it is far differer when, as crucified with Christ, we walk "in new ess of life" "by the faith of the Son of God," fo in this there is no effort, no strain; all is natur to the new nature, the life of Christ in us, and thr it becomes possible to serve God continuous "all the days of our life."

"And thou, child," said Zacharias to the new born infant, "shalt be called the Prophet of th Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of th Lord, to prepare His way; to give knowledge salvation unto His people, in the remission of the sins" (Gr.). John the Baptist was the first eva gelist of the Gospel dispensation, and the work an evangelist is to prepare the way of the Lor Before Christ can live His life in us, and be form in us (Gal. 4:19), we must first break with sin accepting the reconciliation which He has ma for us. Every evangelist, whether clerical or la whether man or woman, whether in office or out office, ought to possess the power to bring souls contact with Christ, in the measure in which G sends them on their mission, and every Christi ought to be an evangelist according to the measu of opportunity which God gives him.

But John the Baptist could only accept his offi every child of God can only undertake h "through the tender mercy of our God, where the dayspring from on high hath visited us, to g light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shad of death, to guide our feet into the way of peac If the dayspring from on high (or sun-rising, margin) has visited us, and we are in the sunli of God's countenance, it is the basest selfishn if we keep such blessed light to ourselves. If have been visited with God's light, it is that may "give light to them that are in darkness in the shadow of death," to the fallen, the dru ards, the worldly around us. Wherever we darkness, there God sends us to shine as His lig "Ye are the light of the world," He says (M 5:14). Oh, let us seek by His grace, and thro His tender mercy toward us, to be light-gi to others, that we may walk in and lead others "the way of peace."

WHY are the Italian boot-blacks and organ-grinders of New York ranked with the negroes and the Chinese rather than with Americans? We know of no reason except that Italy is one of the countries of Europe that rejected the Reformation.

There is every other reason for Italy to hold its head high among the nations of the world. With the exception of Palestine, no other country can boast such illustrious traditions; and no country whatever contains so many cities with histories like Palermo, Genoa, Naples, Parma, Pavia, Bologna, Florence, Milan, Mantua, Ferrara, Padua, Savoy, Nice, and Turin. And ROME! What traditions cluster round that name! What a history envelopes it! What power has emanated from that city, and what glories have passed over it! The world has seen but one Rome, and it will never see another.

organ-grinder; and the poor man himself belongs to the race of Galileo, and Columbus, and Raphael, and Dante, and Lorenzo, and Canova, and Cavour. For we write of Christian Italy. Ancient Rome, greater far than Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, Thebes, or Athens, went the way of all pagan cities. But having received the Gospel, the unfailing guarantee of endurance, why is Christian Rome now so low?

Take an account of Florence just before the Reformation, reduced from Macaulay's graphic picture:—The revenue of the Republic amounted to 300,000 florins, a sum which, allowing for the depreciation of the precious metals, was at least equivalent to £600,000 sterling ($3,000,000), a larger sum than England and Ireland two centuries ago yielded annually to Elizabeth. The manufacture of wool alone employed 200 factories and 30,000 workmen. The cloth annually produced sold, at an average, for 1,200,000 florins, a sum fully equal, inexchangeable value, to $12,500,000. Four hundred thousand dollars were annually coined. Eighty banks conducted the commercial operations, not of Florence only, but of all Europe.

The transactions of these establishments were sometimes of a magnitude which may surprise even the contemporaries of the Barings and the Rothschilds. Two houses advanced to Edward III. of England upward of 300,000 marks at a time when the mark contained more silver than fifty shillings of the present day, and when the value of silver was more than quadruple of what it now is. The city and its environs contained 170,000 inhabitants.

The progress of elegant literature and of the fine arts was proportioned to that of the public prosperity. No tongue ever furnished more gorgeous and vivid tints to poetry. The admiration of learning and genius became almost an idolatry among the people of Italy. The spirit of literary research allied itself to that of commercial enterprise. Every place to which the merchant princes of Florence extended their gigantic traffic was ransacked for medals and manuscripts. Architecture, painting, and sculpture were munificently encouraged. We can scarcely persuade ourselves that we are reading of times in which the annals of England and France present us only with a frightful spectacle of poverty, ignorance, and barbarity.

But when Martin Luther offered an open Bible to Christendom, and Italy elected to keep the Bible shut, the industry and commerce of the country declined fast, and till the rise of Victor Emmanuel Italy was one of the insignificant countries of Europe. The character of the religion which the country chose is well illustrated by

THE FOLLOWING ANECDOTE:

When Chief Justice Whiteside, of England, visited Italy, he was struck with the multitude of priests, and asked a Roman Catholic friend what they found to do. "Find to do!" answered his friend; "they have more to do than they can possibly get through." "How can that be?" he asked again. "They have to say masses for the dead. You see, sir," the friend went on to explain, "no man in good circumstances likes to die without leaving money, perhaps a hundred crowns, or even five hundred, for masses for his soul—masses to get him out of purgatory. Or, if he loses his wife or his child, he goes to the priest to order a hundred masses for the benefit of the soul of the departed.

"Now, sir, for all Italy this makes such an enormous demand that the priests are always some tens of thousands of masses in arrear—that is, they were paid last year, or the year before, for masses which they have not yet been able to say." "But what happens then?" asked Mr. Whiteside. "Oh!" replied his friend, "they have to send a petition to the Pope every two or three years, and His Holiness issues a decree that so many thousand masses, which have not been said, shall be entered in the chancery of heaven as if they had been said, and that sets the matter all straight."

In such a melancholy hope Roman Catholics are forced to die in all parts of the world, although the Word of God, read according to the manuscripts in the Vatican, declares that we are sanctified through the offering once of the body of Jesus Christ, and presents a full pardon to the chief of sinners "without money and without price." (See Isa. 55 and Heb. 10.)

The following is the dispassionate account, by the late Bayard Taylor, of the moral condition of the Italians as compared with that of other Christian nations at the present day: "Of the moral dignity of human nature they have little conception. Those classes who are engaged in active occupation seem even destitute of common honesty, practising all kinds of deceits in the most open manner, and apparently without the least shame. The state of morals is lower than in any other country of Europe; what little virtue exists is found among the peasants. Many of the most sacred obligations of society are universally violated, and, as a natural consequence, the people are almost entire strangers to that domestic happiness which constitutes the true enjoyment of life."

Our readers will ask, "What has all this to do with Father Gavazzi?" We reply that when we mention as one of the principal agents in the redemption of Italy from such degradation, we have described the man. The leading points in his life can be briefly enumerated. He was born in 1809, at Bologna, where his father was an eminent barrister and judge, and he had nineteen brothers and sisters, who were all of tall and commanding figures like himself.

He was educated at the university of his native place, but at the age of only sixteen years he became a monk of the Barnabite order; and four years later he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric at Naples, where he laid the foundation of his reputation as an orator. The qualities at the base of Father Gavazzi's character are thoroughness and earnestness of purpose, and he displayed these characteristics at the outset of his public career by a style of preaching which could not have failed to excite attention. Setting light by church forms and ceremonies, he alarmed his fellow-priests by urging purity of life and practice, and boldly denounced the corrupt court of Gregory XVI., for which he was imprisoned and did not regain his liberty till the death of that Pope. This conduct raised him greatly in the estimation of the advanced party of the Italian clergy and statesmen.

On the accession of Pius IX., Gavazzi was one of the foremost supporters of the liberal policy with which that Pope began his pontificate. But when he went in person to Rome, and labored for the diffusion of political enlightenment and patriotic aspirations among the masses, the timid Pope drew back and even forbade him to preach. Then the war with Austria in 1848 broke out, and Gavazzi organized a crusade to drive the invaders out of the country, by which he earned the title of Pietro Eremita, or "Peter the Hermit."

The volunteers numbered 16,000, and Pius gave Gavazzi his blessing and appointed him almoner and grand chaplain of the force. The night before they started, the fiery leader preached to 30,000 people in the Coliseum. But the Pope soon changed his mind and recalled the legion, and then Gavazzi and the more determined of the soldiers refused to obey. In Florence, Genoa, and Bologna he preached his patriotic mission and made collections for his followers, and one oration, delivered to a vast assemblage in the city of Venice, produced twenty thousand dollars. Men emptied their purses on the platform; women took off their jewels, and even cut off their hair as contributions to the popular cause.

The cause prevailed, the Pope, who had withdrawn his sanction, fled from Rome on November 5th, and a republic was proclaimed, Gavazzi being appointed to the chief charge of the military hospitals. He called for nurses, and six thousand women responded and took care of the wounded. But in April of the following year a French expedition took possession of the city, after a siege of thirty days, and reinstated Pius in his place; and the patriot was glad to escape to England, where, as well as in the chief towns of Scotland, he delivered numerous addresses, in the English language, on the political aims of his country. He also visited the United States and Canada.

Italy having become quieter, Gavazzi returned to it several times, and he tried his last chance in a political capacity in 1860, by accompanying Garibaldi when he attacked and defeated the Neapolitans at Palermo.

But during his travels in Protestant lands Gavazzi, who had all his life preferred the spirit of Christianity to the letter of it, had come under the influence of the untrammelled Gospel, and had undergone that change of heart which Christ called

CONVERSION.

To quote the words of his secretary, Dr. Thompson, "he now saw clearly that no mere patriotism could give to Italy or any other country the future it needed. Henceforth, leaving political affairs to others, he devoted himself to the spiritual regeneration of his people. Born to be a leader among men, beloved and revered by all who knew him, swaying multitudes like flames moved by the wind, he cast behind him every dream of earthly ambition, and became simply and only a herald of the cross." Accordingly, when religious liberty was proclaimed in Italy, he appeared there as the foremost of its evangelists.

Various denominations of England and America, as well as several indigenous reformed churches, hastened to open missions in the field which had for centuries been under the sway of Rome; but it was not till 1870 that a successful effort was made to unite the different bodies. In that year Gavazzi induced the prosperous and influential congregation of Milan to invite delegates from the other congregations to meet them in General Assembly, and the result was the formation of of Italy with a Declaration of Principles and a Constitution, each particular church, in its local affairs standing independent of all the others. According to its constitution the Free Church is governed by its General Assembly, which is composed of deputies from the particular churches, and which has met every year since 1870. The Declaration of Principles unanimously adopted by the first General Assembly at Milan contains the following important doctrinal statements:

"Adam, disobeying the Word of God, sinned, and thus by one man sin has entered into the world, and death by sin. On this account human nature in Adam and by Adam has become corrupt and sinful; and we are all born in Adam with the inclination to do evil, and the inability of doing well what God has commanded; therefore naturally we are all sinners under condemnation." "Salvation comes from the eternal and gratuitous love of the Father; it is obtained through the expiatory sacrifice, resurrection, and intercession of the Son." "In addition to the universal priesthood of believers, God Himself has established in the Church various special ministries, for the perfecting of the saints and the edifying of the body of Christ, which ministries ought to be recognized by the Church itself."

"The Lord Jesus Christ will come from heaven and transform our body of humiliation into a glorious body. In that day the dead in Christ shall rise first, and the living who are found faithful shall be transformed, and thus together shall we be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with the Lord; and after His kingdom all the rest shall rise to be judged in judgment."

At the same time every priestly and churchly assumption was thrown over by the following words in a short explanation which accompanied the Declaration:

"The Declaration of Principles does not pretend to infallibility; the Word of God is alone infallible and immutable. Nor is it to be considered as the cause or title to salvation; but simply as the outward bond of unity in the faith and the banner of the Church."

The statistics of the Church, which was started with only 23 small congregations and 400 communicants, are as follows: 15 ordained ministers, 15 evangelists, 49 elders, 67 deacons, 11 deaconesses, 1800 communicants, 265 catechumens, 724 Sabbath-school children, 1328 pupils in day and night schools, 21 teachers in the day-schools, 1593 regular hearers of the Gospel, 1261 additional occasional hearers at each service, 36 churches, and 35 out-stations more or less frequently visited. The contributions of these churches in 1879, for evangelization alone, amounted to 1855.01 francs ($343.18), and the total sum collected for all objects was 12,223 francs ($2261.25).

There is a theological school in Rome with 17 candidates for the ministry. Father Gavazzi is their instructor in "sacred oratory" (homiletics), and the Rev. Mr. Henderson, of the Free Church of Scotland, is Professor of Theology. Over the door is the inscription, in Italian, English, and German, "The Free Church in Italy."

The Rev. John R. McDougall, Treasurer and Foreign Secretary of the Church, says that a grand and is plainly dawning upon it. "The bitter prejudice of past years has given way. The people of Italy are largely enlightened as to the superiority of the evangelical faith and morals. They know by experience that Protestant foreigners are their best friends, and have done what their own priests and natural protectors have not done, in critical periods, in the way of feeding their starving families. And with this conviction strong on their hearts, they crowd the largest theatres and listen attentively and respectfully to the Gospel message. They send their children by preference to evangelical schools. Our Christian literature is spreading in their households."

An incident is mentioned by one of the evangelists of the Church which shows that ignorance and infidelity are obstacles to the reception of the truth, perhaps, rather more than an intelligent adherence to the principles of Romanism. A gentleman remarked in friendly conversation, "I cherish the greatest sympathy for the Evangelicals, and, to tell the truth, were I not a Christian, I should be so pleased to be an Evangelical." This gentleman did not believe in God, and considered man a mere development of the monkey. But he imagined himself a Christian, by which he understood a good Catholic, because he had been baptized.

Another man, who was neither one thing nor another in his principles, on being put into a corner in argument, said, "Well, I am most thoroughly convinced of the truth of your religion. There is no other so beautiful and so holy. But I was born a Catholic, and mean to die one. I have a horror of people who change their religion."

A PROMINENT CHRISTIAN FAMILY,

of the name of Pavan, in Udine, were bereft of the eldest son, a daughter, and the father, in 1879. The son died first. Then the daughter, Lucia, took his place as a teacher in the Sunday-school. She had a rich, sweet voice, and a rare intelligence, and was a constant reader of the Bible. When she became ill, "the Pavan house was transformed into a sanctuary of holy affections." In the midst of severe sufferings an angelic smile of peace suffused her countenance. Prayer was her greatest comfort, and she expressed an unfaltering certainty of soon being forever with the Lord.

The father, James Pavan, had been till 1867 a rigid and devout Roman Catholic, but in that year he had gone through curiosity to the Evangelical Church, and had been convinced of the truth and had subsequently embraced it. From that time he was a shining light in Udine, beloved and respected by the whole population. The love of Christ regulated all his actions to such an extent that a whole city could yield the splendid testimony that not only did he never do harm to any one, but that he was constantly doing great kindness to many through his ceaseless liberality. When he could not speak well of a person he was silent, thus rightly interpreting the precepts of Christ. As his trials increased his love to his Saviour was visibly enlarged, and one of the last acts of his life was to run to a stricken household and dry the tears of the mourners and inculcate confidence and resignation in the goodness of God.

A young man was admitted, after careful examination by the Presbytery of the Church, to the Lord's Supper just before he was to go away under the compulsion of military service. A month later he obtained a short holiday, and appeared again at the sacrament dressed in his grenadier uniform and accompanied by his mother and younger brother. When the service was over he said to his mother, "I always told you, dear mother, that the simple words spoken here touch the heart;" and she gave her promise to attend the church regularly.

Father Gavazzi has been five times excommunicated from the Church of Rome and given over to eternal damnation for political disloyalty and religious heresy. On one of the occasions he protested to his Cardinal that, having been once excommunicated, he could not be turned out again unless he were first received back into the Church; but the Cardinal went on consigning his soul and his body to the torments of hell.

In 1872 Father Gavazzi came to

to secure funds for the work of Italian evangelization, especially for his theological seminary, and he was successful in collecting $30,000. One of our leading magazines says: "Many will remember with what graphic utterance he told the story of evangelization; with what torrents of eloquence he hurried his audience along through his historical lectures, with what tender pathos he delivered his message. But only those who have heard him under his native sky and in his native tongue can adequately appreciate the power with which he moves the masses of his countrymen."

He is now again in this country on a similar errand. His arrival was mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 9th. After preaching two Sundays in New York and Brooklyn, he started on a tour in the Southern States. He hopes to be back in New York in March, but he will not return to Italy till it is time to meet his college classes in the autumn. Applications for addresses by him should be directed to the Rev. John B. Thompson, D.D., Catskill, N. Y. Gavazzi has already passed through Richmond, and one of the papers there has given the following account of his appearance and style of speaking:

"Gavazzi is now over seventy years of age, but he is a hale, hearty-looking old man, in the full possession of all his fine intellectual powers. He is a truly eloquent man; eloquence always follows when the cup is full. He possesses the eloquence which proceeds from being charged with one great and noble thought—the evangelization of Italy. He pronounces the English language with difficulty, but the eyes of his hearers are never taken off him for a moment while he is speaking. He has a powerful, deep voice, and is a close reasoner, with wonderful felicity of illustration, and yet this does not explain the whole effect produced by him as a speaker. His gesture, the play of his countenance—in a word, his dramatic power—constitutes a large source of his strength before an audience. While his matter is very strong, yet one merely reading it would have little idea of Gavazzi. No one who hears him can doubt the sincerity, the single-hearted Christian intensity, of the man."

THE TIME OF THE END.

AT no period in the history of the world have mankind ever stood on the threshold of more eventful changes and mightier revolutions than at present. Empires that have long stood unshaken are about to be dissolved; thrones that have been firmly consolidated for many years are on the point of being cast down; and institutions that have been regarded as of immovable stability are on the eve of their destruction.

Many persons suppose that the TIME of the End of this Dispensation and of the Second Coming of Christ is altogether hidden from human discovery, but "they err, not knowing the Scriptures," which distinctly intimate that the time of the end shall be revealed to watchful Christians by the prophecies (Amos 3 : 7; Matt. 24 : 32-43; John 15 : 15; 2 Pet. 1 : 19; 1 Thess. 5 : 4).

The text in Mark 13 : 32, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father," was spoken in the present tense before the ascension and glorification of Christ, and before the Pentecostal descent of the Holy Spirit, and before the gift of the Book of Revelation sixty years afterward.

It is a text that cannot apply to the present time, because it cannot now be said that the Son does not know the day and hour of his own Advent. And in addition to the chronological dates and prophetic signs of the times which convergently indicate the End of this Age to be probably about 1890, or within three or four years afterward, there is to be a seven years' covenant made between the Jews and a latter-day Napoleon, exactly seven years and two and a half months before the End, so that the epoch of the consummation will then become very precisely foreshown.

And within this prophetic period of seven years and two and a half months the greater part of Daniel and Revelation will undergo its ultimate literal-day fulfilment, which has been hitherto foreshadowed by its typical year-day accomplishment.

The words "It is not for you to know the times or seasons" were spoken only to the people of those days (Acts 1 : 7). The prophetic dates of the 6000, 2520, 2500, 2300, 1335, 1260 years (Dan. 4 : 16; 8 : 14; 12 : 7, 12; Rev. 11 : 3; 12 : 6 in their year-day fulfilment) all convergently point to the epoch of 1890 as the close of this dispensation. Moreover, the future literal-day fulfilment of Daniel's Sixty-nine Week (9 : 25) will distinctly show the week, if not the day, of Christ's Second Advent, for "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince (His Second Coming) shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks"—i.e., 69 weeks of days, which is just about one year and four months. So that after that decree shall go forth it will be impossible to avoid knowing the week of Christ's Second Advent, which will be 69 weeks after the date of that decree.

The Leading Figure in the Events of the day still remembered in Wall Street as "Black Friday" was Albert Speyers, who acted as agent for the ring of speculators who were running up the price of gold. Speyers died on Tuesday, December 21st. He never recovered the excitement of the day when he made the enormous purchases for the ring. The failure of the scheme which carried ruin into so many homes, and the subsequent repudiation of his contracts by the speculators, has ever since preyed upon his mind. He instituted several suits to recover damages, but was unsuccessful in getting them brought to trial.

THE TIMES WE LIVE IN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"—ESTHER 4: 14.

Esther's God-appointed Work—Two Armies in Conflict—What we Want Now—I. Aggressive Christians—The Prince of Wales—Cactus-like Christians—How Christians Thrive—Flower-pot Christians—Only one Year for Work—Work not Money—II. Two Extremes to Avoid—New Plans—Preposterous Undertakings—The Old Rut—The World Converting the Church—The Great Siege Guns Wanted Out—Preaching in the Bank—Hedley Vicars—Havelock in a Heathen Temple—Peter Croy—A License to Preach—III. Unbounded Confidence—The Besiegement will soon be Ended—The Final Triumph.

ESTHER the beautiful was the wife of Ahasuerus the abominable. The time had come for her to present a petition to her infamous husband in behalf of the Jewish nation, to which she had once belonged. She was afraid to undertake the work, lest she should lose her own life; but her uncle, Mordecai, who had brought her up, encouraged her with the suggestion that probably she had been raised up of God for that peculiar mission. "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

Esther had her God-appointed work; you and I have ours. It is my business to tell you what style of men and women you ought to be in order that you may meet the demand of the age in which God has cast your lot. If you have come expecting to hear abstractions discussed, or dry technicalities of religion glorified, you have come to the wrong church, but if you really would like to know what this age has a right to expect of you as Christian men and women, then I am ready, in the Lord's name, to look you in the face.

When two armies have rushed into battle, the officers of either army do not want a philosophical discussion about the chemical properties of human blood, or the nature of gunpowder; they want some one to man the batteries and swab out the guns. And now, when all the forces of light and darkness, of heaven and hell, have plunged into the fight, it is no time to give ourselves to the definitions and formulas and technicalities and conventionalities of religion. What we want is practical, earnest, concentrated, enthusiastic, and triumphant help.

I. In the first place, in order to meet the special demand of this age, you need to be unmistakable

AGGRESSIVE CHRISTIANS.

Of half-and-half Christians we do not want any more. The Church of Jesus Christ will be better without ten thousand of them. They are the chief obstacles to the Church's advancement. I am speaking of another kind of Christian. All the appliances for your becoming an earnest Christian are at your hand, and there is a straight path for you into the broad daylight of God's forgiveness. You may have come into the Church the bondmen of the world, and yet before you go out you may become princes of the Lord God Almighty.

You remember what excitement there was in this country some years ago when the Prince of Wales came here—how the people rushed out by hundreds of thousands to see him. Why? Because they expected that some day he would sit upon the throne of England. But what was all that honor compared with the honor to which God calls you—to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty—yea, to be queens and kings unto God? "They shall reign with Him for ever and for ever."

But, my friends, you need to be aggressive Christians, and not like persons who spend their lives in hugging their Christian graces, and wondering why they do not make any progress. How much robustness of health would a man have if he hid himself in a dark closet? A great deal of the piety of the day is too exclusive. It hides itself. It needs more of fresh air, more out-door exercise. There are many Christians who are giving their entire life to self-examination. They are feeling their pulses to see what is the condition of their spiritual health. How long would a man have robust physical health if he kept all the days, and weeks, and months, and years of his life feeling his pulse, instead of going out into earnest, active, every-day work?

CACTUS-LIKE CHRISTIANS.

I have been among the wonderful and bewitching cactus growths of North Carolina, where I never was more bewildered with the beauty of flowers. Yet, when I would take up one of these cactuses and pull the leaves apart, the beauty was all gone. You could hardly tell that it had been a flower. And there are a great many Christian people in this day just pulling apart their own Christian experiences to see what there is in them, and there is nothing left of them. This style of self-examination is a damage instead of an advantage to their Christian character.

I remember, when I was a boy, I used to have a small piece in the garden that I called my own, and I planted corn there, and every few days I would pull it up to see how fast it was growing. Now, there are a great many Christian people in this day whose self-examination merely amounts to the pulling up of that which they only yesterday or the day before planted. O my friends, if you want to have a stalwart Christian character, plant it right out of doors in the great field of Christian usefulness, and though storms may come upon it, and though the hot sun of trial may try to consume it, it will thrive until it becomes a great tree, in which the fowls of heaven may have a habitation. I have no patience with these

FLOWER-POT CHRISTIANS.

They keep themselves under shelter, and all their Christian experience in a small and exclusive circle, when they ought to plant it in the great garden of the Lord, so that the whole atmosphere would be aromatic with their Christian piety. The century plant is wonderfully suggestive and wonderfully beautiful; but I never look at it without thinking of its parsimony. It lets whole generations go by before it puts forth one blossom; so I have really more heartfelt admiration when I see the dewy tears in the blue eyes of the violets, for they come every spring. My Christian friends, time is going by so rapidly that we cannot afford to be idle.

A recent statistician says that human life now has an average of thirty-two years. From these thirty-two years you must subtract all the time you take for sleep and the taking of food and recreation; that will leave you about sixteen years. From these sixteen years you must subtract all the time that you are necessarily engaged in the earning of a livelihood; that will leave you about eight years. From these eight years you must take all the days and weeks and months—all the length of time that is passed in sickness—leaving you about in which to work for God. O my soul, wake up! How darest thou sleep in harvest-time, and with so few hours in which to reap? So I state it as a simple fact that all the time that the vast majority of you will have for the exclusive service of God will be less than one year.

"But," says some man, "I liberally support the Gospel, and the Gospel is preached; all the spiritual advantages are spread before men, and if they want to be saved let them come to be saved; I have discharged all my responsibility." Ah! is that the Master's spirit? Is there not an old Book somewhere that commands us to "go out into the highways and hedges and compel the people to come in?" What would have become of you and me if Christ had not come down off the hills of heaven, and if he had not come through the door of the Bethlehem caravansary, and if he had not with the crushed hand of the Crucifixion knocked at the iron gate of the sepulchre of our spiritual death, crying, "Lazarus, come forth!"

O my Christian friends, this is no time for inertia, when all the forces of darkness seem to be in full blast, when steam printing-presses are publishing infidel tracts, when express railroad trains are carrying messengers of sin, when fast clippers are laden with opium and rum, when the night air of our cities is polluted with the laughter that breaks up from the ten thousand saloons of dissipation and abandonment.

THE FIRES OF THE SECOND DEATH

already are kindled in the cheeks of some who only a little while ago were incorrupt. Oh, never since the curse fell upon the earth has there been a time when it was such an unwise, such a cruel, such an awful thing for the Church to sleep! The great audiences are not gathered in the Christian temples; the great audiences are gathered in temples of sin—tears of unutterable woe, their baptism; the blood of crushed hearts, the awful wine of their sacrament; blasphemies, their litany; and the groans of the lost world, the organ-dirge of their worship.

II. Again, if you want to be qualified to meet the duties which this age demands of you, you must on the one hand avoid reckless iconoclasm, and on the other hand, not stick too much to things because they are old. The air is full of new projects, new theories of government, new theologies; and I am amazed to see how many Christians want only novelty in order to recommend a thing to their confidence, and so they vacillate, and swing to and fro, and are useless, and they are unhappy. New plans—secular, ethical, philosophical, religious, cisatlantic, transatlantic, long enough to make a line reaching from the German universities to the great Salt Lake City! Ah, my brother, do not take hold of a thing merely because it is new. Try it by the realities of a judgment day.

But, on the other hand, do not adhere to anything merely because it is old. There is not a single enterprise of the Church or the world but has sometimes been scoffed at. There was a time when men derided even Bible societies; and when a few young men met near a hay-stack in Massachusetts and organized the first missionary society ever organized in this country, there went laughter and ridicule all around the Christian Church. They said the undertaking was preposterous.

And so also the ministry of Jesus Christ was assailed. People cried out: "Who ever heard of such theories of ethics and of government? Who ever noticed such a style of preaching as Jesus has?" Ezekiel had talked of mysterious wings and wheels. Here came a man from Antioch and Capernaum, and Gennessaret, and He drew His illustrations from the lakes, from the sand, from the raven, from the lilies, from the corn-stacks. How the Pharisees scoffed! How Herod derided! And this Jesus they plucked by the beard, and they spat in His face, and they called Him "this fellow." All the great enterprises in and out of the Church have at times been scoffed at, and there have been a great multitude who have thought that the chariot of God's truth would fall to pieces if it once got out of

And so there are those who have no patience with anything like improvement in church architecture, or with anything like good, hearty, earnest church singing, and they deride every form of religious discussion which goes down walking with every-day men rather than that which makes an excursion on rhetorical stilts. Oh that the Church of God would wake up to an adaptability of work! We must admit the simple fact that the churches of Jesus Christ in this day do not reach the great masses of mankind.

There are fifty thousand people in Edinburgh who never hear the Gospel. There are two hundred thousand people in Glasgow who never hear the Gospel. There are one million people in London who never hear the Gospel. There are at least three hundred thousand souls in the city of Brooklyn who come not under the immediate ministration of Christ's truth, and the Church of God to this day, instead of being a place full of living epistles, and known of all men, is more like a "dead letter" post-office.

"But," say the people, "the world is going to be converted; you must be patient; the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Christ." Never, unless the Church of Jesus Christ puts on more speed and energy. Instead of the Church converting the world, the world is converting the Church. Here is a great fortress. How shall it be taken? An army comes and sits around about it, cuts off the supplies, and says, "Now we will just wait until, from exhaustion and starvation, they will have to give up." Weeks and months, and perhaps a year, pass along, and finally the fortress surrenders through that starvation and exhaustion.

But, my friends, the fortresses of sin are never to be taken in that way. If they are taken for God, it will be by storm. You will have to bring up to the very wall, and wheel the flying artillery into line, and when the armed infantry of heaven shall confront the battlements, you will have to give the quick command, "Forward, charge!"

Ah, my friends, there is work for you to do and for me to do, in order to do this grand accomplishment. Here is my pulpit and my preaching. Your pulpit is the bank. Your pulpit is the store. Your pulpit is the editorial chair. Your pulpit is the anvil. Your pulpit is the house scaffolding. Your pulpit is the mechanic's shop. I may stand in this place, and through cowardice or through self-seeking may keep back the word I ought to utter, while you, with sleeve rolled up and brow be sweated with toil, may utter the word that will stir the foundations of heaven with the shout of a great victory.

Oh that this whole audience might feel that the Lord Almighty was putting upon them the hands of ordination! I tell you, every one, go forth and preach this Gospel. You have as much right to preach as I have, or as any man has. Only find out the pulpit where God would have you preach, and there preach. Hedley Vicars was a wicked man in the English army. The grace of God came to him. He became an earnest and eminent Christian. They scoffed at him and said, "You are a hypocrite; you are as bad as ever you were." Still he kept his faith in Christ, and after a while, finding that they could not turn him aside by calling him a hypocrite, they said to him, "Oh, you are nothing but a Methodist." That did not disturb him. He went on performing his Christian duty until he had formed all his troop into a Bible-class, and the whole encampment was shaken with the presence of God.

So Havelock went into the heathen temple in India, while the English army was there, and put a candle into the hands of each of the heathen gods that stood around in the heathen temple, and by the light of those candles held up by the idols, General Havelock preached righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. And who will say, on earth or in heaven, that Havelock had not the right to preach?

In the minister's house where I prepared for college there was a man who worked by the name of Peter Croy. He could neither read nor write, but he was a man of God. Often theologians would stop in the house—grave theologians—and at family prayer Peter Croy would be called upon to lead; and all those wise men sat around, wonder-struck at his religious efficiency. When he prayed he reached up and seemed to take hold of the very throne of the Almighty, and he talked with God until the very heavens were bowed down into the sitting-room.

Oh, if I were dying, I would rather have plain Peter Croy kneel by my bedside and commend my immortal spirit to God than the greatest archbishop arrayed in costly canonicals! Go preach this Gospel. You say you are not licensed. In the name of the Lord Almighty, I license you. Go preach this Gospel—preach it in the Sabbath-schools, in the prayer-meetings, in the highways, in the hedges. Woe be unto you if you preach it not!

III. I remark again that in order to be qualified to meet your duty in this particular age, you want in the triumph of the truth and in the overthrow of wickedness. How dare the Christian Church ever get discouraged? Have we not the Lord on our side? How long did it take God to slay the hosts of Sennacherib, or burn Sodom, or shake down Jericho? How long will it take God, when He once arises in His strength, to overthrow all the forces of iniquity? Between this time and that there may be long seasons of darkness, the chariot wheels of God's Gospel may seem to drag heavily; but there is the promise, and yonder is the throne, and when omniscience has lost its eyesight, and omnipotence falls back impotent, and Jehovah is driven from His throne, then the Church of Jesus Christ can afford to be despondent, but never until then.

Despots may plan, and armies may march, and the congresses of the nations may seem to think they are adjusting all the affairs of the world, but the Bismarcks and the Popes of the earth are only the dust of the chariot-wheels of God's providence. And I think that before the sun of this century shall have set the last tyranny will fall, and with a splendor of demonstration that shall be the astonishment of the universe, God will set forth the brightness, and pomp, and glory, and perpetuity of His eternal government. Out of the starry flags and the emblazoned insignia of this world God will make a path for His own triumph, and returning from universal conquest, He will sit down, the grandest, strongest, highest throne of earth His footstool.

I preach this sermon because I want to encourage all Christian workers in every possible department. Hosts of the living God, march on! march on! His spirit will bless you. His shield will defend you. His sword will strike for you. March on! march on! The despotisms will fall, and paganism will burn its idols, and Mohammedanism will give up its false prophet, and Judaism will confess the true Messiah, and the great walls of superstition will come down in thunder and in wreck at the long, loud blast of the Gospel trumpet. March on! march on!

THE BESIEGEMENT WILL SOON BE ENDED.

Only a few more steps on the long way; only a few more sturdy blows; only a few more battle-cries—and then God will put the laurel upon your brow, and from the living fountains of heaven will bathe off the sweat and the heat and the dust of the conflict. March on! march on! For you the time for work will soon be passed, and amid the outflashings of the judgment throne, and the trumpeting of the resurrection angels, and the upheaving of a world of graves, and the hosanna and the groaning of the saved and the lost, we shall be rewarded for our faithfulness or punished for our stupidity. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole world be filled with His glory!

THE DEATH AND FUNERAL OF DR. TALMAGE'S ELDEST SON.

THE most crushing blow, next to the loss of his wife, that can overtake a man, has fallen upon Dr. Talmage. His eldest son, named after himself, Thomas De Witt Talmage, who had finished his education, and had just entered upon a professional career, died suddenly of pneumonia, on Thursday night, January 6th.

Mr. Talmage had been for some time in delicate health, but no serious apprehensions had been entertained of a fatal termination to his sickness. About two months ago he was suffering from a severe attack of muscular rheumatism, and at his father's suggestion he made a trip to the South. After a week's sojourn in Charleston, S. C., he returned greatly improved in health, and resumed his duties as a member of the legal profession, which had been temporarily interrupted by his illness. On Tuesday, January 4th, he argued a case in the law courts, but on his return home he complained of a severe cold, and soon afterward was compelled to take to his bed and summon medical assistance. His physician, who visited him on Thursday, said he was much better, and in all probability he would be about within a very few days. He failed rapidly, however, and at half-past ten o'clock that night he passed peacefully away. It was not until a few minutes before his death that his relatives became alarmed about his condition.

T. De Witt Talmage, Jr., was a native of Syracuse, N. Y., where he was born in 1858, while his father was pursuing a successful ministry in that city. He came to Brooklyn with Dr. Talmage, and studied here under Professor Davidson. He subsequently entered the United States navy, spending a year and a half in the service. After leaving the navy he studied in the Polytechnic Institute, and subsequently entered the Columbia Law School, from which institution he was graduated last June. He was admitted to the bar, and entered upon the practice of his profession in Brooklyn. He met with extraordinary success for a young man. He was enthusiastic in his work, and within a few months was intrusted with numerous cases. The members of the bar who knew him well and the judges regarded him as a young man of great promise, and predicted for him a brilliant future. Socially he was an agreeable companion and a warm and earnest friend. He had an extended circle of acquaintance, and all who knew him liked him.

A funeral service was held in the Tabernacle on Sunday afternoon, when the building was crowded to its utmost capacity, large numbers being unable to gain admission. In the centre of the open space before the platform, upon stands draped with black, stood a column of roses, camellias, lilies, tube-roses, and ferns, five feet high, surmounted by a dove with outstretched wings, and a lyre of similar flowers, bearing in immortelles across its face the legend: "Asleep."

The casket of black velvet, ornamented with silver bars and plate, was borne down the aisle and placed upon draped stools, and the family and intimate friends, followed, and filled seats reserved for them in the centre of the church, while Mr. George W. Morgan played the "Dead March from Saul" on the great organ. The casket lid was covered with flowers.

The Rev. Dr. Spear conducted the service. Seven ministers occupied chairs upon the platform.

Among the ministers on the platform was the Rev. Mr. Suydam, of Philadelphia, a classmate of Dr. Talmage's, who in the name of "a host of old friends" tendered heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved father and mother. He had known young Mr. Talmage as a boy, and spoke of the intelligence, the ready wit and the respectful demeanor that characterized him then. He had expected the boy's career would have been a very brilliant one. Looking at the casket before him he said, "To what purpose is this waste? No, it is not waste. From this casket comes a voice to us all, and even to this bereaved man of God, calling upon him to preach yet more earnestly and labor more energetically in the Master's service."

A tribute to the memory of the dead youth, written by United States District-Attorney Tenney, was read by the Rev. Mr. Easton. The writer had known Mr. Talmage from the time when he made choice of the legal profession, and testified not only to his brilliant abilities, but to the sweetness and excellency of his character. Mr. Tenney said that the young man had told him early in their acquaintance that he was animated by an intense desire to prove to his father that he could be not only an able lawyer but an upright man. In all the course of their daily interviews, Mr. Tenney said, he had never heard an unkind or uncharitable word, much less a profane or unclean word proceed from the young man's lips. "I mourn for him," wrote Mr. Tenney, "as for a beloved son."

After Dr. Spear had pronounced the benediction the lid of the casket was removed, and the congregation were allowed to walk past and take a last look at the face of the dead.

"We Cannot Spare you Yet," said Luther, when Melancthon lay upon what he believed to be his dying bed. And kneeling down, the great impetuous soul prayed: "O Lord our God, we beg, we implore, we cast all our burdens on thee; we will cry till thou hearest, pleading all the promises that can be found in the Holy Book. Thou must hear us, to preserve in us, for all occasions to come, our entire faith in thy word." "Oh, Luther," sighed Melancthon, "why can you not let me depart in peace?" "No, Philip, we cannot spare you yet," cried Luther; "cheer up; you shall not die," and proceeding to act as well as pray, the great Reformer gave directions to the nurse to go and make a certain kind of soup, and when this was brought to him, he fed the sick man with a spoon. Melancthon began to grow better as soon as he had swallowed the soup. He recovered, and outlived Luther many years.

JOHN SNOW'S WIFE.

CHAPTER II.

LET no one, however, misunderstand me, and think that in John Snow's wife I am trying to set forth a perfect woman. She would have been the first to deny that. She had her dark and bitter moments, like most people in similar circumstances. At times, when quite alone, the children in bed, and in the midst of her weary waiting for John, a great rush of pain and misery would sweep over her, and for a season stun her.

At such times not a particle of light was visible; all dark, dark, dark. It was of no use trying to work then. No other course was open to her but to stay her hand and be still. And as in a thunderstorm the great black clouds first gather, and then the heavy drops fall, so was it with her at these periods in her history. Abandoning herself to her great grief, she could only stop through sheer physical exhaustion. More than once has she sobbed herself to sleep; and touching would the sight have been to any other eyes than those of her besotted husband, this weary woman in her restless, troubled sleep, her head upon the table, the mark of the tears still upon her flushed cheeks, and her work lying beside her as it was hastily dropped when the darkness first came.

These despairing moods were not frequent, however. Usually she mastered them before they fully formed. It was only when she neglected the first beginnings, and tried to beat them down in her own strength, that they so distressed her. Her usual course was to cast herself upon her Saviour's power, and to trust Him to ward off the coming storm; and according to the measure of her faith, so was it ever with her. But if ever, through any cause, she lost sight of Him, or her hold relaxed, immediately the storm rolled up and burst. Then it was that all seemed a desolation and a blank. Then the agony crept into her spirit, and robbed it of all its brightness. Then sinking lower and lower, she almost wished that she might die. But she never stayed long in the darkness, for as soon as she was able to think she called in all her energies, and cast herself afresh on Jesus.

And then the light came back again. How lightly she would move about then! How softly she would speak! You might almost trace, by the tones of her voice, the hush which was upon her spirit. Nobody, to see her then, would have thought her a drunkard's wife, and that John seemed as far off as ever from reformation.

Mrs. Snow's neighbors at such times would feel quite sure that she had won her John back again at last. And when one or two asked her how it was she could look so cheerful in spite of all her troubles, she would answer without any hesitation, "Because I'm looking straight at Jesus, and Jesus is looking straight at me."

Many a time has she brought tears into their eyes by her expressions of simple confidence in the love and power of her Saviour; and if ever their hearts ached with a sense of something wanting within, it was at such times as these; for trouble never sat so lightly on them as on John Snow's wife, though theirs was but a feather's weight in comparison.

It was a Friday morning. John Snow's wife remembered it well. That Friday morning was graven as with an iron tool upon her soul, for through the dark thunder-clouds which had rolled over her so long a gleam of sunshine shot.

John Snow had just completed his breakfast, and, with trembling hand, was about to place his hat upon his burning head, when, stepping up timidly to his wife, he said, "I'll try to be different, Jane, my dear;" and having said this, and kissed her, went out. It was not much, but it was something. And the patient wife, whose prayers had been going upward more busily than ever that morning, and especially when John was eating his breakfast, felt a great measure of comfort from it. And all that morning she went about with sunshine in her heart, and praises upon her lips; and the prayers she offered up for John were almost past counting.

At one o'clock John came home to dinner, and, to her great delight, she found that whatever he had been doing, he had not been drinking. Silently he eat his dinner, and silently she consumed hers. Again he went out, stepping up to his wife, and kissing her, with the very same words: "I'll try to be different, Jane, my dear."

And then the evening came. John Snow's wife was sitting at her sewing machine, making a dress for one of her customers. The machine made such a rattle that she did not hear her husband's footstep upon the stairs and in the room. Silently he stood there for some five minutes watching her, and busy with his thoughts. At length there came such a deep sigh from behind her chair that his presence could be concealed no longer.

Quickly turning round, she saw him, and gave him such a loving, wifely look, that he sighed more deeply than ever; almost sobbed, in fact. He sat down beside her. She pretended not to see his tears, and went on with her work until he should somewhat recover himself. If truth could be told, she needed recovering quite as much as he did; and the next morning's work plainly betrayed her feelings, for she had to undo, in a great measure, what she had done wrong then.

"Jane, my dear, I think I'm different now," were John's first words. And after her fervent "Thank God," half a dozen times repeated, he told his story: "I don't know how it is, but I've been feeling all over tender like lately. I feel as though I've been melting. I tried to throw it off for a time, But I couldn't do it anyhow. It only got worse. And so I let myself melt.

"And then the beer began to look different like, and I seemed to see faces in it—yours and the children's and sometimes they were weeping, and always sad. And my mind began to think for the first time for months. I couldn't help thinking of what you've been suffering through me, and how you've been working. And, Jane, I've been thinking how kind and good you've been to me, always saying loving things. I sometimes think if you'd scolded me, and treated me unkindly, I shouldn't have woke up like this. And Jane," he added, "I wish you'd make me like you."

Here he ended. And his wife, tender-hearted little woman that she was, quite broke down and cried; looking quite happy though, for all that, through her tears.

And then there came a little scene, which, if it were repeated over and over again throughout the whole world, would leave husbands and wives much the better for it—John Snow sitting at his wife's feet and learning to be better.

The first thing she insisted on, like a wise woman, was, that he should never again touch strong drink. To this John replied, "I have already made up my mind to that, my dear. I've signed the pledge." After this she took his hand in hers and drew him down on his knees beside her, and in a few quiet simple words thanked God for His great goodness.

"You know, John," she said, "you've been prayed into a sober man. It's all His doing, and nobody's else."

After this they had a long close talk about a matter which affected the future more than John Snow had thought.

"You see, John, if you try to be a sober man in your own strength, I'm afraid you'll break down."

"I'm afraid I shall," he replied.

"And then there's all the past drunkenness to be forgiven! What a lot of sins you must have run up by this time, John!"

"Yes, an awful lot, I'm sure."

And then that good little woman went on to tell him how he might be forgiven, and how he might be made strong in strength not his own.

And never did the name of Jesus flow from more reverent lips, or fall upon more thirsty ears, than in that humble little room, beside that silent sewing machine.

"You know," she said, "Jesus died for all your drunkenness, and your selfishness, and your anger, and your cruelty, and every other sin; and you have only just to trust in Him, and take Him for your Saviour; that's all."

"And will that make me like you, Jane?"

"More than like me, John; like the blessed Lord in time."

All that John Snow could say was an astonished "Oh!"

After a few minutes' silence said John, "I think I'll believe all that, Jane."

And then there came another quiet thanksgiving from the lips of John himself, and a rushing of angels' wings, as they mounted upward to tell in the courts of heaven the story of John Snow the milkman and his living repentance.

A few words in conclusion.

John Snow kept sober to the end of his days, and, before long, might be heard uttering his "Milk O's" as musically as ever. He was never known again to desert his milk-cans for the public house.

And John Snow's wife—God bless her!—became as proud of her husband as he was of her, and, as she walked past the old familiar spots, might have been heard whispering brightly to herself, "Didn't I say the real John was only covered over for a time? My John's himself again now, I thank God."

And many a drunkard's wife has called down blessings on her head for showing them how to deal with a drunken husband; and, as they too have won back their drunken husbands, have passed on their experience to others, and with one voice said, "You can't do better than copy John Snow's wife."

WHO WILL BE TAKEN UP WHEN THE LORD COMES?

By Dr. Henry Meynott.

Increased Interest in Prophecy—Satan's Wiles—Unwelcome Truths Received—Mistakes as to the Resurrection—How Unwatchfulness is Encouraged—Clinging to the Coast—Importance of Details—The Translation of the First-Fruits—Those who will be Left.

WHEN this question is taken beyond the range of speculation and curiosity, and duly estimated in all its bearings, it will be found to be of great practical importance and intense interest to the true-hearted child of God.

In the endeavor to obtain a clear view of it, many circumstances require to be taken into account. As the times of the Gentiles are closing, the Holy Ghost is manifestly awakening the Church from the slumbering condition into which it has been brought through its unhallowed alliances and compromises with the world. He is likewise endeavoring to place the members of the Church in that position of watchfulness for the return of the Lord with which so many privileged blessings are connected.

We thus find that of late years the "sure word of prophecy," that "burning and shining light," shining in a "dark place," has become increasingly attractive to many of the Lord's people, and during the prayerful investigation of the wonderful parabolic mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, from the knowledge of which the world is shut out (Matt. 13: 11), fresh light is being continually added. But in the study of this branch of the tree of knowledge, as in that of every other, Satan has been successful in mixing the tares of human wisdom with the wheat of Divine light.

All preconceived notions that are not in full accordance with Scripture, all natural tastes and inclinations how refined and importunate soever they may be, all æsthetic proclivities, all bowing down to the idols of human intellect, all cleaving to Church traditions, whether from choice or moral coercion, must be set aside without restriction, and a tabula rasa must be made and prepared by strict self-discipline, to receive upon it the impression of the only safe rule and infallible guide. "What saith the Scripture?", "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them" (Isa. 8: 20).

Unless these rules be adhered to, we shall of necessity fall back upon "self" in some form or other, and, under the influence, it may be, of natural affection, resist any as somewhat too stringent and unnecessary, and then, perhaps, find ourselves in principle in the position of Peter, when he said, "Be it far from thee, Lord," and when he received the withering rebuke, "Get thee behind me, Satan," the quick eye of the Lord having at once detected the wiles of the wicked one acting on the natural affection of Peter.

Some say they do not like to believe that only watchful Christians will be taken up when the Lord comes, but it is not what we like that should influence us in gathering up the choice truths that are so profusely placed in our path; and in selecting them, and separating them from the equally profuse snares that the enemy has mixed up with them, we have Divine wisdom to assist us ready at hand (James 1 : 5). In searching after truth we shall be much hampered unless we can get out of the deep ruts of opinions long since formed and taken for granted, it may be from natural inclination, or from undue deference to human tradition and teaching.

If, as we hold, that interpretation of prophecy should prove to be correct which entertains the idea that when the Lord comes "one shall be taken and another left" (Luke 17 : 34), and that the one that is left is an unwatchful, Lot-like Christian, then any undue anxiety about any one dear to us being left to pass through "the great tribulation," while we ourselves are "counted worthy to escape," because of our obedient, prayerful watchfulness (Luke 21 : 36), would open us to another rebuke of the Lord to Peter, "What is that to thee, follow thou Me" (John 21 : 22).

Another reason why the idea of an eclectic rapture of the Church is distasteful is, that the opposite popular opinion requires

LESS SEPARATION FROM THE WORLD.

To suppose that the whole number of the Lord's children will be simultaneously gathered into the garner, especially in the present state of the Church, would greatly tend to keep the Lord's chosen people from the watch-tower, and retain their minds in a dim obscurity by the consequent neglect of the assistance offered in the "light shining in a dark place" (2 Peter 1 : 19).

Such a contracted view of unfulfilled prophecy, and consequent shutting out of the numerous details that are "written for our instruction" (2 Tim. 3 : 16), obtains in some degree with those who exclusively adopt what is called the year-day theory, which complacently leaves out of consideration the various incidents which are prophesied to take place during the running out of the great tribulation, and confounds in one dogma the ecclesiastical and infidel Antichrist.

Here, as in all other cases, it is useful, if not indispensable, to draw an outline, but in doing so we must not keep too close to the shores of truth, or we may rest satisfied with that simple, grand outline, "Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at His coming, then cometh the end," without heeding any of the details, which are equally "written for our instruction." It needs indeed a strong and fixed look to Jesus with the eye of faith to be able to press forward from the shelving shores and tread the deep waters of Divine truth, but His hand is ever ready to hold us up.

It is this too great generalization of God's purposes as revealed in His Word, and neglect of that causes so much shutting up of the Word. Many valuable portions are regarded as inexplicable at the present time, and only to be revealed at some future period. It is an old and successful device of Satan. It was carried out in the days of Josiah the youthful king of Judah, when Hilkiah the high-priest found the book of the law which had been practically lost (2 Kings 22 : 8-13). It is a system that is a powerful help to priestcraft. It puts an extinguisher on the lights "shining in a dark place," and keeps the soul in obscurity and spiritual slothfulness, and causes it to rest satisfied with compromising with the world.

Multitudes are under the impression that the world is to be converted by the preaching of the Gospel during the "times of the Gentiles," and are willingly ignorant (the worst kind of ignorance) that the designed end of the Gospel is to gather out from the world a people for the Lord. There is a vague idea prevailing that when what is popularly called "the end of the world" comes there will be one simultaneous resurrection of the dead, and one general day of judgment.

In order to obviate such misleading views the mystical union of Christ and the Church should be steadily kept in sight. Before this union is ultimately completed a long and painful process of preparation is needed. As in the natural body, so in the mystical body, all the members are fashioned in continuance (Psalm 139 : 16). Even the head, though faultless throughout, was not perfected till the appointed amount of suffering was passed through (Luke 13 : 32; Heb. 2 : 10 and 5 : 9). The body, still in formation, is awaiting its union in glory with its already glorified head (John 12 : 28 and 17 : 5). Such is the present Scriptural position of the Church. The devout soul cries out, "What wait I for?" (Psalm 39 : 7). Waiting for the summons to the judgment-seat of Christ; there to receive its reward and to have its place assigned.

But this great work is now, and will be, till completed, a gradual progress. The completion of it is necessarily in connection with its resurrection. As one star differs from another star in glory, so also will the glorified members of Christ's mystical body. Scripture is full of comparisons to teach us every particular. The wave-offering (Lev. 23 : 10, 11) is replete with typical instruction. Not only is Christ declared to be the antitype of the wave-sheaf, but they likewise are who are referred to in James 1 : 18, and Rev. 14 : 4. In the harvest of corn were gathered in and waved before the rest of the grain. So we may learn that it will be when the Church is gathered into the garner. Mark, especially in Revelation 5 : 9 and 7 : 9, the difference between the two groups. They are both in resurrection, and are both culled from the same source —viz., "every kindred, and tongue, and people." The one group crowned and reigning (Rev. 4 : 10), and the other with palms of victory, having triumphed in the great tribulation through the blood of the Lamb, but uncrowned and serving (Rev. 7 : 14-15).

One of the reasons for believing that only watchful Christians will be caught up to meet Christ in the air at the first-fruits translation before the final three and a half years' tribulation is that in Rev. 14 : 1-5 those first-fruits are distinctly stated to be only 144,000, whereas the harvest, consisting of Christians caught up in the second translation, after the three and a half years, are stated to be "a great multitude which no man can number" (Rev. 14 : 15; 7 : 9-12). This coincides with the man-child caught up before the three and a half years and the woman left to go through those three and a half years, in Rev. 12.

Only watchful Christians are clearly implied to escape and be kept out of the final tribulation of three and a half years in Luke 21 : 36, "Watch and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things that shall come upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of Man," and in Rev. 3 : 10, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the season of temptation, that shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." In the parable of the Ten Virgins the wise virgins are watchful Christians; the foolish virgins are unwatchful Christians.

Careful and prayerful attention should be given to the similitude of the Church in glory to the Bride of the Lamb, as depicted in Psalm 45. The comparison is full of variety. We have the queen in gold of ophir, the king's daughter, all glorious within, and the virgins, her companions and followers, all brought to the king. The same variety in unity is also shown in the figurative language of the Canticles 6 : 8. As "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy," so it may be said, with equal or greater truth, that there are more things hidden in the Bible, but open to our research, than are dreamed of in the philosophy of many Christians.

WHAT CAME OF A DINNER PARTY.

COULD anything be pleasanter? Everybody at the party knew everybody else. They were old neighbors and friends. The hospitable lawyer whose guests they were was a fine specimen of the genial and well-bred host. There was no excess. The feast of reason and the flow of soul were all that could be desired. Cheerful and good-natured talk melted down hours to minutes, and made the occupants of that elegant apartment as oblivious of the flight of time as of the storm that raved outside. Who could have said that there was anything fraught with peril in enjoyment so innocent and so delightful? Yet from that party there followed consequences which would have blanched every cheek and banished every smile, even on that festive evening, if the future could have been foreseen.

Perhaps the most brilliant of the guests was an artist who had just achieved distinction at the Royal Academy, the summit of an English artist's ambition, and whose conversational powers were as great as his artistic gifts. It was often said of him that no matter what the subject might be he could throw himself into it with a zest and intelligence which astonished even those most familiar with all its aspects. His was a mind keenly alive to every form and variety of beauty. The beautiful —whether in nature, in art, in thought, in manners, or in character—was the object of his idolatry. He held that the good and the beautiful are one.

With a sensitive and highly-wrought mental and spiritual constitution like his, it will be readily understood that brilliant society had uncommon attractions for him. He knew that he was a welcome and honored guest in such company, and it was not his nature to do anything by halves.

For some time before accepting the invitation to Mr. Morrison's party he had held himself in check, abstaining from everything in which he found himself unable to indulge with moderation. Without knowing anything of organized teetotalism, he had felt the necessity of giving up wine. He had observed how, little by little, the habit of increasing his daily quantum had gained upon him, and how, notwithstanding all his contempt for the slaves of appetite, he had himself on more than one occasion overstepped the bounds of prudence in that respect. Here, at the house of his friend, when every one took wine, he felt he must for once give up his resolution, and not "give himself the airs of asceticism." He observed the strictest moderation that evening, and found it so easy to leave off at the right time that he began to suspect that his fears had been the creation of a morbid brain.

Alas! alas! experience soon proved that according to his fear had been his danger. The very next evening he accepted another invitation, and after the ladies had withdrawn, remained with a few friends, and in their company once more gave way to excess. He had been talking only that very evening of the weakness and unmanliness of those who cannot control their appetites, little thinking in how short a time he himself would be acting the part of the Helot of Ancient Greece—exhibiting to all beholders an example of the deep degradation of drunkenness.

Nor did the evil stop here. He went from bad to worse, until at length he grovelled in the mire of vice, losing even the perception of nobler things, and caring for nothing beyond the round of sensual pleasures. He became one of those moral wrecks with which the coast of life is strewn, and all because it was part of the conventional respectability of the circle in which he moved to drink wine. The story needs no application. Its lesson he who runs may read. It is a lesson which is taught by daily and hourly experience in every walk of life, and which bids all who care for the moral and spiritual welfare of others beware how they encourage social customs which beyond all others tend to blast and destroy both body and soul.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Reassembled after the Recess on Wednesday, January 5th. The House of Representatives promptly took up the Army Appropriation Bill, which, being free from the political riders so hotly contested in former sessions, was passed in three hours. The Inter-State Commerce Bill followed, and Mr. Reagan explained his scheme, the object of which we described last week. The subject of reapportionment also came up on a question as to the proper committee to consider it. A Reapportionment Bill, which will probably occasion considerable wrangling, was introduced by Mr. Springer. It proposes to increase the number of Representatives in the House, and also, among other important changes, to provide for minority representation by restricting the number of votes each voter may give at an election. In cases where three Representatives are to be elected, the voter may vote only for two, and where five are to be elected he may vote only for three. A similar plan is in operation in some English constituencies, but in many cases it has been found ineffectual.

The Refunding Question Formed the Subject of discussion in the House on Thursday and Saturday, and it was shown how wide is the divergence of views held by prominent members on this important question. Fernando Wood insists that a three per cent bond would be negotiable, while Mr. Frye, of Maine, has changed his opinion, and believes that such a bond would not be sold at full value unless of a longer date than the House would sanction. An amendment giving the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion in the matter up to four per cent, only found twelve supporters, 149 voting against it, It was elicited in the course of discussion that the rate the bonds now actually pay is about three and a quarter per cent. The nominal rate is higher, but as they cannot be purchased at their face value, the nominal rate is not realized.

The Attempt to Fix the Responsibility for the disastrous removal of the Poncas still occupies the attention of the friends of the Indians. A writer who has taken an active part in the dispute publishes an article in a contemporary, which distinctly charges Secretary Schurz with the crime. The Secretary in his reply admits that the removal took place with his consent and approval, but claims that the scheme originated with the previous administration, which also took the initiatory steps, and pleads that the removal occurred before he became familiar with the business details of his department, and before he became aware that the consent of the Poncas to the transfer had been fraudulently obtained. We may hope that as there is now a general admission that this Indian tribe was grievously wronged by the change, there may be no further blunders in dealing with them in the future, and that all the reparation possible may be made for the past.

The First Week of the New Year has been characterized by a series of tragedies and disasters such as rarely occur within so short a space of time. Murders, wrecks, and fatal fires, attended with serious loss of life, have made the week a memorable one, and have attracted renewed attention to the predictions which have been made as to the probable calamitous events of the year. At home and abroad a feeling of uneasiness and apprehension prevails, and in many homes sorrow for personal loss and sudden bereavement is added to the general depression.

The Irish Catholic Colony in Minnesota is reported to be undergoing extreme suffering. The colony consists of fifty families, who were brought from Connemara, Ireland, last summer, and established in Minnesota, where houses had been built for them. It was too late to plant seed on their land, but they had good opportunities to earn money in the harvest season, when their labor was needed. This they refused to do, claiming that the bishop who arranged for their immigration was obliged to support them till they could raise their own crops. They are now in great poverty, owing either to a misunderstanding of the arrangements or to an unwillingness on the part of their friends to encourage their lack of energy and thrift.

The Agitation Fostered by the Sand Lots party in California has acted prejudicially on the prosperity of the State. It is now almost the only State which is not sharing in the tide of commercial prosperity. The San Francisco Alta computes that the banking capital of the city has decreased $33,000,000, the improvement of property has been checked, and depositors in savings banks have decreased, the loans of the banks have been less than the repayment by borrowers, no new railroad is building, and home capitalists are transferring their business to other States, owing to the feeling of insecurity produced by Kearneyism.

The Vicious Haunts of New York, which flourish in spite of the municipal government, are frequently the subject of remark by visitors to the city, who are surprised at their existence in defiance of law. Some explanation of the circumstance is furnished in the fourth annual report of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, which has just been issued, and which contains a prefatory address to the citizens of New York. In this address it is stated that the chief obstacles in the way of the Society's work are the "general apathy of the public, the weakness of the law processes in regard to the sufficiency of evidence, the crowded condition of the District-Attorney's department, the light character of the sentences, and the abuse of the hotel license by the Board of Excise." Murders are committed in these resorts with alarming frequency, and their very existence is a reproach to the city, yet the Society is able to allege as one of the causes responsible for the iniquity, "the general apathy of the public."

A Whole Village Buried in Snow is Reported as existing in the Virginia mountains. On Thursday night a citizen of Berryville, Clarke Co., Va., discovered a man lying insensible in the snow on the outskirts of the village. He presented a very emaciated appearance, and when he had recovered consciousness under the care of his rescuers he told a deplorable narrative. It appeared that he was an emissary from Paris, a small town on the Blue Ridge Mountains, and had been sent to beg for help by the inhabitants. On Thursday, December 23d, he awoke to find his house enveloped up to the eaves in snow. He endeavored to tunnel through it, but after several hours' work gave up the attempt in despair. He then climbed up the chimney to the roof, and from there he saw a wide expanse of snow, with only the chimneys of the cottages visible. He succeeded in cutting a path through an upper window, and went to a house in a less exposed position and obtained assistance to rescue his wife and child.

The snow continued falling, and on the following Sunday a meeting was held to decide on some scheme to preserve life. All the food and fuel in the village was collected; the inhabitants were required to live together in eighteen houses in order to economize fuel, and the store of food was placed under the control of a committee, who were empowered to regulate its consumption. The man found at Berryville was then sent to request assistance. The citizens of Berryville organized an expedition of rescue, and a party, of which a clergyman and a physician were members, started in a sleigh the same day, carrying provisions and medicines to the entombed villagers. It is feared that many lives are already lost.

A Thief was Found Dying in the Midst of his plunder on January 4th, in an unfinished house in Brooklyn. He had effected an entrance into a dwelling, and had stolen a quantity of jewelry, fur-lined garments, and other valuables, and had then, to avoid capture, climbed to the roof. From there he walked along the roofs of other houses searching for an open scuttle. In crossing one of the roofs he fell through an opening left by the workmen to facilitate building operations, which is called the well. There was nothing to check the burglar's descent, and he fell to the ground floor, sustaining fatal injuries. The workmen found him the next morning in a death agony, the valuables for which he had endangered his life lying scattered around him. A striking illustration of the inspired warning (Ps. 94 : 23).

A Fire in which Thirteen Persons Lost their lives broke out in the Poor-House at Dover, N. H., on January 7th. It was discovered early in the morning, and an alarm was immediately sent out, but the engines were delayed by the deep snow, and owing to the drought sufficient water to extinguish the fire could not be obtained. There were one hundred and sixty-nine persons in the building, many of whom were locked in their rooms. The work of rescue was one of extreme difficulty, as the smoke had filled the house when the fire was discovered. The aged and sick had to be carried to places of shelter which were offered by neighbors, who also gave the poor people clothing and food. Thirteen of the inmates could not be found, and are believed to have perished in the flames.

Four Men were Killed in the Fermenting tub of a brewery in New York on January 6th. They had entered it to apply some varnish to the sides of the vat, and after working for about an hour, an explosion followed by shrieks was heard. The four men were dragged out of the vat and sent to Bellevue Hospital, but they were so seriously injured that all died in excruciating agony. It is supposed that the fumes of the alcohol were ignited by a lamp the workmen were using.

Another fatal accident occurred on the same day at the Refining and Smelting Works of Newark, N. J. Two large boilers exploded simultaneously, from some cause hitherto unexplained, killing four men instantly, and seriously injuring three others. The houses near the works were wrecked by the explosion, and a brick, shot through the window of one of them, struck a young lady as she lay in bed, inflicting alarming, if not fatal injuries.

The Device of an Undertaker Occasioned false hopes in a family in Baltimore recently. The rosy hue and life-like appearance of a dead child was remarked, and the parents refused to believe that life was extinct, and even when several physicians united in the most positive assertion that the child was dead, the remains were not removed from a vault, and the coffin was left open under the charge of watchers. The explanation has since been made that the undertaker had produced an artificial bloom by the use of sulphuric acid and other agents, and had thus excited hopes which rent the hearts of the mourners with a second pang. Such a device is a silly mockery. There is by the side of the bier only one solid comfort—that which Jesus gave to Martha (John 11 : 25).

The Lives Lost when the Alpena went down on Lake Michigan appear to have been sacrificed by culpable negligence. The coroner's jury which sat at Grand Haven to investigate the case, has found a verdict which says the vessel was rotten and unseaworthy, the life-preservers were in bad condition and unfit for use, and the life-boats, judging by the one that came to shore, were of no use in a storm. It harrows the heart to think of what those shipwrecked people may have suffered as they lost hope of the vessel and then found the life-boats a deceptive refuge, and finally their last resource of the life-preservers also vain. Many people who, in life's voyage, are relying on self-righteousness or deathbed repentance, or, at the worst, on ultimate pardon even after death, and who neglect the only sure way of salvation, will, the Bible assures us, go to a doom worse than that of the passengers of the Alpena (Acts 4 : 12).

A Young Man who Attempted Suicide in a New York hotel on January 4, wrote a letter before he fired the shot he expected would prove fatal. The letter contained expressions which show that where there is no knowledge of eternal truth the discovery of the emptiness of life may become intolerable. He wrote: "Life has been one awful deception to me, and I can stand it no longer. When I think of what I am capable of doing, I shudder at my mad career. I have a great many friends and relatives in this State, but I have deceived them all. My brain reels, and I can write no more." Happily the young man's career was not closed by his wicked act. He may yet live to find that there is a refuge for the weary and disappointed which never deceives, and may trust in Him of whom it is said, "He is faithful that promised" (Heb. 10 : 23).

A Petrified Woman is said to have been found at Cascade Lake in Nevada. The Carson (Nev.) Appeal narrates the circumstances. It appears that Alonzo Zaletto, an Italian fisherman, was going out to fish a few days ago, and when pushing off, his boat struck against something which attracted his attention. He investigated the matter, and found a petrified hand protruding from the sand and pebbles on the beach. In a short time he had unearthed a woman in a complete state of petrification. The body was in perfect condition, and appeared to have been that of an Indian squaw. A tradition exists that an Indian battle took place on the shores of the lake, and that the squaws joined in the affray, and the dead were buried on the sand. In certain conditions a dead body exposed to the action of sand and water becomes a mass of stone, but discoveries of such cases are rare. Earnest preachers who preach and agonize in prayer for the salvation of men have often occasion to grieve over the obduracy of those whom they seek to rescue, who appear to be so insensible to their appeals as to suggest the thought that petrification of the soul is not a rare process in this world. But even in such cases we are encouraged by a promise to hope and pray. (Ezekiel 36 : 26.)

A Fight Between a Bear and a Panther, Described by the Monticello, N. Y., correspondent of the New York Times shows how great a change will be worked on the natures of beasts before the prophecy (Isaiah 11 : 6–9) of millennial peace will be fulfilled. A man named Stewart, an aged hunter well known in the locality, in narrating his adventures said that one day in the fall as he was on his way to his cabin he saw a huge bear emerge from a cave with a panther's kitten in its paws. He concealed himself and watched the bear kill the young panther and then re-enter the cave and return with another panther which it also killed. The dying cry of the second aroused the mother and brought her promptly to the spot. Then ensued a fierce struggle in which the bear was torn to pieces by the panther, which apparently was aware that the bear was responsible for the death of its offspring.

The Grand Spectacle at Present Visible at Niagara Falls has attracted crowds of visitors from all parts of the State as well as from Canada. A newspaper correspondent, in the course of his description of the scene, says: "The Horseshoe fall is frozen solid two hundred feet from either shore. The formidable icicles suspended from the grizzly rocks are grand beyond description. The ice mountains keep working their way upward, and now reach a height of about 120 feet. The spray has made wonderful formations. The pretty cedars are so loaded with ice that they droop nearly to the ground. The grand old trees on Goat Island and Prospect Park are completely frosted over, and bend beneath their heavy coats of ice. The thermometer keeps below zero, while heavy ice continues running over the falls into the river below."

The scene must be one of beauty, far surpassing that of any building reared by man. The rapidity with which it has been produced is also a suggestive thought to the reflecting mind. "It is like a fairy palace," says one; but the Christian is reminded by its grandeur and purity of the glorious spectacle he will one day witness, as John saw it in his prophetic vision, and said, "I saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" (Rev. 21 : 2).

A Girl Died in St. Louis from Homesickness two weeks ago. The physician in attendance could discover no physical disease in her constitution, and the friends with whom she was staying averred that her longing to return to her native land so preyed upon her as to arrest the vital functions. She was a native of Einsiedeln, in Switzerland, and was the only daughter of a peasant there. The father spoiled his child by indulgence, and the flatteries of friends helped to foster her vanity and pride. In a fit of disappointment, in which a foolish love affair culminated, she resolved to accompany some acquaintances who were emigrating to America. The populous cities here, with their ill-ventilated rooms, and the absence of the mountains she loved, made the girl miserable. She longed for home-scenes with passionate intensity, but had no funds to carry her thither, and she died of her homesickness. Her death is a warning both to parents and children.

A Boy Now in Kansas Penitentiary is Said to have sacrificed himself to save his father. According to a statement in the New York Tribune of December 29, it has been discovered that in a trial for the murder of a man named Farris, five years ago, the prisoner, who was only sixteen years of age, and who pleaded guilty to the charge, did so falsely. His father was the real perpetrator of the crime, and the son voluntarily accused himself to shield him from punishment. He has been in prison five years and has kept his secret until the death of his father removed the motive for self-sacrifice. Now, evidence is brought to light which proves the father's guilt beyond a doubt. The case is altogether a most extraordinary one in criminal annals and is one of those rare instances of which The Apostle speaks in Rom. 5 : 7.

A Lost Purse of Money was Recovered through a dream at Des Moines, Iowa, on December 27. The Des Moines Register relates that a resident of that place making a journey by coach, discovered on her return that she had left her purse, which contained a considerable sum of money, in the vehicle. A telegram was sent to the conductor, and he searched the coach without finding the purse. The lady pondered over her loss all the next day still she could not remember where she had laid the money. At night she could get little sleep, but at last falling into a light slumber dreamed that she saw her purse in a particular spot in the coach. In the morning she persuaded her husband to board the coach as it passed, and look in the place indicated for the missing article; he did so, and to his surprise found it in the identical spot where his wife had dreamed she saw it. The circumstance is remarkable and is another evidence that the mind, contrary to the atheistic theories of materialists, is sometimes more vigorous and active while the body is in unconscious repose than during the waking state.

The Portrait of Mrs. Hayes, which is to be painted and engraved as a temperance testimonial, is to be the work of Mr. Huntington. Mrs. Hayes gave her first sitting on Saturday, December 18th.

A New Serial Story will be Commenced in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is written by Lady Hope of Carrideen, and is entitled "Touches of Real Life."

BAD LODGERS, AND HOW TO TREAT THEM.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved. How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?"—JEREMIAH 4 : 14.

Why Ritualism is Popular—The Expulsion of Vain Thoughts—Man's Powerlessness—I. Certain Bad Lodgers—1. Proud, Conceited Thoughts—Self-Righteousness a Sham—2. Carnal Security—The Right Side of Seventy—3. Fruitless Thoughts—Resolutions to Seek the Lord—To Confess Him—To Work for Him—II. What Bad Lodgers They are—They are Deceitful—They Pay no Rent—Destroy Property—They Damage the Soul—Bring it under Condemnation—III. What to do with Bad Lodgers—Give Them Notice to Quit—Starve Them Out—Sell the House.

ONE notices in reading such a chapter as this fourth of Jeremiah that the change which God required in the Jewish people was a very deep and thorough one. It was not only the washing of their hands, nor the cleansing of their outward lives, but the washing of their hearts from wickedness; and the Lord did not alone require of them that they should cease from wicked actions, but even from vain thoughts. The like demand He makes of us, for He says by the mouth of His servant James, "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded."

This makes our holy religion such a weighty and solemn business. If it were wholly a matter of outward ordinances, we might take the child and sprinkle it, or might bring the adult and plunge him; or we might admit all to a table where they should eat and drink such consecrated materials as should save them. This would be all easy enough, and hence men cling to a religion of ceremonies; for heart religion is troublesome, and the ungodly cannot endure it.

Ritualism is the

because it is all "Hi! Presto!" Done in a minute—nothing to think of, nothing to care about, nothing to sorrow over. It is all a mere matter of form, which men leave to their priests, as they leave their deeds to be drawn up by their lawyers, and their physic to be prescribed by their doctors. The little that is wanted of them can be done without thought, and they can go on in their sins as pleasantly as ever.

Next to that in popularity is the religion of mere morality. "Yes, we know we do amiss; we will amend. Gross vices shall be lopped off as stray branches that run over a wall. We will at once purge ourselves from everything for which our fellow-men would blame us. Is not that enough?" Many hope it is, and live as if they felt sure it was. But the religion of the Word of God is not so. It is, "Rend your hearts, and not your garments;" hence ceremonies are not enough. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength;" hence outward actions are not enough. This is too hard a demand; and as for repentance and faith, the ungodly cannot enter upon such spiritual duties, for they have no mind to them. The carnal mind hates the mention of spiritual things.

This, I take it, while it makes the Christian religion so solemn, throws us back upon one of its great first principles—that salvation must be of grace; because if it be necessary that my heart must be changed, can I change it? I am bidden to do so. I am told in such a text as this to wash my heart from wickedness. But how can I do it? Shall a fountain purge itself? It has sent forth bitter waters—bitter as Marah; can it of itself do the reverse? No; this is the finger of God. If ever this is done, God must interfere.

Now to our text. "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" Bad lodgers. Some people have admitted bad lodgers into their chambers. I have known a good many people troubled with them; and there is no use in keeping them; they must be sent adrift. So the text says, "How long shall vain thoughts lodge within thee?" It means that we must not be slow to give them notice to quit, for they ought not to be tolerated in the human breast.

First, let me name some of these lodgers; secondly, let me show what bad lodgers they are; and thirdly, let me give you some advice as to how to get rid of them. May the Holy Spirit also come and bless this word to their immediate ejectment, and may a stronger than they come and dwell forever in you, not as a lodger, but as Lord and owner of your whole being.

I. First, then, here are

and I should not wonder if some people here have found and furnished chambers in their hearts and heads for these mischievous tenants whose name is "vain thoughts."

1. Many thoughts may be called vain because they are proud, conceited thoughts. Thus, whenever a man thinks himself good by nature, we may say of his thoughts, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." If you are unrenewed, and dream that you are better than others because your parents were godly, it is a vain thought. If you have never been born again by the Spirit of God, and are trusting in your infant baptism, it is a vain thought. If you have never come to believe in Jesus, but think yourself very good because you are a respectable person and regularly attend a place of worship, it is a vain thought. If you have got it into your head that when we talk about sinners we do not mean you, and that when God's Word condemns men for their sins it leaves a loophole of escape for you, it is a vain thought. If you have an idea that you do not need to come to Christ as a poor, helpless sinner; that you do not want the same kind of change as others; that, indeed, there is a private way to heaven for you, and you have found the silver key of it, you have made a mistake—it is a vain thought.

You will have to be born again, or else if you are not born twice you will die twice. You will have to be washed in the blood of Jesus Christ, or you will die in your sins. You will have to come crying to Him for mercy, and to find everything in Him, or you will remain under condemnation and perish in your iniquity. If you think not so, it is a vain thought. Every thought of self-righteousness is a vain thought; every idea, moreover, of self power—that you can do this and do that toward your own salvation, and that at any time when it pleases you you can turn and become a Christian, and so there is no need to be in a hurry, or to seek the help of the Holy Spirit—that also is a vain thought. To reckon yourself to be anything more than a mass of sin and helplessness is a vain thought. You have misconceived your own true value and your condition before God.

Now, perhaps I speak to some here who really are very nice sort of people; at least they feel they are, for they go to a place of worship where they are not often spoken to very personally; and if the minister does speak pointedly, they say, "I do not think he has any right to talk in that way; people should be charitable." It is supposed to be charitable, you know, to allow people to go down to hell without warning them. My charity leads me to try as far as ever I can to break up all shams, and I am sure that self-righteousness is all a sham, a deadly delusion, a destructive error. It is ruining tens of thousands of people—good, quiet, harmless, inoffensive people—people, too, that are generous in their business, and kind, and all that, and who therefore conclude that they are safe for time and eternity.

2. Another sort of vain thoughts may be ranged under the head of carnal security. The poet says, "All men think all men mortal but themselves," and often as the saying is quoted never was a proverb more generally true. We are surprised to hear that So-and-so, who was well and hearty three days ago, is dead; we are quite taken aback for the moment, but we never dream that it will happen to ourselves. We are alarmed when we hear that a person who was sitting near to us in the pew on Sunday is now in his coffin; but we indulge the hope that we shall see old age.

We know all of us that life is very uncertain, yet multitudes are hazarding their souls upon the uncertainty of that life, under an inward belief, which they would not dare to express, that somehow or other they are sure not to die just yet. What is such security but a vain thought? Does it not strike you, dear friends, when a man is eighty, eighty-eight, ninety, that surely he cannot expect to get through another year? As a reasonable man he must reckon that he is soon to die. Not at all. He is often the man who thinks least about death, and if you introduce the topic he does not like the conversation, and starts you on another tack. Many who are younger than they do not like you to mention anything about advanced age or growing old.

You must talk of these old sheep as if they were still lambs, or they will not like it; speak plain truth about their years, and they are offended. If you want an old man to move quickly out of the road when you are driving, always cry, "Move on, my lad," and he feels complimented, and moves directly, because there is in him a joy in being thought young, and an aversion to the idea of his being old. This is ridiculous. You smile, and you may well smile, for it is a folly, but yet how common a folly!

Some one said to a Christian man, "What is your age?" and he replied, "I am on the right side of seventy." They found out that he was seventy-five, and they said, "You told us you were on the right side of seventy." "So I am," he answered; "that is the right side, for it is the side which is nearest heaven—my blessed home." Why should not all Christians think so? They do think so when they judge rightly, for they joyfully sing,

> "Here in the body pent,
> Absent from him I roam,
> Yet nightly pitch my moving tent
> A day's march nearer home."

If a day's march is worth singing about, is not a year's journey nearer home a theme for still greater delight?

My hearers, drive out these vain thoughts about not dying? I will lead the way for you. I am as likely to die to-night as any other man upon the face of this earth. You too, my friend, may as likely never see another Sunday as any one else. You may die at any moment; and what, my dear hearer, if at this moment, while seated in that pew, your naked spirit were suddenly to find itself at the bar of God? What would become of you? I charge you by the living God, and by your care about your own soul, do let that thought pass through your mind—it is a vain thought for me to suppose that I shall have a ten minutes' longer life; it is a vain thought to grant myself a lease for another week, for I am a tenant-at-will, and I may be ejected in a moment, so let me get rid of the folly and vanity of carnal security. At this moment the Holy Spirit saith to any one of you who may be presuming upon long life, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?"

3. I know another set of thoughts; they are better-looking, but they are equally vain, for they promise much and come to nothing; they are vain because they are fruitless. These vain thoughts are like the better order of people in Jerusalem—

GOOD PEOPLE AFTER A SORT

—that is to say, they really thought that as God threatened them with judgments, they would turn to Him. Certainly they would. They had no intention of being hard-hearted. Far from it; they owned the power of the prophet's appeal; they felt a degree of awe in the presence of the just God as he threatened them, and of course they meant—they meant to wash their hearts, and they meant to put away all their forbidden practices; not just yet, but by and by.

They would not wait very long; of course not. A long delay would be very dangerous, but they might safely tarry a little longer. They had an engagement which would take them into worldly company, and so they must wait till that was over; and they had formed close connections which they could not very well break, and so religion must be regretfully postponed for a more convenient season.

Well, now, my friend, has not that been the style of your thought for a great many years? Did not you think like that when you were a child—when you were yet fresh to the ways of religion, and had not yet learned so much of other ways as you have now? Do you not remember those early impressions—those tears at night, those childlike cries to Jesus, your mother's Saviour? Yes, you do recollect them; and there were times not so very long ago when all came back to you, and you sat in the house of God trembling, and wishing you could get to your chamber and bow your knees in prayer. You were on the borders of Immanuel's land, and there was only a step between you and life. You wished that the step was taken, but, still—well, there was a reason why it should not be taken just yet; and so you dared to bid the Lord wait your leisure, as if He were a beggar at your door to whom you were under no obligation.

Now the Lord says, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" for they are all vain—these delays, these false promises, these self-deceptions. How long shall it be that they shall throng the avenues of your soul and curse your spirit?

In some, who I hope are saved, their vain thoughts lie in a similar direction; they trust that they have believed, but they are slow to obey their Lord in publicly avowing their discipleship. They know that the Gospel has two precepts—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," or, in other words, "He that with his heart believeth, and with his mouth maketh confession of Him, shall be saved." They resolve that they will one of these days make a confession of their faith; such is their fixed intention, but the time is not yet come, for at present they are filled with questionings as to their condition.

They once felt sure that they had faith. Had they confessed it then, that certainty might have continued. They have so long kept in abeyance their obedience to their Lord that they begin now to question, and perhaps rightly, whether they have really believed. The Lord Jesus has said, "He that confesseth me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven." But, then, somebody would laugh at them; they would have a cross to carry, and this hinders them, and they postpone obedience to an indefinite period. Jesus Christ says, "He that taketh not up his cross, and followeth not after me, is not worthy of me;" but they mean if they can to find a by-path, so as not to go along the King's highway and pay toll at the gates, or be met by the King's officers, or be seen by the King's enemies. They will, if they can, creep under a hedge when the battle begins, and so escape the perils of the fight.

Their religion gives them

behind the wainscot, and no more. They do not come out except it is at night, when nobody sees them. But this cowardice is not intended to last forever; they are going to be very brave one of these days; you shall see them performing great exploits. They intend before very long openly to say, "I am on the Lord's side." They will come forward and display their colors; they will be the bravest of the brave; only not just yet. Another time for seeing the church officers with reference to union with the church will pass away, and another, and another, and yet they will be no nearer the point of decision. Their resolutions are vain thoughts, and so I put the question, "How long?" Do fix some time or other. Do not forever remain a trifler with God, and His church, and His command. "How long shall thy vain thoughts"—thy ineffectual promises of obedience to Christ—"lodge within thee?"

Now I shall come closely home to some here whom I love in the Lord if I say that resolutions to be very useful, prayerful, and holy are often little better than vain thoughts, because they are incumbered with procrastination. There are many who love the Lord who have never done much for Him because the time of figs is not yet. Leaves, and leaves only, have they produced. They are live branches of the vine, although they have not brought forth many grapes; but they cheer themselves with the persuasion that one of these days—they do not know quite when—they will bring forth clusters as famous as those of Eschol, though hitherto they have been poor specimens of Christian professors; their mind is made up to rise to a higher life; they will grow in grace; they will give more time to Bible-reading and prayer; they will live nearer to God; they will grow quite strong Christians; and when that happens then they are going to do some great thing—I do not know quite what form their resolution is to take; but they will do something extraordinary.

They will enter the Sunday-school and bring scores of little children to the Saviour's feet. They will commence a class for young men; the class is sure to grow, and out of it many will come to build up the church of God. They will become fathers or mothers in Israel, and their children will be many; or they are going to preach at the village stations, draw large congregations, and lead hundreds to the Saviour. They are going to serve the Lord by personal exertion, or to give to the cause of God very largely of their substance.

Some men brood so long over their future intentions that they all of them become addled eggs, and nothing whatever is hatched. Oh, man, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it," do it, do it "with thy might." Do not leave it for somebody else to do when you are dead. Many make up their minds that a great thing shall be done—when they die. When they cannot hold their money any longer, then they will give it up—a wonderful sacrifice to God! but he that would serve God acceptably determines, "I will give Him of my substance while it is mine, and not when it is my heir's."

My dear friend, I would have you regret your idleness. It is infinitely better to get to work and perform the little which you are able to do; to give the Lord your service while you can serve Him than that you should have to lie up-stairs trying to amuse yourself or quiet the upbraidings of a guilty conscience by proposing to do great things, which you could not accomplish if you were to set about them, and which, indeed, you will never even so much as attempt.

II. Now, secondly, let me show

WHAT BAD LODGERS THEY ARE.

Vain thoughts get admittance into our heads and hearts, and there they make themselves at home, and do mischief without end. They run up-stairs and down-stairs, and all over the house, and they multiply every day; but they are dreadful pests—the worst lodgers the soul can harbor.

For, first, they are deceitful. The man that says "When I have a more convenient season I will send for thee" does not send for Paul any more; he never intended to do so. A man says "To-morrow;" but to-morrow never comes. When that comes which would have been "to-morrow" it is "to-day;" and then he cries, "To-morrow," and so multiplies lies before God. What deceptiveness it is on the part of any man, who knows to do good and does it not, that he should think to put off God with empty promises! Now listen to that: "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." "Sin." That is God's word, not mine. But you ask me, "To him that knoweth to do good, and truly intends to do it, does not the intention remove the sin?" I answer, decidedly, No. "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

So long as he refuses to do what he knows to be right he is sinning, and every minute that he delays heaps another sin, and so the sin multiplies like money that is borrowed at compound interest; the amount of guilt runs up, and you never know what it comes to. Delay in performing duty is the most mischievous evil, doing infinite damage to the heart in which it lodges, because it defiles it with falsehood upon falsehood, and thus provokes the Most High. Oh, I would turn such a lodger as that out. David said, "He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my house." Do not suffer these vain thoughts to lodge a day longer, for they disgrace you, and place you in jeopardy.

Vain thoughts are bad lodgers, for they bring in nothing good to those who entertain them. There is the lodger of self-righteousness, for instance; what good does self-righteousness ever do to the man who entertains it? It pretends to pay in brass farthings; it pretends to pay, but the money is counterfeit. What good does it do to any man to harbor in his mind the empty promise of future repentance? It often prevents repentance. I would rather hear a man say straight out, "Now, look here: I never mean to repent or believe; my mind is made up as to that matter." This, at least, is truthful; that man will, perhaps, change his mind, or God will change it. But that other man—the soft, putty-like being, you may squeeze him; pull him out; force him together again; do what you will with him; he gets back into his old shape. There is no solid stuff in him; you cannot make anything of him.

These irresolute men, "unstable as water," cannot excel; they are neither good for use nor for ornament; and we have plenty of this class. Are you one of them, my friend? If so, God help you to get rid of these bad lodgers of instability, self-sufficiency, and constantly promising, because they pay no rent. And so you Christian people who are always on the verge of being splendid, you members of churches who are always going to be generous, who are quite certain that you shall be useful, only you never are, what profit has ever come to God, or yourself from this continued hesitation? Let such a lodger as that depart at once, for the longer he lingers the more will you lose by him.

The next reason for the ejectment of these lodgers is this: that they are wasting your goods and destroying your property. For instance, every unacted resolution wastes time, and that is more precious than gold. It also wastes thought, for to think of a thing and to leave it undone is a waste of reflection. It is a waste of energy to be energetic about merely promising to be energetic; it is a great waste of strength to be forever resolving to be strong, and yet to remain weak.

Worse than their damaging your house, they are damaging you. Bad lodgers will break your windows, burn your shutters, pull down your wainscots, and do a thousand spiteful things. When they will neither pay nor go, they will do all the mischief they can; and thus do vain thoughts—foolish, ineffectual thoughts—work us grievous ill; for the man that resolves and does not carry out the resolve grows in irresolution. He that yesterday said he would, but to-day does not, may to-day say he will, but there will not be so much strength in his resolve as there was in that of yesterday; and he failed yesterday, and he is still more certain to fail now.

A man that has been ten years making up his mind to think about eternity is ten degrees less likely to do so. A man who has had ten years' sermons earnestly driven at him, and yet they have not penetrated him, is as one that has been ten years hammered on the anvil, and is just so much the harder. Oh! God, how are men hardened, besotted, befooled, and enslaved by vain thoughts? How long will you let these lodge within you? Shall they remain till they have plundered you of heart and hope, and left your mind a ruin?

Worst of all, these vain thoughts are bad lodgers because they bring you under condemnation. There have been times when to entertain certain persons was treason, and many individuals have been put to death for harboring traitors. Rebels condemned to die have been discovered in a man's house and he has been condemned for affording them a hiding-place. Now God declares that these vain thoughts of yours are condemned traitors. Are you going to harbor them any longer? If a lodger came to your house, and after a while a policeman called and said, "You let your front room I think?" "Yes." "What kind of a person is your lodger, and what is his business?" I think after one or two visits of that kind you would say to your lodger, "I shall be obliged if you will go somewhere else," for you would not enjoy the idea of having a suspected person within your doors. Nobody does.

Now these vain thoughts, these self-righteous thoughts, these boastings in self—they are something more than suspected; they have been judged, and condemned to die; and, oh! let not your heart become a haunt for things that God abhors.

III. That brings me to my closing head, which is, Let us see

WHAT TO DO WITH THESE BAD LODGERS.

The first thing is to give them notice to quit at once. Let there be no waiting. When a man is converted it is done at once. There may be a long process by which he comes up to it, and there may be a long succession of light-breakings before he gets clear about it; but there is a turning-point. There is a line thin as a razor's edge, which divides death from life, a point of decision which separates the saved from the lost. Did you ever notice in our Lord's parable of the prodigal son the decision of the repenting one? He said, "I will arise and go unto my father;" and he arose and came to his father, and, as I heard a quaint divine say, he did not give his master a day's notice.

The narrative tells us that he had joined himself to a citizen of that country who had sent him into the fields to feed swine. He ran off there and then just as he was. If he had gone to see his master, and had said, "Sir, I am obliged to go home and see my father," or if he had stopped to clean himself—if he had stopped to purchase better linen, and a fairer suit of clothes, before he went home, he would have died of hunger at the swine-trough. But instead of that he did the right thing; he ran for his life directly; and that is what you must do. "Well, I shall, I hope," says one. You never will, my friend, if you get no farther than that. It must be done at once. And, possibly, it is "now or never"—ere the clock tick again. Wilt thou have Christ and go to heaven, or thy sins and go to hell? Quick! Sharp! God help thee to answer aright, for on that answer may hang eternal things.

The first thing, then, is to give to all self-righteousness. Away with it! Away with it! What a fool I was ever to have any! All self-confidence—away with it! I had better lean on a broken reed than lean on myself. To all delays—to all hopes that I shall live another week—away with them! Away with them! I have no ground for such hopes. Away with them. Quit, quit, vain thoughts. Oh, that they would go at the bidding!

Suppose that these vain thoughts will not go just when you bid them begone. I will tell you what to do to get rid of them; starve them out. Lock the door, and let nothing enter upon which they can feed. I would have you unconverted people say, "We confess that we have fed our vain thoughts, but now we will not go where they can get food. We will not go to ungodly amusements, nor into evil company, nor will we talk with idlers on our way home." Send into your heart what you know vain thoughts cannot be nourished upon, what will be poison to them. Give them God's Word. Read it, and study it, and cry to God to have mercy upon you. Do nothing which will help these vain thoughts to live.

I will tell you a secret, and then I have done. The best way in all the world that I know of to get rid of vain thoughts out of your house—these bad lodgers that have gone in and that you cannot get out—is to sell the house over their heads. Let the house change owners. When you have done that, you know, it will be the new owner that will have the trouble of turning them out; and he will do it. I recommend every sinner here that wants to find salvation to give himself up to Christ.

Come out, you vain thoughts. They will not come out. Notice to quit we give you; and they will not go. Now we will tell them something that will change the nature of the struggle. Lord Jesus, I trust thee to be my Saviour from every form of evil; and I am not my own now, for thou hast bought me with a price. Ah, now the stronger than they are has come, and He will bind the strong ones, and He will fling them out of window, and so break them to pieces with their fall that they shall never be able to crawl up the stairs again. He knows how to do it. He can expel them; you cannot.

God bless this simple word to many, for His name's sake. Amen.

DESOLATED HOMES.

ONE of the most heart-rending scenes ever witnessed in New York occurred in the police station of the Fourth Precinct on Tuesday, January 4. A fire had broken out in a miserable tenement-house at the rear of Madison Street, and the bodies of ten victims, singed and charred so as to be almost unrecognizable, had been carried there to await the coroner's inquest. The burned house had been nothing less than a death-trap, its position having made it inaccessible to the firemen when they responded to the alarm. It was situated in the centre of a triangular block having houses in the front and rear, the only mode of ingress and egress being a long narrow alley-way 45 feet long and 30 inches wide.

Plumbers were at work there on Tuesday morning, and were using gasoline, which exploded and set the stairs on fire. The occupants of the upper stories were thus cut off from escape to the street, and though some of them jumped from the windows and were caught by the crowd below, ten lives, all women and children, were lost. The smoke which filled every room overpowered them, and before the fire could be got under, the floors fell, and they were burned to death. The husbands and fathers were at their work when the calamity occurred, and as they returned to their midday meal they were confronted with the desolation that had robbed them of all they loved on earth. Among these was one man whose grief will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The report says:

"Shortly after one o'clock a stern-faced man with a short gray mustache entered the station-house, and with strange calmness, though the twitching of the muscles of his face showed the violence of the inward struggle he so manfully fought with, inquired if any one knew aught of his wife and children. With a few words of preparation for the dread spectacle he was about to look upon, a kindly sergeant led him to the passage-way wherein lay the blistered and blackened forms of those whom but a few hours since he had left in health and safety. The scene which followed will long live in the memory of those who stood by and saw the strong man battle with grief such as happily falls to the lot of but a few among poor humanity. 'Where are they, my little ones?' he cried hoarsely as he gazed on the faces of the mute forms lying prone around him. Then his eye caught the features of his youngest boy. He fell on his knees beside the corpse and looked long and earnestly at the features of the little one that but a few hours before he had kissed good-by. The silence that ensued was painful, and the strong men turned away to hide the evidence of a feeling it were idle to attempt to suppress.

"At last the man spoke again, but the voice was strangely changed, hollow and weak, and as though awaking from a dream, he said, 'Ah, yes, that's Charley; our little Charley —father's pet,' and then he smoothed the disfigured face with his hard, toil-worn hand, and put back the tangled, grimy curls that clustered round the blackened forehead. Then in an instant a second change came over the man, and springing to his feet he fiercely queried of the bystanders, 'And where is Tommy? Where is my little Tommy?' But before the answer came the father's eye lit on the features of his boy, and again he crooned out words of endearment to the lifeless form as he crouched over the dead body of his child.

"Then, as he again rose and stood upright, kindly hands were outstretched to lead him away, but he shook them off hastily. 'Where is my wife? Show her to me—won't you, somebody?' he said. They led him to where lay that which a few hours since had been a living, breathing woman, and the distraught man again upon his knees threw off the blanket hiding the charred, unrecognizable remains of the mother of his children.

"And now a scene occurred as difficult to convey appropriately in mere words as it was agonizingly painful to the beholders. As the man, momentarily dumb with grief, turned aside the wraps that concealed the remains of his wife—he seized upon the blackened form of an infant she held tightly clasped in her arms, which up to this moment had escaped the notice of the police. 'Yes, yes, it is my wife and my baby. Oh, I did think that one was at least saved to me.'

"Then he rose, and with his head bowed on his breast left the place and passed into the station-house, murmuring to himself, 'All gone, all lost!—wife, boys, baby—all gone! O Charley! O Tommy! my poor boys! my poor boys!'"

The daily mercies of God's providence are about us continually, so that they are too often forgotten, and we go our way unthankful to Him who careth for us by night and day. It is only when such a calamity as this occurs that we realize how much we owe to "the Lord who daily loadeth us with benefits" (Ps. 68 : 19).

LATTER-DAY INIQUITY.

THERE are certain great principles underlying the prophecies that relate to the end of the world, which are of more importance than the inferences deduced by the best school of interpreters from the particular numbers and symbols of those Scriptures. One of these principles is that sin cannot die out, but will have to be destroyed; and that wickedness will triumph more and more in the face of godliness, and will have reached its culmination, to the dismay of the Church, when the Son of man comes "with power," as the expression is in Matt. 24 : 30 and Luke 21 : 27.

These principles are very widely accepted by persons who do not profess to be students of prophecy, and who therefore do not express their opinions in direct corroboration of it. As an illustration of this we quote the following remarks from the New York Observer, than which no journal of America has more won the public confidence by its solidity of judgment and its freedom from eccentric or sensational writing:

"The evil is down in the frame-work of society, in the people themselves, but it is all the more alarming on that account. As they are the fountain of power, the institutions of the country sooner or later become assimilated to them in character. It must be evident to all persons of the least observation that there has been growing up among us, of late years, a sentiment in regard to crime and a sentimentality in regard to criminals, which is very different from that of our fathers, and which is very different from that which has prevailed among the most enlightened nations. It is claimed to be an advance, but the advance is downward.

"A large part of the community are trying to shake off the consciousness that under the government of God there is a penalty, and that under every righteous human government there should be punishment, actual punishment, for wrong doing. The modern theory is that sin is not sin but disease; that crime is not crime but misfortune; that evil doers, including the most violent and dangerous of criminals, are not to be regarded as guilty, but simply as objects of commiseration.

"And it is not mere theory; it is rapidly becoming the basis of action with many who bear the name of philanthropists and with many more who act under their leadership. When some shocking crime is committed the public mind is instinctively shocked, but no sooner is the perpetrator of the crime arrested and in the way of being brought to punishment, than popular sympathy for the criminal manifests itself. The crime and the victim are speedily forgotten; the criminal is put into the position of an unfortunate hero battling against cruel and oppressive laws from the severity of which he must be rescued.

"When a criminal is convicted, no matter what his crime may be, the tide of popular sympathy rises higher, and if the offence be a capital one, the whole community is stirred by the efforts made to prevent the execution of his sentence, and when all other means fail, the Executive is persecuted with entreaties and threats to secure a pardon or commutation of his punishment, with the hope of ultimate release.

"As a part of the same system, the discipline of our prisons has been made to conform to the new theory of justice, and there are many who, if it were in their power, would convert these places of punishment into luxurious hotels for the comfortable accommodation of the unfortunates who are sent to them. The chief promoters of this change in popular sentiment are not believers in the Christian religion, though some profess to derive their views from the Gospel. The Word of God nowhere countenances such an obliteration of the distinction between right-doing and wrong-doing.

"The whole Bible is founded upon this eternal distinction. 'Justice and judgment' are declared to be 'the habitation of God's throne.' The greatest manifestation of God's mercy ever made, that which includes all others, the gift of His Son to be the Saviour of the world, only enforces the claims of justice. He pardons sinners by providing a substitute. 'The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed.' There is nothing in the precepts of the Gospel which requires us to treat those who have committed crimes against society as if they were innocent, or to shield them from deserved punishment. We may not cherish vindictive feelings toward any, but the New Testament, as well as the Old, teaches that rulers are ordained of God 'for the punishment of evil-doers and for the praise of them that do well'" (1 Pet. 2 : 14).

Here is not an allusion to prophecy. The writer has not in his mind a thought of what the Bible tells regarding the state of the world in the last days. He simply describes the moral sentiment of modern society, as it appears to every thoughtful man or woman who is sensitive about the honor of God. And other statements of a similar import are frequently to be found in the writings and sayings of public men, which establish the fact that while the Church and the civilized world congratulate themselves on the decrease of criminals, the purity of legislatures, and the multiplication of benevolent institutions and missions, there is a painful increase of drunkenness, prostitution, Sabbath desecration, immoral literature, and disrespect for authority.

No sensible person, whether a student of prophecy or not, doubts that society is becoming refined, and that it would now be shocked at vulgar sins which were regarded with complacency even fifty years ago. It is also true that the Church is growing in numbers and in an intelligent sense of its responsibility. But the love of sin is not lessening, while the conscience of society is becoming blunted in regard to what constitutes sin in the sight of God; and with reference to the alleged improvement of spirituality in the Church, the change is largely intellectual and sentimental. The Church does not lift up its voice persistently, as it used to do, against the corruptions of society; while the prevalent tone of toleration, even to the verge of tacit acquiescence, toward Unitarianism, Universalism, Roman Catholicism, and Rationalism, all four of which are the power of hell put forth against the kingdom of God, is a symptom almost peculiar to the present day.

Men have in all ages trafficked with the Word of God for gain; but never till now have ministers allowed it to be undermined through sheer indifference to the danger. No degree of personal piety nor of faithfulness in "dividing the word of truth" to regular congregations, can take the place of trumpet-tongued antagonism to "the enemies of the Lord." Let us not be misunderstood. We would detract nothing from the glory that invests the names of the venerable leaders of our various Protestant denominations; and we fully believe that the Church has never been blessed with more godly, faithful, and self-denying a body of ministers as it possesses now. But the whole world is increasing in wickedness, and the Church loses tone from the contagion. The Church and the world alike are becoming more regardful of the obligations of man to man; but the commandments of God are less thought about than they were when society was in a state that would be considered scandalous at the present time.

Our Saviour's words were: "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake" (Matt. 5 : 11). Yet it is certain that the Church was never more successful in avoiding collision with the ungodly, and in securing the favor of society, than it is to-day. The "two witnesses" spoken of in Rev. chap. 11, who are to excite the bitter enmity of the world, will probably be the last apostles of the Paul, Luther, and Knox character; but there may be others before them, who will make it impossible for the wicked to rest in peace.

VISION-SEERS.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., Pastor of The Church of The Strangers New York.

"Your young men shall see visions."—JOEL 2 : 28.

The Use of Visionaries—Compared with Practical Men—The Visionary Engineer—Blessed are the Seers—The Seers in Science—In Religion—John Bunyan—The Effect of Young Men Becoming Vision-Seers — The Faith that Precedes Righteousness—The Practical Work for Christians.

IT is not an uncommon thing to hear men of narrow intellects and great vital energy disparage those who are called "visionaries," while it is the fashion to laud the "practical."

A man who has a talent for working a treadmill is tickled by being told that he is "practical." He congratulates himself that he is attempting no impracticable thing. He is struggling up no heights of fancy; not he. He thinks that the silliest youth of whom he ever heard is that young person in Longfellow's poem who bore a flag with the strange device of "Excelsior," and went climbing up the snow and ice therewith, fool-hardily beginning his journey in the afternoon.

If that young visionary had been a practical person, he would have heeded the warnings of that old man and of the peasant; and, instead of going on with a tear standing in his bright blue eye, he would have turned in at the voice of the maiden, especially if the maiden's father had had a store of bread and cheese in the chalet. But that Alpine youth was not practical. The pious monks of St. Bernard were; and none of them ever perished in the snow. But they did find this unpractical youth half buried in the drift of the avalanche, "lifeless but beautiful."

"There," says our practical friend, "what's the use of being beautiful if you are lifeless?"

And, as to the meaning of the last three lines of the poem, about a voice falling from the sky "serene and far," our practical friend gives it all up; he does not even ask the solution of the conundrum which it involves.

Now, the real fact is that one "visionary" man, in the highest meaning of the phrase, is worth a dozen "practical" men, and for the simple reason that there would be no practical men if there were no visionaries, as there would be no profitable activity without high thought. The whole use of practical men—and they are never to be disparaged—is to make real in every-day life what the visionary men have first seen with their spiritual eyes.

The visionary is he who, before a foot of it is laid, sees a railway reaching from New York to San Francisco, over river and bay and lake and prairie and mountain and cañon. The practical men are the laborers who blast the rocks, and bring dirt in the carts and wheelbarrows to make the grade and construct the road.

The visionary is the engineer who searches up and down a river, and at last detects the precise spot where a bridge should span the stream, and who, at the same moment, sees every block of stone which is to go into the abutments, and every piece of timber or iron or steel which is to make the strings, the thwarts, the chesses, and the couplings. The practical man is the mason, or the carpenter, or the laborer, who makes that vision a real strong, safe passage-way for loaded wagons or thundering trains.

Without these necessary practical men there would be no bridge over the river; but without there would be no bridge anywhere, and no kind of employment for practical men, who must stand holding in reserve their most valuable powers until the visionaries suddenly say, Put such a cottage there, and such a palace there, and such a church there, and such a warehouse there, and such a bridge there, and such a tunnel under yon mountain, and such a telegraphic cable under the ocean. At the command of the visionaries the practical men find something to do, and they do it. "Your young men shall see visions," said the prophet, in one of the grandest passages in literature.

BLESSED ARE THE SEERS!

We owe them everything. It was a seer of visions who beheld the people of Israel led out from the house of bondage into the land which Jehovah had promised unto Abraham. The seer of that vision, Moses, would never have been able to endure the prodigious strain which came upon him when he had to carry all that people forty years about in the Sinaitic desert and organize a nationality which should revolutionize the ancient world of thought and action.

It was a seer of visions who heard, near the gates of Damascus, that Jesus who vouchsafed him such a vision of glory as enabled the young pupil of Gamaliel to organize forces which should revolutionize the modern world of thought and action. It was a seer of visions who went forth from his cell in the Erfurth monastery to begin the Herculean task of cleansing the fouler then Augean stables of mediæval Rome.

It was a seer of visions who, standing on the eastern shore of Europe, gazed over the waters toward the west, and beheld a great land stretching where practical men saw only a waste of waters. America lay large and fair in the eyes of Columbus, alluring and attracting him long before his vessels beached themselves upon its unknown coast. The world had gone on without this addition of America but for that vision in some man's eyes, if not in the eyes of Columbus.

It was one seer of visions who beheld printed sheets before a type was made. It was another who saw boats and carriages propelled at rapid rates before any steam-engine had been constructed. It was another who saw telegrams outflying the winds before the click of an instrument had been heard in the land. It was a seer of visions whose eye ran up and down from end to end of an ocean telegraph, and whose ear heard the nations whispering to each other, and kissing each other through these thousand miles of ocean long before a strand of the cable had been formed. And in art as in science, literature, government, trade, and religion, it is the visionaries who pioneer the way for the practical men, and draw their heavier brothers forward by the songs they sing far up great heights and far away beyond great mountain ranges.

The Good Father knows, and only He, how much practical repentance, faith, self-denial, and grand, godly living have been created in hut and palace by in Bedford jail. Since Jesus ascended no history of actual personal or national transactions has had a hundredth part the influence which has been exerted on mankind by the simple narrative of the English tinker's vision of "Pilgrim's Progress."

Bunyan has done more for the world than Thucydides and Herodotus, than Tacitus and Livy, than Gibbon and Hume, than Rollin and Thiers, than Niebuhr and Dahlmann, than Prescott and Bancroft, and than all of them put together. For true religion that Dreamer has done more than any dozen "practical" preachers who have lived since his day. He enlarged the possibilities of practical preaching.

The general fact is that it is the men that see visions who make possible the existence of the work of the men who do deeds; and when "practical men" disparage "visionaries," and when our current speech compels our lexicographers to define a "visionary" as "one whose imagination is disturbed," and "one who forms impracticable schemes," it is simply another instance of the clay criticising the potter. In every such case, so much the worse for the clay.

It is because works of faith must precede works of righteousness that I would have the young men of America put themselves in such a posture toward the Holy Spirit of God that He may pour upon them the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy, "Your young men shall see visions."

Think what a state of affairs would follow if all the Christian young men of the land went about, day and night, with their eyes full of visions of the greatest and wisest possible activities. What would they see by day and dream by night? They would see strong young men growing up into the most radiant manhood on wharf, in counting-house and bank, in shop and store, in drawing-rooms and on railways, doing everything as unto the Lord; men not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord:

in the earth; men whose sweetness did not impair their strength, and whose strength did not sour their sweetness; men who made all they could, and saved all they could, and gave all they could; men constantly trampling under foot the fanatical doctrine that they were not to do good unless their hearts felt free to it; men whose work was a constant worship, and whose prayers gave them power to work; men on fire of love toward God and man, and kindling into holy flame every soul they touched; men ready to live and fit to die.

They would see these men in couples, in quartettes, in companies, in associations, in multitudes, in masses, prophesying, that is, finding grander things in the Word of God and in the heart of man, and proclaiming those discoveries. They would see the breathlessness with which other men would hang upon the words of these simple-hearted speakers, taking knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus, until the visions of God drew the eyes of the listeners from the pictures of sin, and they began to see the glory of God shining in the face of Jesus.

The practical thing for Christians to do, is to engage in earnest prayer, that we may see fulfilled that which the Lord spake by the mouth of His prophet Joel: "I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions."

Mr. George Muller's Advice to Ministers, given at a recent meeting of the Baptist Ministers' Conference in New York, deserves careful attention not only on account of its intrinsic excellence, but because Mr. Müller, in the course of a long life of service in preaching and in conducting his orphanages at Bristol, England, has put his theories to practical test.

It is fifty-five years and one month, he told them, since he became a believer in Christ; he has been fifty-four years in the Gospel ministry and nearly fifty one years in pastoral work, including almost forty-eight years that he has been pastor of the same church in Bristol—a church of 1100 members, and the largest in that city. He has travelled, within the last six years, through eleven countries, preaching as an evangelist, and has been in America for several months laboring among the Germans.

His life has been a busy one, not only in looking after his large parish of 1100 communicants, but also after his orphanages and Bible colleges and missionary enterprises, and requires nine assistants to attend to his correspondence.

In the early years of his ministry he wrote out his finished sermons, and then committed them to memory so as to avoid reading them. But under these efforts the people would often go to sleep. He was forced by circumstances on one occasion into an exposition of a portion of Scripture, and, noticing its good effect upon the congregation, he has adopted that method ever since. When he wants a text he prays for it, and reads for it until it is impressed upon his mind. Then he meditates over it, and on his knees he has learned more of theology and biblical interpretation than he ever learned in the university.

He studies in the original Bible tongues, occasionally using a commentary or encyclopædia. He, however, finds the Bible its own best expositor. He urged his friends to preach Christ, not philosophy, history, politics, and science.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

In Jerusalem.

WE rode on in silence, seeing, as if in a dream, the crowds of people taking their evening walk on the Jaffa road—people of numerous nations, and from every quarter of the globe, dressed in costumes as varied as the colors of the rainbow.

Mr. Stanley rode up close beside me as we went through the Jaffa Gate, and said in a low voice, "I know just how you are feeling, Miss Lindsay; it is indeed a wonderful moment in one's life."

We had some difficulty in getting through the gate, for a number of camels and mules were coming out of the city at the time, heavily laden with baggage. Then we passed the Tower of David, and turned down a quiet street, where stood the hotel in which Mr. Stanley had secured rooms for us. He took leave of us here, as he was going to lodge at the Latin Convent, which was in another part of the city, and where he had stayed when he was last in Jerusalem.

The landlady of the hotel was a Scotch-woman, and was very kind and attentive. Our rooms were beautifully clean, with white stone floors, white walls, white curtains before the windows, and white coverings on the beds.

We did not sleep much that night. The fatigue and excitement which we had gone through the day before would have been sufficient to keep us awake; but even had we felt disposed to sleep, I do not think we should have been able to do so, for the noises in the city, during the night, were so many and so varied that it seemed to us that, under any circumstances, sleep would be very difficult to obtain. Our landlady had told us that she hoped we should not be alarmed at any sound we might hear in the night, for a wedding was going on in a house close by, and the festivities would be kept up until the morning.

Accordingly, for many hours we were kept awake by the noise of music and singing, by the beating of little drums, and by the shouts and laughter of the wedding party. But as morning dawned the wedding guests grew quieter, and we hoped to be able to sleep. Now, however, we were disturbed by the howling and barking of the street dogs, which at times was quite deafening.

These dogs have no owners, but act as the scavengers of the city, eating anything they can find among the refuse and dirt of the streets. Each dog has his appointed place in the city, and there seems to be a code of honor among them, that no dog is to go into any other quarter of the city except that in which he was born and bred, and in which he ordinarily gets his livelihood. Immediately a strange dog from another part of Jerusalem makes his appearance he is driven away by the united efforts of all the dogs in the street which he has invaded, with enough noise to awaken the whole city.

Poor Evelyn tossed about very wearily through the night, and I was really afraid that she would be ill again. But her merry spirits seemed to keep her up, for she found amusement in all our little discomforts, and made me laugh in spite of myself many times during that long, tiring night.

At length a lull came in the barking of the dogs; but now several bells began to ring in the Greek and Latin convents of the city, and then we heard the shouts of muleteers and camel-drivers, and the tinkling of the mule-bells, as different parties of people set off in the cool of the morning for Joppa, or some of the distant villages.

We got up at eight o'clock, tired and unrefreshed. Sir William had slept much better, and was in good spirits, and very anxious to go out and explore Jerusalem. We needed no dragoman to take us to the various places of interest, for Mr. Stanley, who knew his way about the city as well as any of the inhabitants did, was very kind, and anxious to help us.

I fancied that it was something more than ordinary kindness which made him always so willing to make one of our party. I could not help thinking that he was attracted by my dear Evelyn's sweet face and winning ways. Who could help loving her? I said to myself, as I thought the matter over a hundred times during our first day in Jerusalem. I noticed, I could not help noticing, how diligently he kept near us, and how pleased he seemed that Sir William thankfully accepted his offer to be our guide while we stayed in the Holy City.

I shall never forget my first walk through the streets of Jerusalem. We grew so familiar, in a few weeks' time, with all the Eastern sights and sounds that we scarcely noticed them; but that morning everything was strange and fresh and full of interest.

We went first across an open square in front of the Tower of David, where a vegetable market was being held; and chickens and eggs, oranges and lemons, were being exhibited for sale by the women from the villages round Jerusalem, and were being bargained for and bought by the townspeople.

There was so much noise and confusion in this market-place that it was difficult to keep up conversation. No business transaction is done in Jerusalem without a dispute, so fierce that, if it occurred in England, we should expect it to end in blows. The salesman asks three times as much for his goods as he expects to receive; and the buyer offers a third of what he knows he will eventually have to give; and then they begin to dispute, and wrangle, and scream, and shout, and swear, and stamp their feet, and shake their fists, as if the affairs of a whole nation depended upon it. We saw one such business transaction going on in a street through which we passed.

"What is the matter here?" said Sir William, as he tried to make his way through an angry, excited crowd, who were screaming and gesticulating in the most alarming manner, as they clustered round a camel and a camel-driver.

"Oh nothing at all!" said Mr. Stanley, laughing, as he listened to what they were saying. "That man in the centre of the crowd is buying a load of charcoal, and he and the owner of the charcoal are disputing about a piastre, more or less, which in English money is about equal to twopence."

"But who are all these other people?" said Sir William; "they cannot all have an interest in this one load of charcoal."

"Oh, no," said Mr. Stanley; "but they happened to be passing at the time, and they have stopped to give their opinion, some taking the part of the buyer and some of the seller, and all of them adding to the general confusion by shouting and swearing and yelling at the highest pitch of their voices."

We were glad to get out of the noisy crowd, and to descend a flight of steps in the narrow street.

"Do you mind coming in here, for a minute?" said Mr. Stanley, as he stopped before a clean-looking building, and opened a small door in the wall.

We followed him into a large room, and there we saw a very interesting sight. All round the room were Jewesses, in their picturesque dresses, sitting on mats on the floor. They were busily engaged with various kinds of needlework; and an English lady was going about among them superintending their work, and teaching them anything which they did not know.

We were much interested in all she told us of these poor women—they are learning by degrees to make their wretched homes bright and comfortable, and to make garments for their husbands and children. Above all, they are learning to love the Word of God, which is read aloud to them as they work, and which is quite a new book to them, for these poor Jerusalem Jewesses know as little of their Old Testament Scriptures as they do of the New Testament.

We gave them several orders for various kinds of lace, which they make most beautifully; and Sir William left a donation toward their savings-bank, which is doing much good among these poor mothers, encouraging them to lay by part of the money which they earn, as a fund from which they can draw in times of sickness or distress.

Then we passed from that room into another part of the building, which is used as a girls' school for Jewish children; and it was indeed pleasant to see their bright, happy faces, and to hear their intelligent answers to the questions put to them. Mr. Stanley told us afterward that there is a good work being done in this mission school, for the children are carefully and prayerfully taught; and as the mothers of the next generation will undoubtedly pave the way for missionary effort among their nation.

We left the school, hoping to visit it again another day, and were turning round a corner, when Mr. Stanley stopped us, and showed us some curious old stones in the wall of the street. These stones evidently formed part of an old archway; and Mr. Stanley told us that it was now thought to be the most ancient place in all Jerusalem, being supposed, by those who have studied the matter, to have been part of the old city of Jebus, where the Jebusites lived before David conquered them, and turned their old fortress of Jebus into Jerusalem, the City of David.

As we turned into the large bazaar in one of the principal streets in Jerusalem we had great difficulty in getting on, so narrow was the street, and so crowded with camels, donkeys, mules, and people standing before each of the curious little shops, bargaining with the shopman inside. We were making our way slowly down the street when I heard a well-known voice behind us saying:

"Miss Trafford! this is a surprise!"

Evelyn and I turned round, and I said involuntarily:

"Claude! where have you come from?"

He told us that he and Alice had been spending a month in Cairo, and had now come to see Palestine. "But there does not seem to be much to see here," he said; "it is a wretched place after Cairo!"

"How long have you been here, may I ask?" said Mr. Stanley.

"Just two days now," said Claude; "we think of moving on again to-morrow."

"Then you will excuse my saying that you have not begun to see Jerusalem yet," said Mr. Stanley, with the least possible touch of sarcasm in his voice.

"Oh, I don't know!" said Claude; "it seems a stupid place. I can't think why so many people come here. But won't you come and see Alice?" he said, turning to Evelyn; "she will be delighted to see you."

"By the by, I met a friend of yours in Cairo, Miss Trafford," said Claude, as we walked in the direction of the Damascus Gate, near which their tents were pitched.

"A friend of mine!" said Evelyn, coloring; "whom do you mean?"

She thought, and I thought too, that he must have met Donald Trafford; and Evelyn was considerably relieved by his answer.

"It was Lord Moreton; he was there with a party of his friends, staying in the same hotel that we were. They were going up the Nile. He told me that you were travelling in the East; but the East is a wide term, and I did not expect that we should meet."

"But why do you call Lord Moreton a friend of mine?" said Evelyn, laughing, though her father looked at her reprovingly.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Trafford," said Claude; "I thought he was a great friend of yours. I assure you he talked so much of you and Sir William in the short time that we were together, that I thought—"

But Claude did not tell us what he thought, for we had to separate at that moment to let a string of laden camels pass by, and the conversation took another turn when we were able to walk together again.

Claude and his wife were travelling with a small party under the escort of a dragoman, and their tents were pitched in the olive-grove just outside the northern gate of the city. Alice was very glad to see us, and she, Evelyn, and I had a long talk together as we sat in patriarchal fashion at our tent door, while the gentlemen paced about among the olive-trees, talking to the dragoman, and referring to their guide-books.

"Is it not strange to be in Jerusalem, Alice?" said Evelyn; "I feel as if I were dreaming."

"Oh, I don't know," said Alice, laughing. "I have not been much impressed by it. You see, we have become quite accustomed now to Eastern manners and customs, we saw plenty of them in Cairo; and as for the old ruins and buildings here, they are not nearly so ancient as the Pyramids. And there is really very little to be seen, after all, except by those people who believe the lies that are told them about the holy sepulchre, and the tomb of the Virgin, and the manger at Bethlehem. Why actually, in one street, in quite a new wall, our dragoman pointed out to us a stone whis is believed to be the stone that 'would have cried out' if the children had held their peace! Such nonsense! I have no patience with it!" said Alice, scornfully.

"Oh yes," said Evelyn, "I quite agree with you about all those absurd tales. I would not walk a hundred yards to see one of those wonderful shrines; but, after all, this is Jerusalem, and it was here," she added in a lower voice, "that our Lord walked, and preached, and died, and was buried and rose again!"

"Oh yes, of course," said Alice, carelessly, as if that fact was but of small importance to her.

S.S. Lesson for January 23, Luke 2 : 8-20. Golden Text, verse 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"HAVE this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God, deemed not His equality with God a thing to grasp at; but emptied Himself, taking upon Him the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2 : 5-7, Alford's translation). It is altogether beyond the conception of our finite minds how the Creator, the Infinite, so came down to our level that He made Himself the creature and the finite; how the immortal God made Himself mortal man that He might speak out His love in a language not of words but of deeds; how He who hath life in Himself subjected Himself to death that He might justly impart to us His own sinless and undying life. If we learn in any measure to understand it, just in that measure shall we have this mind in us "which was also in Christ Jesus;" just in such a measure shall we empty ourselves, and be able to come down to the level of every poor lost sinner who comes across our path.

When we think of the great God who made and who upholds heaven and earth submitting to be born, to take upon Him all the humiliating weakness and helplessness of infancy, that He might be in a position to restore and to win to Himself His lost and fallen creatures, we can well afford to empty ourselves if only we may be permitted to win in His name the lost and perishing to Him. He came down from heaven to earth, we have only to come down a few tiny steps on earth itself. From unlimited power He came down to be carried in the arms of a poor woman and tended like any other infant; however much we come down, we can never get below our real level. Christ's humiliation has made it divine to empty ourselves for the sake of others, as He emptied Himself for our sakes.

The Lord Jesus was born while Mary and Joseph, her espoused husband, were at Bethlehem, where they had gone from Nazareth to be taxed in the city of their ancestors, for they were "of the house and lineage of David." His first home was in a stable, for "there was no room for them in the inn." The world's great and rich were found accommodation, but here was One of whom it is written, "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not;" there was no room for such an One. The claims of business must be attended to, health, comfort, conscience must bow before them, the world makes room for business. In the public papers, in the public buildings, in the railway, the first in everything the interests of business are considered. The hours in a family are arranged in order to serve the interests of business.

But Jesus, who created all the material out of which men manufacture all their business, where is the room for Him? In the public papers, which is the column reserved for the interests of the Lord Jesus? In the public rooms, where does Jesus preside? In politics who gives the King of kings a place? In family life, how often is Jesus not to be discovered in the circle, no room for Him. Again, in the spending of money—plenty is found for balls, operas, plenty for business speculations, plenty for foreign tours, plenty for sin, but when a church or chapel is to be built, or when a mission is to be set on foot, no money is found for Jesus, it is more the rule than the exception that these things fall into debt. One often sees advertisements that so much money is wanted to clear off the debt from a church, whereas if the silks, velvets and jewelry of those who worship there one Sunday were sold by auction perhaps the whole debt would be paid. Those who would not suffer a debt upon their furniture do not mind having a debt upon their church or chapel. "Oh! it is only Jesus, we've no room for Him."

There was excitement in heaven when Jesus was born, there the greatness of God's gift to men was understood, it was as though the very angels quivered with eager zeal to make known to man what God had done for them. But there was no general announcement made. God knew the hearts of men too well, He knew how few there were who sought after God, and instead of making a general proclamation by an angel with a great sound of a trumpet, such as He will make when Jesus comes to gather His elect, He sent word only to a few shepherds who were "abiding in the field keeping watch over their flock by night. And, lo the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid."

The first impulse of man when God draws nigh unto him is to fear. Before Adam fell it was otherwise: but when a guilty conscience drove him to hide himself among the trees of the garden, and to sew fig-leaves together, what a sad, bitter proof was this fear that he knew there was something in him which the holy eye of God could not rest upon.

But the angel's first word to the shepherds was one of comfort. "Fear not." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge" (Pro. 1 : 7), and it is God alone who can assuage the fear which He creates. "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." And this is God's message to every man who has begun to fear Him, and to recognize His claim upon him. "Fear not," there is good news for you, "unto you" personally "a Saviour is born." "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Eze. 18 : 4), is the just sentence of God's condemnation; and "what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. 16 : 26). "Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" (Mich. 6 : 7). "Fear not" says our God, and why? Because He has given His First-born for our transgressions. "Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin." "He hath poured out His soul unto death" (Isa. 53 : 12). Therefore "Fear not; believe only" (Luke 8 : 50).

The angels, who understood, although they did not benefit by, the stupendous gift which God had given to man, sung a chorus of praise together, and the burden of their song was, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." The angels saw in Christ's birth a revelation of God's glory, for in heaven God is ever first, man last. And O! what glory to our God! He does not lose His greatness by coming down so low, none but divine thoughts could have conceived such a Redemption for fallen man. The angels rejoiced that God had "thoughts of peace" (Jer. 29 : 11), that He who was born "Prince of peace" (Isa. 9 : 6) should reconcile the world unto God, and they sung on, "Goodwill toward men." But the Greek expresses more. It is as though the longings of God's heart to be well pleased with man whom He had created, found at last a satisfaction in Him who, "when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me. . . . Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me), to do Thy will, O God" (Heb. 10 : 5-7).

The angels had given the shepherds a sign that they should "find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." No doubt all their previous conceptions of the coming of the Messiah had been very different, and now they must exercise faith, if they would see in a babe born in such humble circumstances the Saviour of the world. But they had heard the angels' song, and by their communing with heaven they were prepared to see earthly things in another light. Thus as soon as the angels were gone away from them, without considering what would become of their sheep, without calculating whether they could spare the time, without waiting to see if the chief priests and scribes would recognize Jesus, "they said, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger."

Whenever it pleases the Lord to reveal any truth to us, to which we have before been strangers, let us follow the example of the shepherds, and go and see for ourselves what the Lord hath made known to us. Every truth which we know is a precious trust to be kept for God, and we never can retain it by mere head knowledge, God means His truth to take possession of, and to be a power over us, the truth of God is not to be at our disposal but to bring us to be at His disposal. God's claims upon us should be our first care, and we need never think how our earthly concerns will prosper if we seem to neglect them for some special service to which God has assuredly called us. We cannot believe that while the shepherds were at Bethlehem, God allowed their sheep to stray or to be devoured by wolves. The same God who promised the children of Israel, "Neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God thrice in the year" (Ex. 34 : 24) was He who would certainly watch over the interests of the shepherds, and He will watch over ours.

"When they had seen it they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child." That which has taken possession of us we naturally make known to others, our hearts are full of it. The Lord Jesus had strange preachers. The first were a few shepherds, later on some Galilean fishermen; in Samaria, a woman only just rescued from a life of sin, for "base things of the world, and things which are despised hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: that no flesh should glory in His presence" (1 Cor. 1 : 28, 29). The preaching of the shepherds was not in vain. For "all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds." We never learn whether any of those who heard these glad tidings were among such as hung on the solemn preaching of John the Baptist in the desert thirty years later, or whether any of them witnessed the ministry of Jesus or experienced His power in body or soul: "the day shall declare it."

There was one heart into which all these things sank and where they were all retained and pondered over. Mary, who was the first in her generation to know that "God so loved the world," she who had yielded herself a living sacrifice indeed, and who was honored as no other woman was or could be, Mary lost nothing of what was said, observed all which happened, and probably communed with God about it.

"The shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them." It is impossible to believe in the Lord Jesus without glorifying and praising God, "Then believed they His words; they sang His praise" (Psa. 106 : 12); "In whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (1 Pet. 1 : 8). It was real faith. What the shepherds saw was a helpless babe with the poorest surroundings, but they believed, because God told them that He was Christ the Lord. Reason might have rebelled, but God is above reason. Let us learn to believe, to praise and to adore.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Queen's Speech at the Opening of the British Parliament on Thursday, January 6th, was largely devoted to Irish affairs. It indicates that the Government appreciates the serious condition of that country, and intends applying a remedy including both coercion and concession. After detailing the evils now existing in Ireland, it states that the insufficiency of the ordinary powers of law having been demonstrated, Parliament will be asked to intrust the Executive with additional powers for "the vindication of law and order," and to secure to Irish citizens "protection of life, property, and liberty of personal action." The removal of grievances is also to be attempted, and the measure for effecting that object is to be on the lines of the existing Land Bill, which is stated in the speech to have been found beneficial to Ireland. It is proposed to develop its principles "with a view to effective efforts giving to a larger portion of the people by purchase a permanent proprietary interest in the soil." There are indications that both measures will be strenuously opposed. The Coercive Bill will be resisted by the Irish members and the English radicals, and the Land Bill by the Conservatives and the Whig landowners.

That Ireland is Preparing for an Armed Conflict with England is manifest from the letter of a newspaper correspondent who has mixed with the people there during the past few weeks. He says: "Since the extreme party began to have greater weight in the councils of the Land League, Fenian principles have had freer play. The distribution of arms, which was never entirely suspended, has latterly been prosecuted with vigor, and the number of Sniders now scattered over the country cannot well be calculated. Any man, I understand, who puts down five dollars in the proper quarter can be provided with a Snider rifle and 100 rounds of ball and cartridge, with waist belts, shoulder belts, and cartridge pouch, as well as sword bayonet for the rifle. It is unnecessary to state that the five dollars does not cover expenses, but the difference is made good from a fund contributed to by sympathizers with the proceedings." Large purchases of arms have been made in Birmingham, England.

The First Death from an Encounter Between the police and the peasantry in Ireland occurred near Claremorris January 4th. A process-server, escorted by the police, was on his way to serve writs of ejectment, when the party was attacked by a mob who threw stones. The police charged the rioters with the bayonet, and one man was killed.

The officers of the Land League at Tralee have been arrested for "Boycotting" and other offences, but the attitude of the inhabitants was so menacing that it was considered dangerous to convey the prisoners to the court-house for trial, and the examinations have therefore been conducted in the jail. Mr. Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, stated in the House of Commons last week that 153 persons were under police protection in Ireland, and there had been 2573 agrarian outrages up to the end of December.

A Famine in Russia is Reported by Cable. The German colonists on the Volga, usually the most thriving agriculturists in Russia, are represented to be in a half-starving condition. In one settlement of 7000 people there are only about six families whose members are not obliged to ask alms. The Saratoff Assembly reports that 750,000 peasants are starving in that province. It is stated that upward of a million peasants are in absolute want in Samara.

The Prisoners Captured by the Boers in their attack on the British in South Africa have been released, but two officers of the regiment were subsequently fired upon, and one of them was killed. An address has been prepared in Holland for presentation to the British Government, urging that the independence of the Transvaal may be recognized. A number of Dutch merchants resident in London have sent a deputation to wait upon the Ministers with the same object.

Notwithstanding the preparations being made by the British Government to retain the Transvaal, it is believed in England that Mr. Gladstone sympathizes with the Boers. The annexation was made while he was not in office, and when he arraigned the Conservative government for its blunders in a public speech delivered soon after the annexation, he said: "The Conservatives have annexed in Africa the Transvaal territory, inhabited by a European, Christian, and republican community, which they have thought proper to bring within the limits of a monarchy, although, out of 8000 persons in the republic qualified to vote on the subject, we are told that 6500 protested against it. Those are the circumstances under which we undertake to transform republicans into subjects of a monarchy."

The Difficulty Between Turkey and Greece on the question of the frontier remains unsettled. The French Government is endeavoring to mediate between the two Powers. The last reply of the Greek Premier to the proposals of France is not hopeful. He attributes the present situation of the Greek question to the action of the Powers at Berlin which generated the hopes of Greece, who is now only the executor of the decisions of the Powers. Trusting to the promises of the nations, Greece has abstained from hostilities, but now, although it is painful, an appeal to arms is inevitable.

The Death of Mr. Henry Morehouse, the well-known evangelist, is announced in a cable message from Major Whittle. His work on both sides the Atlantic received the blessing of God in a very remarkable manner. He was the young Englishman to whom Mr. Moody refers so often as the brother who preached in Chicago for seven consecutive evenings on the text, "God so loved the world," etc. He was converted in a circus in his native city, Manchester, during a gospel service, when about twenty years of age, and for nigh twenty more he toiled as a faithful witness for Christ. His last days were spent in planning to give the Bible to the masses in the crowded cities and towns of England. He kept two Bible carriages and their attendants employed in this work. The "Blessed Hope" was very precious to him, and for many years he preached the personal and pre-millennial coming of our Lord.

Earthquakes are Reported in Different Parts of Europe. Several additional shocks have been felt at Agram, South Austria, accompanied by subterranean thunder, which was heard at a great distance. Among the inhabitants a great panic again prevailed, which was increased by apprehensions of the occurrence of a still stronger shock, which Herr Falb, the professor of geology and a specialist in the theory of earthquakes, stated as likely to take place about that time. A smart earthquake shock has also been felt at Schaffhausen, being the eighteenth shock in Switzerland this year. A telegram from Mistretta, in Sicily, reports a slight shock of earthquake there. The eruption of Mount Vesuvius continues, with a fresh issue of lava descending to the base of the cone.

A Scotchman's Preservation in London.—Mr. James Nisbet, the founder of a large publishing house in London, was delivered from a great peril soon after his arrival in the great city. A young acquaintance whom he had known in his own country-side took him out to see some sights, and at last led him into a blind alley, and a strange-looking place. Some instinct told him that it was the house of the destroyer, and as, at a signal made by his companion, the door opened, he started back in horror. He entreated his companion to come away, but he laughed at him, and went in, leaving him to find his way home through the unknown streets. He felt desolate as he wandered back by himself that dreary night. It seemed to him as if the city to which he had come must be a sort of hell. Already it had transformed into a profligate the companion whom, on leaving his home, he had known as a virtuous youth. He felt as if he, too, might at last yield to the terrible temptations of city life. But on next Sabbath he found his way to a Scotch church in the city. The Scotch psalms were sung, prayer was offered, and a sermon was preached by a venerable and affectionate pastor. The little church soon brightened into a Bethel, and he was reassured and comforted to find that even London had spots of which it could be said, "Surely God is in this place." He succeeded in business, and became an eminent Christian publisher, while that dissipated acquaintance died prematurely, the victim of vice and violation of God's laws.

A Tradesman's Roguery and its Evil Consequences came out in a recent discourse by the Rev. W. Hay Aitken. At a recent inquiry meeting a young man remained behind in great distress, and said to him, "How can I become a real Christian when my employer, who is a grocer, expects me every day to engage in such business transactions as this? I take two papers, each of which contains exactly the same article. I am expected to say to a customer, 'This is a very good article, worth so much; but this other is a vastly superior article, and worth so much more.' Can a man do that and be a Christian?" These practices may be considered excusable in the temple of Mammon, but are contrary to Christianity and even morality. This young man found himself face to face with the alternative of offending God or losing his situation.

An Estate in Sligo, Ireland, now in the possession of Mr. Evelyn Ashley, who was the private secretary of Lord Palmerston, was acquired in a remarkable manner. When Lord Palmerston died, he left the whole of his property to his stepson, Mr. Cowper Temple, now Lord Mount-Temple, a gentleman well known as an eminent evangelical churchman, and an energetic philanthropist. After he had enjoyed the property for some time, he discovered in a secret drawer in the late Viscount's library, a paper containing instructions to a lawyer, which had been prepared by Lord Palmerston, but never sent. From this paper it was evident that Lord Palmerston intended giving the Sligo estate to his private secretary, and with that sense of honor and integrity for which Lord Mount-Temple is distinguished, he promptly acquainted Mr. Ashley with the discovery, and gave him the estate, although the document he had found was in no way legally binding upon him.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Youthful Days were described by him in a recent address on "Personal Recollections" as follows: "I became an usher in a school at Cambridge, and at the same time, when only sixteen years of age, accepted the pastorate at a Baptist chapel in the neighborhood. After a while I gave up my post at the school and was thrown on the generosity of the people, and they gave me a salary of $220 a year.

An old man in that place who was a great miser one afternoon gave me three half-crowns (two dollars), and as I was wanting a new hat at the time I got it with the money. The following Sunday the old man came to me again and asked me to pray for him that he might be saved from the sin of covetousness, and said, "The Lord told me to give you half a sovereign, and I kept half a crown back, and I can't rest of a night for thinking of it."

The Rev. Newman Hall's Divorced Wife has married the stable groom whose name occupied such unpleasant prominence in the divorce suit. This step is accepted in London society as a confirmation of the belief that Mr. Hall's charges against his wife were well founded.

Vol. III. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, containing all the numbers for 1880, with a complete index, will be ready in a few days. Price, $3, including postage. Orders may be sent now.

THE name of Rowland Hill is known the world over. His quaint, pungent sayings and his ready wit, both in the pulpit and in Christian society, attracted attention and compelled men to listen to the truth who were callous to ordinary teaching and appeals. He was an earnest Gospel preacher, but the many curious anecdotes which are told of him, many of which are not true or are gross exaggerations, have won for him a higher reputation as a wit than as a preacher. He was undoubtedly a wit, but the Holy Spirit so filled his heart that his wit, with his other talents, was consecrated to the service of his Master.

Rowland Hill was born on the 23d of August, 1744, at Hawkstone, Shropshire, England, and came of a distinguished ancestry. One of his ancestors was knighted by Henry VIII., and became the first Protestant Lord Mayor of London. Several members of his family passed through the dangers of the Peninsular War, and survived with honor and distinction, though not without wounds, the carnage of Waterloo.

As a boy, Rowland Hill was remarkable for a frank and generous disposition, and for the quaint answers with which he delighted his friends. On one occasion some one said to him in the presence of his parents, "Well, Rowley, and what should you like to be?" Turning toward his father, who was sitting in an arm-chair, he replied, "I should like to be a baronet and sit in a great chair." This ready and significant answer provoked the mirth of the company, and they, doubtless, concluded he was a very promising boy. It was only a momentary ambition, however, which influenced his mind, if, indeed, the answer may not be wholly attributed to his ready wit. He had probably thought no more about a profession than the boy who said he should "like to be a king," and when assured that his father had not sufficient influence to secure him a throne, promptly rejoined, "Then, father, I should like to be a beadle."

The perusal of Dr. Watts's hymns for children awakened in young Rowland his earliest religious impressions, which were deepened by the influence of his eldest brother, Richard, and his sister Jane, who appear to have been eminent for their piety. While he was a scholar at Eton, during a period of four years, the frequent letters which they addressed to him were full of earnest solicitude for his spiritual welfare, and at the age of eighteen he yielded himself to the Saviour and entered upon a course of lifelong conservation to His service.

Notwithstanding the intense ardor of his piety, his natural talent for wit manifested itself in his intercourse with his school-fellows. In a discussion as to some of his fellow-pupils contended that it had the full power of a letter, others thought it was merely an aspirate; and the question was not set at rest till Rowland remarked, "To me the letter H is a most invaluable one, for if it be taken away I shall be ill all the days of my life."

He devoted himself with commendable zeal to the spiritual welfare of his companions, and reaped at school the first-fruits of the abundant harvest of his future ministry. The young converts formed themselves into a society, and drew up a code of rules for the guidance of their conduct, their aim being to promote in each other growth in grace and progress in Christian service. They felt the importance of Christian fellowship, and regarded the mutual helpfulness of holy friendship as a gracious ordinance of God.

In the year 1764, when he was twenty years of age, Mr. Hill entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in order to qualify himself for one of the livings in Norfolk, which were in the gift of the Hill family. Evangelical truth was then at a discount at the University, but he was prepared to stand by his colors at all hazards. Nothing was allowed to divert him from his simple trust as a devout believer in, nor quench his zeal as a devoted servant of, the Lord Jesus Christ. His godly life was an eloquent rebuke of the worldly dissipations of his fellow-students, who made him the butt of their ridicule and the object of their affected contempt. But he was sublimely heroic in his fidelity, and dared, like ancient Daniel, to stand alone, in defiance of the storm of abuse which his godly life provoked. "Nobody in the College," he says, "ever gave me a cordial smile, except the old shoeblack at the gate, who had the love of Christ in his heart."

Good John Berridge, of Everton, on hearing of the young student, addressed him a letter seeking his acquaintance. Their friendship became very intimate, and Rowland Hill was laid under very considerable obligations to his eccentric counsellor. The ministry of Mr. Berridge was like an oasis in the spiritual desert of his college life. The young enthusiast derived help and stimulus from the example of his more experienced friend, and was encouraged to consecrate even his talent for humor to the service on which his heart was set. His sister intimated that if the frequency of his visits to Mr. Berridge were discovered, a storm would be raised.

With the most laudable devotion Rowland Hill sought the conversion of his fellow-students, and had the joy of seeing several of them brought to a knowledge of the Saviour. He also went to the villages in the vicinity of Cambridge and preached the Gospel wherever he could secure an audience; he even visited the county jail, and sought out the sick poor in their homes. In this way he gained by experience a wisdom which characterized the labors of his maturer years. The storm, which his sister feared, soon began to gather, and the College authorities condemned his labors as irregular, and threatened him with immediate expulsion.

He now appealed to

for advice, and the eminent servant of God said, "If threatened, denied degree, or expelled for this, it will be the best degree you can take. . . . Now is the time to prove the strength of Jesus yours." And so with the hearty God-speed of Whitefield, the approval of his own conscience, and the smile of heaven, Rowland resolved to pursue his course and manfully brave the opposition of the College authorities.

In July, 1767, he returned home for the long vacation, and the opposition of the College authorities was now taken up by his parents. Walking on the terrace at Hawkstone, when an old man, he said, "I have often paced this spot bitterly weeping, while by most of the inhabitants of yonder house I was considered a disgrace to my family." He was sad at heart to be misunderstood, but his keenest sorrow was felt when his friends resisted his generous attempts to benefit his fellowmen.

Returning to College in October, 1767, he was more determined than ever to devote himself to the grand business of soul-winning. He was heartily greeted by those to whom his ministry had been made a blessing, but there was no abatement of opposition on the part of the authorities. The same spirit which sought to hold him in check at Cambridge assumed a more violent form in the sister University at Oxford, no fewer than six young men being expelled simply because their zeal for the glory of God in the salvation of souls was not to be smothered by the proprieties of University etiquette.

On completing his academic career, graduating B.A. in 1769, and M.A. three years later, Rowland Hill sought ordination; but he says, "For visiting the sick and imprisoned, and expounding the Scriptures in private houses, I met with no less than six refusals before I gained admission into the Established Church; but, blessed be God, all this proved for the furtherance of the Gospel." He was too honest to compromise his conscience by mental reservation, and too heroic to maintain his social status and seek for worldly advancement by the surrender of his liberty to preach the Gospel as opportunity offered.

His father now reduced his annual allowance with the hope of diverting him from his erratic career, and inducing obedience to order and regularity; but, with to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature"—a commission authenticated by his grand success—the opposition of friend and foe only fired his heroism, and confirmed his determination to maintain his ground at all risks. Literally, "without purse or scrip," he went forth, journeying from place to place on a little pony, the money for the purchase of which was collected by the Rev. Cornelius Winter. His trust was in the living God, and in his deepest extremity he found adequate provision for his need. His diary about this time abounds with the most interesting entries, such as this: "There was such a noise while I was preaching, with beating of pans, shovels, etc., blowing of horns and ringing of bells, that I could scarce hear myself speak. Though I was pelted with much dirt, eggs, etc., I was enabled to preach out my sermon."

The old baronet now resolved to use further means to induce his son Rowland to discontinue preaching. For this purpose he sent Richard to go in search of his brother. On his arrival at Bristol he heard that Rowland had gone to Kingswood to preach to the colliers. He immediately followed, and found the itinerant surrounded by an immense multitude of these long-neglected people, who were listening with the greatest interest to the solemn appeals he made to their consciences. Rowland saw his brother, and guessing the nature of his errand, only proceeded with increased earnestness; and such was the power of his address that the black faces of the poor colliers soon exhibited innumerable channels of tears. Richard was much affected by this unusual scene, and Rowland, taking advantage of his emotion, announced at the conclusion of the service, "My brother, Richard Hill, will preach here at this time to-morrow." Instead, therefore, of returning in triumph with the young renegade, Richard honored this unexpected call to preach, and became his brother's coadjutor in the very work he was commissioned to persuade him to relinquish.

On the 23d of May, 1773, he was married at Marylebone Church, and immediately afterward left town, and was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who was sufficiently cautious not to impose upon the candidate any condition whatever. He was appointed curate of the little parish of Kingston, near Taunton, Somersetshire, where he remained about twelve months,

"Passing rich on forty pounds a year."

His activity and zeal in the discharge of his duties soon provoked opposition. It was here, too, he offended the farmers of his congregation by saying "they were as bad as their very pigs." As they complained that he ranted so loudly that he could be heard through the village, next time he saw Hodge asleep in his pew, he exclaimed, "What! shall we not lift up our voice like a trumpet, and cry aloud and spare not, when, with all our ranting, sinners can sleep and be damned under our very sermons?"

The Bishop of Carlisle now promised to admit him to priests' orders, but was commanded by a mandate from the Archbishop of York "not to admit him to a further grade in the Church, on account of his perpetual irregularity." Mr. Hill's disappointment was great, and in referring to this failure he used to say to his friends that he "ran off with

"ONLY ONE ECCLESIASTICAL BOOT ON."

He now entered more fully into the work of an itinerant than before, for the fortune acquired by his marriage enabled him to bear the expenses incurred in travelling from place to place in his work of preaching the Gospel. It would be impossible even to enumerate the places he visited during this campaign, much less to record the incidents which occurred. Mrs. Hill accompanied him in most of his preaching expeditions, and their journeys were often relieved by remarkable adventures. Journeying toward London, on one occasion they were stopped by a party of highwaymen. "I stood up the carriage," he says, "and made all the outgeous noises I could think of, which frightened e fellows almost out of their wits, and one of em said, 'We have stopped the devil by mistake, d had better be off.'"

For a period of ten years he continued his itinert labors. His ministry was attended by vast owds; the conversions were numerous, and ny of them were of a remarkable character. owland Hill thus proved himself to be a worthy mber of the Methodist party which commenced h the labors of Whitefield and Wesley. He versed Great Britain and Ireland, preaching the spel, and found a joy in his labors which more n compensated for the sorrow he endured from ily and ecclesiastical persecutions. Notwithnding his love of open-air preaching, Mr. Hill times felt the advantage that would be gained m a regular sphere of labor. He had originally ntemplated exercising his ministry within the e of the Established Church, but now he felt he s destined to occupy a wider field of service.

The South of London, which shared but few of advantages of the North, was regarded by wland Hill as presenting a fine sphere of labor, during the Gordon riots in 1780 he frequently ressed as many as twenty thousand people in George's Fields. About this time his manieamestness in proclaiming the Gospel, induced ie persons of influence to come forward and pose the erection of a large chapel in that parlar neighborhood, where Mr. Hill might labor ularly, unfettered by ecclesiastical restraints. site was fixed in the Blackfriars Road, and the stone of the building, known throughout the ious world as "Surrey Chapel," was laid on 24th of June, 1782, and opened on Whit-Sun- June 8th, 1783, Mr. Hill discoursing from the , "We preach Christ crucified."

work which Rowland Hill originated at Surrey Chapel was carried on by his esteemed successor, the Rev. James Sherman, who was followed by the Rev. Newman Hall. By a fatal error in his will, the property Mr. Hill left to perpetuate the work when the lease of the ground on which the chapel stands should expire, was forfeited by a legal technicality and reverted to the residuary legatees. Mr. Newman Hall has manifested the spirit of his illustrious predecessor, and with commendable enthusiasm, and by prodigious energy, has raised a monument to his memory, and served the cause of God by erecting, at a cost of more than $300,000, a new and larger church, called Christ Church, in Westminster Bridge Road, and has transferred there the congregation and all its agencies, as the situation is a much more convenient one. Though the time-honored name of Surrey Chapel has given place to that of Christ Church, the same old Gospel is preached in its integrity, and the philanthropic agencies which have been sustained for nearly one hundred years have renewed their youth and adapted themselves to the spirit and need of the present day.

The original building in which Rowland Hill preached, of which a picture appears on our first page, was, after the congregation removed to Christ Church, let on lease to the Primitive Methodist Connection, and is still used by that body.

REV. BENJAMIN SENIOR.

THE present pastor of Surrey Chapel—the Rev. B. Senior—was born at Farnley, Leeds, March 4th, 1847. Although young as yet, he has been called to one of the most important appointments in the Primitive Methodist Connection. When it was known that "Old Surrey" had become a mission-centre of this enterprising body, it was an interesting question as to the choice of an agent to operate there. In selecting Mr. Senior a choice has been made that evinces a sound judgment. He is a typical Primitive Methodist minister, giving proof of his ministry both as an itinerant preacher and a practical pastor.

His record in the ministry is highly creditable. Converted at Burn Cross, Sheffield, in 1864, at the age of 17 years, he immediately began his life-work, and as a local preacher his visits and his evangelistic efforts were made a blessing to many. In 1872 he was sent to Sunderland College, and while there his plodding course commended him to the Governor and his fellow-students. The Conference of 1873 sent him to Ramsgate, where his ministry was the means of increasing and consolidating the membership considerably. Kingston-on-Thames was his next appointment. Here his success was remarkable; many conversions took place, and Sabbath-breakers closed their shops and crowded to his Sabbath services.

In 1876 he was stationed at Dartford, in Kent. This was an appointment to test his powers; the town was notoriously uncongenial as a sphere of Methodistic toil; Mr. Whitefield had been stoned out of it, and shook off the dust of his feet against its inhabitants as he climbed the west hill to leave them. John Wesley says in his journal, "There might be a stream of Methodism in Dartford, but it would barely wet one's feet." The Primitive Methodist Society there was young, and its existence seemed quite precarious. Mr. Senior gave himself to the work of conquering prejudice, exciting interest, and converting enemies into friends, with unexpected zeal, and God was with him. The change became patent; funds and friends were the rewards of his efforts. After nearly four years of devoted toil he had the satisfaction of seeing a large and regular congregation, a numerous and loving membership, with the largest Sabbath-school in the town.

The call to "Surrey Chapel" was a great surprise to him, and his removal from Dartford was painfully felt by a large number of friends and converts, and by the town at large. But the appointment seemed to him another challenge to devotion and faith in God, and he was ready. The conditions there were critical. It had been a time of transition and trouble; but entering the old chapel and parsonage, conscious both of its wonderful traditions and the new demands upon him, committing himself to God, he cheerfully assumed the responsibilities, and he has already achieved great good.

The classes, prayer-meetings, Band of Hope, special evangelistic efforts, mothers' meetings, are all thoroughly organized and well sustained, while the Sabbath-school is remarkably healthy and hopeful. Mr. Senior's practical and direct methods, musical voice, and simple faith, afford him serviceable help in his pastoral work and pulpit ministrations.

ANECDOTES OF THE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

HIS PIETY A PROTECTION AGAINST ROBBERS.

IN one of his visits of mercy to Gloucester jail he met with a man to whom his conversation appeared to be useful. He exercised his influence on his behalf, and succeeded, not only in saving his life, but eventually in obtaining his liberty. On the man leaving the prison he could obtain no situation for want of a good character, when Mr. Hill kindly took him into his employ as a gardener, and he conducted himself with much propriety for a considerable time. Such, however, was the deceitfulness of the heart that the man afterward resumed his former wicked pursuits, was tried for several robberies, was condemned to death, and eventually executed, for robbery was then punished with death. His benevolent master again visited him in the cell, and during the conversations he had with him the prisoner confessed that he had made frequent attempts to break into Mr. Hill's house after he left his service; that he had secreted himself several times near the premises, but had always been prevented accomplishing his purpose by the recollection of his master's great kindness to him, and an awful and overwhelming impression that God was in the place.

THE SECRET OF A LONG LIFE.

In reference to some things which had been said upon his "good old age," he remarked, "I dare say you young ministers would be glad to live to be old men. Now I will tell you how to attain your wishes: preach three times a day, and seven days in the week, and then you'll find not only that you are in a fine state of health, but that you stand a good chance of becoming old men. A good pulpit perspiration is a famous thing to keep a man in good health."

SAVED BY GRACE.

When Mr. Hill was on one occasion in Scotland he was introduced to an aged minister, somewhat resembling himself in piety and eccentricity. The old man looked at him for some time very earnestly, and at length said, "Weel, I have been looking for some teem at the leens of your face." "And what do you think of it?" said Mr. Hill. "Why, I am thinking that if the grace of God hadna changed your heart you would ha' been a most tremendous rogue." Mr. Hill laughed heartily, and said, "Well, you have just hit the nail on the head."

HIS SKILFUL CONCILIATION OF A PUGILIST.

Mr. Hill was once engaged to preach in a town where he expected to be violently opposed, and where it was known that a celebrated pugilist was engaged to molest him; nevertheless, he determined to preach, and therefore had recourse to a stratagem, by which he disarmed his antagonist of his ferocity. Having ascended the pulpit, and satisfied himself from the appearance of the pugilist that he was not inaccessible to flattery, he beckoned him to the pulpit stairs and told him that he was come to preach to those people, in the hope of doing them good; that some opposition had been threatened; that he had been told of his strength and skill in self-defence, and had full confidence in his powers; therefore he should place himself in his hands, rely on his protection, and begged the favor of his company to ride with him in his carriage after the service to dinner! The man felt the full force of the compliment; all his animosity was removed; he declared his readiness to defend the preacher, in case of any insult being offered: and was as good as his word. He accompanied Mr. Hill to dinner, and ever after boasted of the honor which the latter had conferred upon him.

STRUGGLE AND VICTORY.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, January 16th, 1881.

THE FIRST SERMON AFTER THE BURIAL OF DR. TALMAGE'S ELDEST SON.

THE dust is rising from a travelling herd of cattle and sheep and goats and camels. They are the present which Jacob is sending to appease the anger of his offended brother. That night Jacob halts by the brook Jabbok. No rest for the weary man, no shining ladder to let the angels down into his dream ; but a fierce combat until the morning, with an unknown contestant.

The two—Jacob and the stranger—seize each other, each trying to throw to the ground the other. The stranger, to show his superior power touches Jacob, and the thigh-bone springs from the socket, and Jacob goes limping and a cripple all his days. As on the morning sky the clusters of purple cloud begin to ripen, Jacob finds out it is an angel with whom he has been wrestling, and not one of his brother's coadjutors. As the angel stretches himself up into the rising morn, he cries out, "Let me go, the day breaketh!"

I. First of all, I learn from my subject that God lets His children go into

TERRIFIC STRUGGLE.

Jacob loved God ; God loved him ; but there Jacob is left alone in the midnight by the brook Jabbok to struggle with this tremendous influence. So all the way down through the ages. For Joseph, a pit ; for Daniel, a wild beast's den ; for David, dethronement and exile ; for Peter, a prison ; for Paul, a shipwreck ; for John, desolate Patmos ; for Vashti, insulting cruelty ; for Josephine, banishment ; for Mr. Burns, the outrage of the Montreal populace ; for Catherine, the Scotch martyr, the drowning surges of the sea ; for John Brown, of Edinburgh, the pistol shot of Lord Claverhouse ; for McKail, a scaffold ; for Hugh Latimer, a stake ; for Christ, a cross.

Some one said to a Christian reformer, "The world is against you," and the Christian reformer replied, "Then I am against the world." So it has been struggle all the way through the ages. But why need I go to those memorable instances, when I can come into the life of a thousand persons in this house to-day and find illustration of the truth of what I am now proclaiming? You have found life a wrestling— a midnight wrestling by the brook Jabbok.

This man found the struggle in Wall Street, this one in Broad Street, this one in Atlantic Street, this one in Fulton Street, this one in Chestnut Street. What you bought you could not sell. Whom you trusted fled. Help you expected did not come. Some great with long arms and grip like death, took hold of you and tried to throw you into the dust. It was midnight wrestling by the brook Jabbok. It has been all the way up to this time a question as to whether you would throw it or it would throw you.

Here is some one else who has had a wrestling with EVIL APPETITE.

It came stealthily upon him. He did not know the force of that appetite until he began to resist it ; but some day he woke up and said, "Now, for God's sake, and for the sake of my soul, and for the sake of my wife and children, I must stop this." O what an hour that was! What a solemn hour it is when a bad appetite rises up determined to destroy a man, and a man rises up and swears in the strength of the eternal God that he will destroy it. Then the angels of light look down in sympathy, then the angels of darkness look up in spite.

O what an hour it is, and how many a man, biting his lip until the blood came, and with scalding tears, cried out by the brook Jabbok in the midnight, "God help me!" I have seen a man in that contest completely flung, completely wrestled down into the dust. Without any appeal to God for help, and depending on his own force of resolution, he went into the combat, and he fought well for a while. It seemed as if he was going by sheer force of earthly resolution to throw the bad habit, and he struck strongly, and he struck decisively, it seemed, for a while ; but his arm got weaker and weaker and weaker until it fell palsied by his side.

First of all, I saw the auctioneer's mallet come down on the pictures, then on the musical instruments, then on the fine upholstery of the parlor. Then I saw him drop into the ditch. Then I saw him shrink away from all kindly associations ; I saw him fall away from the house of God, where he had been an ornament—I saw him fall away, and fall away forever. He was contending with his own right arm, and the evil habit came and threw him.

Blessed be God, I have often seen the other result—a result just opposite to that which I have been depicting. The evil habit came on regaling with cups of dissipation, and the two clinched—the giant of habit and the man who wished to be disenthralled—they clinched, they struggled. The giant of evil habit began to waver. It became weaker and weaker, and it fell, and when the triumphant wrestler put his heel on the neck of the overthrown habit, the shout was heard, "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." It was a midnight wrestle by the brook Jabbok, and it was a triumph, as it will be for every many who puts his trust in the Lord and does his best.

Then I saw the struggle going on, and the sorrows of widowhood came, the sorrows of struggling for a livelihood. It is a sad thing to see a man contending for a livelihood amid many disadvantages ; but to see a delicate woman, with a group of helpless little ones at her back, fighting the giants of poverty and sorrow—that is a scene overwhelming to any sympathetic heart. People passed by. They saw it was only an humble home, but they did not know that between the four walls of that plain house there was a courage greater than Hannibal scaling the Alps, greater than was seen in the pass of Thermopylæ, greater than when at Balaklava "into the jaws of death rode the six hundred."

She fought for bread, she fought for shelter, she fought for clothing, she fought with aching head and weak side and exhausted strength. Midnight struggle by the brook Jabbok. Perhaps she said, "Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious? Must I fight this battle alone?" No, no ; in the darkness of that midnight, and in the sough of the wind and in the ripple of the brook Jabbok were heard the words, "Thy fatherless children I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me."

Victory again by the brook Jabbok. Midnight wrestle again triumphant. A weak woman's arm infused with the strength of the Lord God Omnipotent. So the struggle has gone on, and O how many have had it! Blessed are all those who put their trust in this God ; they shall never be put to confusion. Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. You must have struggle, and you will have victory.

WAS IT AN ENEMY?

II. I learn again from this subject that often God's people are trying to throw down their best blessing. Jacob thought it was an enemy he was fighting with that night. Oh, no! it was an angel of mercy that had come to promise a blessing to him and to his children afterward. So it has been with you and with me. How many times we have tried to throw down our greatest blessing. Your greatest misfortunes in life have turned out to be your greatest advantage.

Come, now, be frank, and tell me, is it not true that through the sorrows of life you have come to the highest Christian experience? What were you before you lost that child? What were you before that great financial calamity came? All wrapped up in this world. But I think if you would calmly to-day sit down and count the things that have turned out to your greatest advantage, you would find out they were those things that you thought were sent for your destruction. It was a midnight wrestle by the brook Jabbok with something you wanted to put down, but God had sent an angel of mercy to your soul.

David, pursued into the wilderness by his recreant son, becomes the sweet singer of Israel. Through scourging and shipwreck and imprisonment, Paul comes to be the great apostle. The hurricane that struck the house where Job's children were banqueting, and slew the children, turned out with other misfortunes to make Job write that magnificent poem which has been the astonishment of the ages.

I know of no way of getting the wheat out of the straw except by threshing it. I know of no way of purifying the gold except by putting it in the crucible. Go among those men and women who have accomplished most for God—go anywhere, and you will find they have had the baptism of tears. Oh, there is something beautiful about baptism on sacramental day, when the water is sprinkled on the face of the child ; but there is a more solemn baptism than that, and that is

THE BAPTISM OF TEARS.

Just look at the consolation which comes to God's children. See how often those things which seem to have been full of disaster turned out to be full of blessing. See the difference between the experience of those who trust in this world and those who trust in God.

Rossini, after he had played William Tell the five hundredth time, was serenaded by a band of musicians. Then they came up and gave him a golden crown of laurel leaves, and put it upon his brow, and while he was in that great triumph he said to a friend aside, "I would give all this brilliant scene—all this brilliant scene for one hour of love and joy and comfort. Compare that man amid all his artistic triumphs, his melancholy, with the feeling of Isaac Watts, sick again and again with dire sicknesses, tired and annoyed and persecuted and perplexed, yet writing this as his experience.

"The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets,
Before we reach the heavenly fields,
Or walk the golden streets.

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry ;
We're marching through Emanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

OH, IT IS PROSPERITY THAT KILLS, and it is trouble that saves. As long as the Israelites were half starved in the wilderness, and going from hardship to hardship, they behaved quite well ; but after a while they wanted meat, and the Lord sent a great flock of quails that darkened the sky, until they fell all around about the encampment ; and they took of these quails, and ate and ate and stuffed themselves until they died. The hardship they endured ; the prosperity destroyed them.

It is not the vulture of trouble that eats out the life of the soul ; it is the quails, it is the quail. Ah! do not fret about your misfortunes and about your trials, and do not fight against God, do not be rebellious against painful providences. You are trying to wrestle down an angel of mercy ; you are trying to overthrow that which came for your blessing. Behold Jacob in the midnight by the brook Jabbok.

SCARS OF BATTLE.

III. My subject also impresses me with the fact that while we may triumph over our troubles, they leave their marks on us. Jacob prevailed against this angel ; but the angel touched him, lamed him for life, and he went limping on his way. Why so prematurely ploughed those wrinkles on your face? Why has your hair become gray before it was time for frost? What has hushed the hilarity in your dwelling? You have been trouble-touched.

Are we stoics that we can see our cradle rifled of the bright eyes and the sweet lips? Must we and unmoved and see the garden of our earthly delight uprooted? Will Jesus, who wept Himself, be angry with us if we weep over a grave that swallows what we love best? Oh no! We must weep. You shall not drive back the tears to scald the heart. Thank God for the strange and mysterious relief that comes in tears. Under this gentle rain the flowers of comfort put forth their bloom.

God pity the dry, the withered, the parched, the self-consuming grief which wrings its hands and grinds its teeth and bites the nails into the quick, but cannot weep. Jesus wept. Blessed be God that there is comfort for all our sorrows, and that there is comfort in tears; but do not blame those who do not come out of their despondency very quickly; do not chide them because they are not as gay as once they were. Do not think it is because they are weak. They have been trouble-touched.

IV. My subject also kindles with a great joy when

IT PROPHESIES THE DAWN.

No one ever wanted to see the morning more than Jacob did. And what an announcement! "The day breaketh!" What a cry for all philanthropists and for all Christians. The world is brightening. The Church of God has just been planting its batteries. It is going forth "fair as the morn, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners." It is a mighty church, and it is to become the church universal. It is to bring all nations under its sway. "The day breaketh! The day breaketh!"

The bigotries of the earth are falling. Some of us remember when we thought that if a man would get to heaven he must believe in the perseverance of the saints, or in their falling away from grace; that he must be an Arminian or a Calvinist; that he must believe in liturgy or no liturgy. Those times have passed, and we have come to believe that if a man loves the Lord Jesus Christ, and trusts Him, he will get to heaven without any doubt at all, whatever else he does believe or does not believe.

I, one Sabbath during the summer vacation, went into a Presbyterian church, and it was communion day, and I took the sacrament and my soul was strengthened. The very next Sabbath I was in a Methodist church, and I sat at the love-feast and my soul was strengthened. The very next Sabbath I was at Sharon Springs, New York, in an Episcopal church, and when the invitation was given to those who desired to take the sacrament to kneel at the altar, I knelt, and I cannot tell which communion service was the most helpful to my soul. I could not tell then; I cannot tell now. "I believe in the communion of saints, and the forgiveness of sins, and the life everlasting. Amen." The bigotries of the earth are giving way before the doctrine of Christian brotherhood. "The day breaketh! The day breaketh!"

I look off upon this audience this morning, and see many who are going down into the waves of trouble that have come clear above the girdle. I want to tell you of

THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

God is going to let you free after a while. The grave will break, the dead will rise. The morning star trembles on the brightening sky. The gates of the east are swinging open. "The day breaketh!"

When Philip Melancthon and Martin Luther sat down in discouragement and talked over the gloomy state of the Church, they got more and more gloomy; but after a while Martin Luther got up and said to Philip Melancthon, "Come, Philip, let us sing the forty-sixth Psalm: 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea: though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah.'"

When we go out of this world our departure may be a struggle. We have a great many good friends here whom we will be sorry to leave—friends with whom we played in childhood or counselled with in manhood. The lattice may be turned to keep out the sun, or a book may be set to dim the light of the midnight taper, or the house may be filled with the cries of widowhood and orphanage, or the Church of God may mourn our departure; but if Jesus calls, all will be well. It will not be told in the last hour that we cried for help and could not get it.

The hours of the night of death will go by. It will be one o'clock in the morning, two o'clock in the morning, three o'clock in the morning, four o'clock in the morning, five o'clock in the morning. "The day breaketh!" So I would have it

WHEN I DIE.

I am in no haste to be gone. I have no grudge against this world. It is a very bright world to me. The only fault I have to find with it is it treats me too well. But when it is time for me to go, I want to be ready—my worldly affairs all settled. If I have wronged others, in that last hour I want to be sure of their forgiveness. If there are hands stretched out from this world to hold me back, there will be hands stretched out from the other world to draw me on. Then, Lord Jesus, help me on and help me up. Unfearing and undoubting, may I step right out into the light and be able to look back to friends and kindred who would detain me, saying, "Let me go, let me go, the day breaketh!"

Since I last stood here the waves have gone over us.

HAVE YOU LOST A CHILD?

Then you understand the grief. Have you not lost one? You cannot understand it. I would not dare to trust myself very far in this reference or allusion. I only make reference to it that I may thank you for your deep, wide, magnificent sympathy. First of all, God helped us, and next you. When, last Sabbath afternoon, we were riding to Greenwood, I said, "I cannot understand this composure which I feel, and this strange peace;" and it was suggested then and there: "There is a vast multitude of people praying for us." That solved it. Again I thank you.

God bless you all in your persons and in your homes. I gave that one to God in holy baptism just after his birth, and God has only taken that which was His own. I stand here to-day to testify of the comforting grace of God. Religion is a tremendous reality. God will wipe away all tears from our eyes. There shall be no more sorrow or sighing: neither shall there be any more pain.

"THE DAY BREAKETH!"

FRANK FEATHERSTONE'S HAPPY CHRISTMAS.

"It is of no use—it is of no use," said Frank Featherstone, and he leaned his head down on his hands and sighed bitterly.

Frank was a young tradesman, who had, a few years before, when all looked bright, married a sweet young girl, named Fanny Farmer, and settled down in a nice little home. With a loving Christian wife, and a darling little girl, who came to bless the hearts of her parents, Frank ought to have been happy, and so for a time he was; but trouble, heavy trouble, came. The modest little house in which he lived he had bought when he married, paying only a small portion of the purchase-money in cash, and letting the balance remain on a mortgage. Presently business became bad, and great difficulty was experienced in making both ends meet; profits diminished and expenses increased.

This was the state of affairs when the half-annual payment of the interest on the mortgage became due. Frank could not pay it, and sent a note to the mortgagee, asking indulgence. The reply was that indulgence would be granted for six months, but that on the 1st of December the entire year's interest must be paid without fail.

Thankful for this respite, Frank prayed and labored on; but alas! December was fast approaching, and saw him even less able to pay than before. He wrote a piteous letter to his creditor, but the answer came back that unless the amount were paid in full when due the mortgage would be immediately foreclosed.

It was this letter which in a moment of weakness had taken all the heart out of the young man. As he bowed his head and uttered the despairing cry, "It is of no use," his wife entered the room, carrying his little daughter in her arms. She had overheard the words, and at once knew that her husband was in trouble.

"What is it, Frank, dear?" she asked in a loving and sympathetic tone. And Frank at once explained all.

Fanny was not surprised, for she had expected it. She had watched the course of events, and had foreseen this trouble, but she had drawn largely from the unfailing reserves of Heavenly help, and knew that however dark was the passing cloud, it would, in God's time, give place to the bright sunshine and the grateful song.

A long talk took place over the state of the case, and at its conclusion Fanny said, "Now, Frank, dear, let us ask our Father in heaven to help us out of this trouble, and I have confidence that He will."

"Prayer will not help us," said Frank rebelliously. "God helps those who help themselves."

"Frank, will you kneel with me and ask for God's blessing?" she urged with trembling earnestness.

"If it will afford you any gratification, I will."

She knelt, and her husband for the first time in his life knelt by her side. She prayed earnestly and fervently, not only for the removal of their money difficulty, but also that her dear husband might be led to the feet of the Saviour. When the prayer was ended a great sob and a deep "Amen" came from the broken-hearted man.

The next day he wrote to his creditor that he had made every effort to pay the mortgage, but had failed, and that no resource was left to him but to let matters take their course.

A few days passed on, and there came one morning the formal announcement that the mortgage was to be foreclosed, and that proceedings to that end had been begun.

The day of the sale came. Frank had become again despondent, and only the firm trust of his wife kept him from giving up utterly. But as for Fanny, she still prayed on, and never lost hope.

"Going, GOING, GONE!" and the pretty little cottage, with its running roses and climbing vines, with all the dainty adornments lavished on it by the tender touches of his wife, with all its memories of love and happiness, was now the property of another. Frank had dimly hoped till the last minute that some one whom he knew would buy it, and that he might be allowed to have another chance to redeem it; but the purchaser was a total stranger to the place. It was said that he intended living in it himself. The darkness was complete for poor Frank Featherstone; he saw no light. But the light was already dawning.

On the evening of the sale—it was Christmas Eve—there was a knock at the front door, and the purchaser of the house entered. Frank fairly shuddered. He received his visitor in the neat little parlor, which showed so many charming evidences of his wife's taste, and called both Fanny and his daughter May to be present at the interview. The blow that he expected to fall must fall on all. For a few moments no one spoke a word. At last Frank said, "When will you desire possession?"

"That depends entirely on circumstances," was the response. "I am a bachelor, and I may not wish to turn you out at all."

Hope revived in Frank's heart at these words, and he said, "I have not the pleasure of knowing your name, sir."

"My name is George Robson."

"My brother!" ejaculated Mrs. Featherstone. "Thank God!" and she dropped on her knees before him and buried her head in his lap.

"Yes," said he, raising her up, "I am your brother, whom you have not seen since you were quite a little child. Twenty-five years ago this very day I crossed the seas to gain commercial success. I am now, through God's blessing, moderately wealthy, and have no wife or child. Give me a corner by the fireplace, and I will be an easy landlord. When I die, all shall go to this little darling," and Uncle George kissed little May and stroked her golden hair.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

A Family Circle at Shenstone—A Town with a Bad Character—The Poor Things—Who was Responsible?—Another Interior—"Mother's Tears"—The Rich and the Poor—A Luncheon Table—What Bobby had Seen—The Cries of the Heart-broken.

IN a pleasant home, not long ago, there was assembled a large family circle. All its members were persons of taste and accomplishment. The sons and daughters played and sang, the visitors added their quota to the evening's amusement, and the parents made the whole complete by the loving interest they took in every tune and song.

"My dear boys have never given me an hour's trouble," said the mother. "We have always tried to make home pleasant and attractive to them, and it has answered well. They are all out in the world now, dear fellows, but when any of them are at home, as you see, they are all that we could wish. The family taste for music has been very fortunate for us; for that, among other things, has helped to interest and occupy them in their spare hours."

The next day, which happened to be cold and stormy, found most of the party assembling at five o'clock round a cheery fire in the drawing-room. The impression of last evening's music induced one of the guests to ask for a duet. Presently two of the girls took their places at the piano; another took her work, and a seat beside the fire; while a fourth proposed a quiet game for the children.

"Yes, darlings, do!" answered the gentle mother; and then turning to one of her guests, she said, "I hope you don't mind seeing all the children down here at this hour. We are so fond of the evenings that we make them as long as we can."

Presently the following conversation ensued.

"You have a nice little town near you," one of the visitors remarked. "We drove through it today."

"Do you call it nice?" said one of the girls; "it is a very drinking place. You would not like it if you lived near it."

"The ruins are pretty, and the old church," chimed in the mother from her easy-chair, "but it is quite true that there is a great deal of drinking in it."

"They say it is the worst town for that sort of thing in all the county," said another.

"Oh! it is a dreadful place," said one of the younger ones.

"That is a great pity, for you are so near it," said a visitor.

"Oh, yes! the only thing is to avoid going into the streets as much as possible, said the mother; "and the children are very good. I must say they never ride or drive through the town if they can possibly manage their expeditions by another road."

. . . . . .

And here I must allow myself to chime in, but addressing myself only to my reader. May I say, in the first place, that the little town was not a depraved or dirty-looking place at all. It had pretty, clean streets, was embowered in fine old trees. Ivy grew upon the castellated gateway, and clustered over some of the tiny cottages, just letting the crimson tint of the old red bricks appear through its glossy leaves, as the rosy-cheeked child by the weather-stained door peeped at you through her curly hair.

There stood the old church tower which would ring out its deep-toned bell on the occasion of every service; and there, too, you could see the school buildings, and the miniature Town Hall; the bright little shops with their tempting wares displayed in their windows; and there, too, you could see the gaudy signboard, and glittering window-panes of that Satanic trap for souls and bodies—the little public house. There were certainly plenty of these, if you began to look for them. But where are they NOT?

"Yes! let us license another!" said a gentleman of our acquaintance the other day; "the poor things want their glasses of beer." Poor things! and WHY are they so "poor?" Let the police answer us that question, and we shall find that a few less public houses, and a few more co-operative stores, would bring you many more thanks from the mechanic, artizan, and laborer—yes! and the tradesman too—than any amount of false pity, backed up by the direful glass.

Here stood the little town. God had peopled those houses. Precious souls were dwelling beneath those many roofs. Children's voices might be heard within those school-room walls—voices that could be trained to prayer and praise, or for profanity and ribaldry. Who held the responsibility? Every window of that noble mansion, every picture on those drawing-room walls, every note that sounded out from the piano and violin, sounded to tell of rejected opportunities, disobeyed commands. "Am I my brother's keeper?" was the tacit but indignant reply of that whole family to anything like a hint that their neighbors were left to live and die, as best they might, uncared for—unloved—the darkness of their lives unpenetrated by any spiritual influence from the happy home which stood isolated in its greatness from the need of those around it.

"The church! Could not the clergyman do what was wanted?" asks some unimpassioned reader.

To this I reply, Services were held in that church, it is true. But who attended them? "The family from the Hall," a few of the neighbors, some of the tradespeople, the school children, the church officials, the almshouse women, and a very small portion of the most virtuous, and respectable, or most needy, as the case might be, of the cottagers.

But the mass of the people!—the population, consisting of many hundreds of working men and women!—where were they on the Sunday morning and evening, and during the Wednesday night service? They were certainly not in the church; nor had they ever the slightest intention of coming. This showed that the church was not dealing spiritually and individually with the souls of the occupants of that little town generally. A few of the upper and middle classes attended it. Where were the large proportion of that little community? Come with me, and I will show you. It is a sight all too commonplace! yet let us see it.

Five o'clock on a Wednesday evening, and we draw aside the curtain that enshrouds at least one home from the view of the aristocratic Hall close by.

A weary sob, and then a sigh, some muttered words, and a movement of preparation within a cottage home, its door ranging with many others of a similar size beside the narrow pavement of that little street. Look in and you will see. . . . . A seamed and anxious face, tired hands and feet. She is a mother. She, too, has a home. But there is no easy-chair. She gathers a little handful of coal together and puts it on the fading embers. Shading her eyes, she gazes into the darkness of her small cellar to see if there is another handful left, and, if so, it must be carefully saved for to-morrow.

She sighs—deep-drawn, heart-aching sighs—as she continues her work, opens the cupboard door and takes from it some cups, one or two plates, and some saucers. These she sets upon the small wooden table, fills the kettle, and places it upon the hob. A step is heard coming down the street pavement. It is one of many. You would not hear it, nor I—but she does. The door opens, and a man dressed in his dust-begrimed clothes, a basket of tools upon his shoulder, enters.

"Now then!" he says. "Look here, I am tired. What have you got in that pot there? Be sharp. I have got to go out again."

A loud voice outside the door is now heard, and some laughing, and soon a strong-looking lad of sixteen is in the room, followed by an ill-looking youth somewhat older. In a few moments all the party are seated round the table. In almost silence the meal is taken, until the father says, "I am going. If old Jake calls for me, tell him that I am at the 'Grey Swan.' There is some music going on there to-night."

"That chap what fiddles?" says the tall son.

"Yes," curtly replies the father. "Where's the chink, old woman?" and then the half-fed, weary mother goes to her little store and draws out a shilling. She knows she dare not offer less; but under her breath she whispers something like—

"There ain't much left; and to-morrow there's the rent."

"What are you talking about? I can hear you. Bother! bother! bother! from morning to night," roars the husband in a stentorian voice as he goes out of the door, shutting it after him with a great bang.

A whistle and a laugh follow from the two sons who drink their last cup of tea standing, that they may precipitate their escape from what they know will follow. Indeed, it has already begun—mother's tears. Bitter burning sorrows they tell of, but the men of that household they are only a bother.

"Tom, can't you stop at home for one night?" she asks. "The money is all gone, and I can't expect now that your father will begin to think about anything of that. He don't think of nothing so long as he has his public house. But I think you might."

Here she is cut short by a stamp and a frown. "What's all this jaw about? I ain't going to stay for it. So I'm off. Come, Bill!" and the two young fellows make their hasty exit, leaving their weary mother to make the best of her way to her dark cold bed, sinking into a dozy sleep, from which she starts now and then, thinking they have come home. But it is a false alarm. So she sleeps on, and at midnight, there is no mistake, they have come home. Oaths, curses, blows resound through the miserable cottage. . . . . Morning dawns, but there is no morning to her heart.

All the time these men were finishing their tea and on their way to the public house, the church bell was ringing. The lads only laughed as they heard it, and said, "One of the ringers is drunk to-night. I saw him going up to the belfry. He'll have a fall if he don't look out."

To which the other replied, "What's the good of a parson? Our'n don't tell us nothing but 'Go to church! go to church!' and I ain't a-going. That's all I can tell hm. Catch me a-going to that there place, with its grand pews and its grave faces, and that there solemn-like blowing organ. It ain't the place for me, I can tell you."

Poor fellow! he spoke too truly, I fear—more truly than he thought.

"Oh, my!" he continued, "look at the young ladies from the Hall. They are awful grand to-night, and all a-simpering and a-laughing. That one's got her hair just like our Bell at the 'Green Arms.' They do look stoopids."

"But they've got a eddication," replied the elder brother. "That's something. So I s'pose they're all right anyhow."

"Come on! they'll see us—standin' here—a-looking at 'em."

"See us! That is a good joke. Do you think they'd look at us? not they!"

But the smart young ladies did see the young men, for as they passed into the church door they said in an undertone to one of their guests,

"Did you see those rough lads standing at the corner there? These are just the sort of creatures that infest our town. Aren't they horrid?"

Thus weeks rolled on.

. . . . . .

The rich and the poor were divided—divided by a line hard and fast, indelible apparently. The mansion continued wrapped in its atmosphere of accomplishments, refinement, and ease. Ennui sometimes troubled the young ladies a little, but that could be generally cured—for the time being at any rate—by an evening party, a little dance, or a few days' visit to some pleasant friend.

But the sorrows of the cottage home lay deeper; they were more real and less easily forgotten. And if they could have been forgotten, there were not the mitigations within reach that the occupants of the Hall could boast.

The family party at the Hall had just seated themselves at the luncheon table one day. It was the children's early dinner. Plenty of wholesome and pretty dainties, that could tempt the eye as well as appetite, were there also. Delicate heaths and other blossoms, fragrant as well as gay, adorned the little china baskets, which contrasted so well with the silver plate, old pictures, and oak wainscoting.

Logs had been piled on the massive steel grate that centred the old marble fireplace; and while the liveried servants noiselessly passed about the rooms anticipating every want of each member of the busy circle, the fire that blazed forth, shedding its glowing light on servers and served, was reflected in the great mirror opposite, and cast a cheerful aspect over the state of things generally.

The lovely penstemon, with its crimson leaf petals and upright golden stamens, which had just been brought in for "mother," and placed in a crystal glass close to her end of the table for her special delectation, was now the subject of conversation. It was being well discussed, and the prospect of a succession of camelias and other flowers, as derived from the gardener's prophetic lips this very morning, was being handled, when a youthful scion of the house, named Bobby, chimed in with a remark of his own.

"Etta!" he said across the table to one of his sisters, "I saw a man yesterday going along beside a policeman. His hands had a piece of iron put on them—so—and they said he was drunk."

He might have gone further in his relation, but he was interrupted by Etta, who said, with a sudden frown and a little stamp of her foot under the table,

"Bobby! do be quiet."

A titter ran all round the table.

"What did Bobby say?" asked another.

"Oh! nothing!—He said something very naughty," replied Etta with sisterly gravity, while she called to the butler for a little more sherry.

"I said a man in the streets was drunk yesterday," repeated Bobby with emphasis; "why shouldn't I say that, mother? There is no harm, is there?"

"You are very naughty," said Etta; "you must not say such things. Do you hear, Bobby?"

"No! Bobby," said his mother from her authoritative position at the end of the long table, "you really must not. I cannot allow you to go out at that gate (near the town) if you look at such things."

"And then to come home and talk about it!" added Jessie, another sister, her whole appearance and manner betokening, no less than her words, that she cared little for her neighbors. "We have nothing to do with those people in the town; they are quite bad enough; you must not go near them.

Bobby did not seem to see this, for he was inwardly vowing to go and peep through the gate at the very first opportunity; but his sentiments were not uttered, as he saw himself condemned to silence for the present.

"Poor things!" said a cousin who was staying in the house, and whose sensibilities appeared to be a little keener than those of the other young ladies, "I always feel sorry for them."

"Oh, Mary! pray don't let us enter any further into the subject. It is not a pleasant one. Bobby always does bring in disagreeable things. But he must learn not to do it," answered Etta, looking threateningly at the small offender.

And there it ended. A ride, a walk, a drive in the afternoon were each in their turn discussed, and then luncheon was over, and a general dispersion took place, to result in the usual five o'clock reunion, beside "mother" in the drawing-room.

The needs and sorrows of the poor seemed neglected in that town, and by their richer neighbors they certainly were. But the groans, sighs, tears, and cries of grief from many a broken heart were ascending daily, and had "entered into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth." He had heard, and He would send them a Deliverer.

But first a blow must fall upon the rich and happy home. That very day, while Arthur, the eldest son, was out hunting, a severe chill settled upon his lungs, and after several days of careful nursing, and the concentration of anxious love upon his sick-room, the doctor rode away from the questioning group that clung around him in the hall, leaving on their hearts the verdict, which sank like a leaden weight, "He is in very great danger; I will return in a few hours."

Gathered together in little knots of two and three, the household spent their weary afternoon, weeping and hoping and discussing and watching, until the door-bell rang again; this time to tell them of the doctor's return.

A TRIUMPH IN ISRAEL.

By Rev. John Wilkinson, an English Clergyman.

ALIGHTING at a small station on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire line, in the month of November, 1858, a youth, about eighteen years of age, short of stature, slender in person, complexion fair, and gentle in manner and speech, accosted me thus: "Are you Mr. Wilkinson?" "Yes; and who are you?" "I have come to the station to meet you, and to carry your bag."

My heavier luggage committed to the cloak-room for the night, my ticket given up, and my small bag handed over to my young friend, we now commenced our half-mile walk to the town. "Well, my young friend, and what do you know about me? Have you ever seen me before?" "I never saw you before in my life. I have heard only that you love my nation, and that you were coming to this town to plead the cause of the people to whom I belong." "What! Are you a Jew?" "Yes, I am a Jew." I now scrutinized his features, and found no difficulty in accepting his statement. My interest in the youth was now wonderfully quickened, for might not this youth have been thrown in my way that I might lead him to Jesus? I at once drew him out in conversation by asking after his father and mother, his birthplace, his wanderings, his present occupation, etc., and soon found I had won his confidence.

He came to the meeting that evening, held in the Town Hall, and on the following morning I had a long conversation with him, asking him for all his difficulties as to the Messiahship of Jesus. These were met patiently by a reference to the Old Testament Scriptures, and prayer with him for the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

He expressed a wish to accompany me to the station and carry my bag, and just before we parted he grasped my hand, and with a beseeching look said, "Mr. Wilkinson, will you write me a letter now and then? My father and mother are both dead, I have no friends in England, you are a friend of Israel, and if I had a letter sometimes I should not feel so lonely." "You shall have a letter now and then, but it will always be about Jesus and salvation for poor sinners through Him." A correspondence commenced at once, which ranged over a period of about three months, accompanied by much prayer for the Holy Spirit's converting grace.

It was now the spring of 1859, when I received a letter announcing the joyful tidings: "Now I am happy to tell you that which I know you will be as glad to learn, that I not only believe in Jesus as the promised Messiah, but I also trust in Him as my personal Saviour; and I want you to baptize me." On the evening of the day on which we commemorate the crucifixion of our blessed Lord, and before a crowded congregation in Northeast London, he confessed his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and was baptized in His name.

The following account was read at the time of his baptism: "I am a native of Poland; my parents were strict observers of the Jewish law, but I lost the fostering care of a mother in early childhood, for she died when I was only four years of age. My father often talked to me about Jewish laws and observances, and tried to impress upon my mind the manner in which he thought the Messiah, the hope of Israel, would appear. When I was fourteen my dear father was called away, and I was left an orphan. I was then sent away from home, a distance of about thirty-six miles, and apprenticed to an uncle, a tailor. When I had served my uncle four years I was required to serve as a soldier in the army. My uncle then thought it would be better to get me away to England. He sent me off with his blessing, and urged me to cleave to the God of my fathers.

"I brought with me my tephillin (phylacteries), which I bound round my arm and as frontlets between my eyes, when I prayed to the God of Israel. My uncle gave me a few pounds to provide me with the necessaries of life on my journey. I journeyed on to Hamburg, and landed in Hull in November, 1855, stayed there about two months, and then left for Lincolnshire. On my arrival in Hull I had only twelve or fourteen shillings left, did not know a single individual, nor could I speak a word of the English tongue.

While standing in the market-place in this desolate state, scarcely knowing what to do, a Jew, a fellow-countryman, passed by me, and when I spoke to him he said he would just run with his work to his master, return to me, and take me to his lodging. On reaching his lodging I found that his landlady came from the same part of Poland as myself, and knew me well. I obtained employment as a tailor at very small wages—five shillings a week, to find myself in everything.

"There worked in the same shop a young man who was a follower of the Lord Jesus. He asked me if I would accompany him to the Sunday-school; and, as I did not know what sort of a place it was, I went. It was here I first heard the name of Jesus as the Saviour of the world. I became a scholar in the lowest class; by God's blessing on the kindness of friends I soon passed on to the top class, and have since become a teacher. Two or three Christian ladies residing together began to take a friendly interest in me, and their kindness has laid me under obligation for life. Knowing that my wages were small, and that I was a stranger, they invited me to take supper with them again and again. Instead of finding me brighter, they found me sadder and sadder, for I was receiving all this kindness as a Pole, not as a Jewish Pole. I thought if they knew my Jewish origin they would not treat me so kindly.

"The curiosity and anxiety of the ladies had now reached their climax, and they must have it out at any price. Out it came in a flood of tears: "I am by birth a Hebrew. Don't tell any one in the town, or the boys will shout after me in the street, and I fear my master may turn me away; for, though he does not give me much, I don't know at present where to go to get more. My master, I know, is prejudiced against the Jews, because when any one cheats him he always says 'you Jewed me.' These ladies had drawn out this full confession partly by their having asked me if I would like a Polish Bible so as not to lose my native tongue. I could not read Polish; I could read only Hebrew, so that I felt embarrassed and remained silent. When the full confession was made through a flood of tears, the ladies wept with me, and told me they would treat me as kindly as ever, which greatly comforted me. Like true followers of the Lord Jesus, they soon pointed me to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, trying to prove to me that Jesus is the promised Messiah.

"In course of time the Rev. John Wilkinson, whom my friends had talked about as a great friend of the Jews, came to give a lecture on the conversion of the Jews. I met him at the railway station, made myself known to him, and he further explained to me the Hebrew Scriptures, cleared away many of my difficulties, and has kindly written to me several letters since. The prayerful concern of Christian friends for my salvation has not been in vain, for the Lord has been pleased to show me the way of salvation through Jesus Christ; and now, when I look back, I can see that it was the hand of God that led me, for when I was in darkness He brought me to see the light of the Gospel, which is Jesus Christ; and now by the grace of God I would confess Him before the world as the Messiah and my own Saviour."

Our young brother in Christ soon left for New Zealand, where Christians quickly discovered in his zeal for Christ promise of future usefulness. He soon began to preach, and in one of his early letters to me he said: "What an honor the Lord has conferred on me! For He has not only brought me to Christ, but has given me five souls the first sermon I ever preached." He afterward supplied for twelve months the pulpit of an invalided minister, and afterward was sent to the college at Sydney, under the care of the Rev. John Graham, and has since become a very intelligent man of God, and a very useful minister of Jesus Christ.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Refunding Scheme was Again Under the consideration of the House of Representatives last week. It was finally resolved that the new bonds shall be issued at the three per cent limit. Mr. Frye and other members strongly opposed the proposal, and intelligence from London, and other financial centres in Europe, indicates that bonds of so short date as five years and one year, will not be taken up advantageously at that rate. It was argued also that serious financial embarrassments would be caused by the contraction of the bank circulation that is apprehended as the result of fixing the rate at three per cent. Unhappily, the question, which ought to be regarded as purely a national one, has throughout been made a party battle-ground, and has suffered in consequence. Another amendment, which will probably occasion some difficulty, was passed on January 12th. It was offered by Mr. Samford, of Alabama, and requires that, before any of the bonds or notes authorized are issued, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay out in the purchase of five and six per cent bonds all the standard silver dollars and all the gold coin now in the Treasury except $50,000,000.

Governor Murray, of Utah, has Awarded the certificate of Delegate-elect to the Forty-seventh Congress to Mr. Campbell, instead of to Mr. Cannon. Mr. Cannon received an overwhelming majority of votes, but Governor Murray refuses his certificate on the ground that he is an alien who has never been naturalized. The House will adjudicate on the question, and will probably at the same time take cognizance of the fact that Mr. Cannon is a polygamist. There is a glaring inconsistency in permitting a man to participate in the functions of a legislative body, who is himself living in open defiance of the law.

The Two Treaties with China Negotiated by the commissioners last November have been published. By the provisions they contain, power is fully conceded to the United States, at its discretion, to "regulate, limit, or suspend" the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence in this country, and the suspension of the immigration may be enforced "whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects, or threatens to affect, the interests of that country." It is also placed in the power of our Government to prohibit emigration to a particular locality while allowing it to others. Thus the whole question of Chinese labor, which has so long agitated the Pacific coast, may be legitimately regulated at Washington, without the risk of offending the Chinese government. The commercial side of the treaties is also eminently advantageous to ourselves, and both treaties will in all probability be cordially ratified by the Senate.

A Deputation of Colored Voters Waited on the President-elect at Mentor on January 14th, representing the colored population of six Southern States. Their object was primarily to urge the establishment of "a national system of education under the supervision and control of the Federal Government, instead of leaving the enlightenment of the children solely dependent upon the inadequate resources of the State Governments."

In the course of his reply General Garfield said he rejoiced that the deputation had expressed so strongly the desire of the race for education. "Education," he said, "in my judgment, lies at the base of the final solution of your great question, and that cannot be altogether in the hands of the State or National Government. The Government ought to do all it properly can, but much depends on the efforts of the parents, who must be ready to take the hand of the Government extended to help, and by that union of effort the two will effect what mere legislation alone cannot immediately bring."

The Advantages of the Nicaragua, over the Panama route for the proposed Interoceanic Canal forms the subject of an article contributed by General Grant to the North American Review. In spite of all that is urged by M. Lesseps and his friends, General Grant contends that, in point of feasibility, economy, and general convenience, the Nicaraguan scheme is far in advance of its rival, and, besides that, it would be under the exclusive control of our Government. As to the advantages of the canal, General Grant says: "Leaving out of consideration the danger and delays of rounding Cape Horn, we should not forget that by the canal now proposed, the distance from New York to Hong-Kong is shortened 5870 miles, from New York to Yokohama 8600 miles, from New York to San Francisco 8600 miles, from New York to Honolulu 6980 miles, from Liverpool to San Francisco 6065 miles, and from Liverpool to Callao 4374 miles. To Europeans the advantages of such a canal would be great; to Americans they are incalculable, forming a part of the coast line of the United States."

An Act of Generosity which will Alleviate some portion of the distress caused by the failure of the Bergen County Savings Bank was performed last week. Many of the small depositors were of the laboring classes, and the loss of their money is a serious trouble to them. William Walter Phelps, who lives near Hackensack, telegraphed from Florence, Italy, to his agent here, to make good the deficiency of all claims against the bank for $100 and less. By this means over 500 of the 1078 depositors will have their losses made good. It is expected that the other depositors will lose about one half of their claims.

Intense Excitement in Wall Street was produced last week by the announcement that three of the telegraph companies had agreed to amalgamate. They are the American Union, the Western Union, and the Atlantic and Pacific companies. The basis of agreement has not been published, and, it is said, has not yet been submitted to the respective shareholders, but it is generally believed that the amalgamation will be accomplished. The shareholders will doubtless benefit by the arrangement, however it may affect the interests of the general public.

The Whipping-post has been Recommended by a grand jury at Newark, N. J., to the court as a means to check the growing crime of wife-beating by drunken husbands. At the time the presentment was being read, a woman was brought into court with her face bruised and blackened, the result of her husband's brutality; yet she loved the man too well to prefer a complaint against him. Few spectacles so clearly demonstrate the brutalizing effects of drink as that of a beaten wife, and it is not surprising that grand juries are moved to present such recommendations, yet the records of temperance societies prove that God's blessing on their work has been found sufficient to reform even such brutal men.

A Startling Fact, Disclosed by Recently Published statistics, suggests well-grounded apprehensions as to the permanence of our national prosperity. It appears that since 1870 the quantity of fermented liquors manufactured and consumed in this country has more than doubled. Last year the amount was nearly 414,000,000 gallons, or more than a quarter of a barrel for every man, woman, and child. The daily reports of our police courts show the dire evil this liquor is working on the people.

Subterranean Disturbances in Texas.—The New York Sun says: "There is a strange rumbling noise audible upon the Red River, Texas, and as the locality is fifty miles from any railroad it cannot be attributed to passing trains. The inhabitants are much excited over it, believing that it presages volcanic action. It resembles the sound of a railway train, the roar of a distant waterfall, and at night the moaning of the wind through a pine forest. Its range, which is not changeable, is from north to north-west, and it recalls the ominous sounds described by Humboldt as preceding the great earthquake of 1759 in Mexico, when the volcanic mountain of Jorullo was upheaved. Scientific investigation will probably be ordered by the State authorities."

Crushed by Icicles.—A Young Man Employed by a quarry company of Portland, Conn., was working a few days ago under a ledge fifty feet high with a gang of men. On the ledge overhanging them were immense icicles. The warm weather loosened them and the mass fell, one of the largest striking the young man on the head, crushing him to the earth, breaking his skull, arm, and leg, and otherwise mangling him. He was carried to his home, but died shortly after getting there. This is one of the most remarkable casualties of recent times. It is a type of that sudden destruction which we are warned will one day fall upon many who are now saying peace and safety (1 Thess. 5 : 3).

Mr. S. Blagden, of Washington, D. C., Sends us the following noteworthy instance of a speedy and direct answer to prayer. He writes of a poor woman, who, after the death of her husband, was in sore need of a small sum of money to pay her grocery bill and her house rent: "She was in great distress, fearing the landlord would put her out of the house upon the street. In her great trouble she knelt down and poured out her whole heart to God, entreating Him, with tears, to open a way of deliverance and help. Some little time after, there was a knock at the door, which startled her, for she was afraid it was her landlord; but no, instead she found an evangelist, who said to her, 'Mrs. Mulliken, while I was preaching, a man came up to me and offered me ten dollars. I told him I did not preach for money, but for lost souls; he replied that I should take it any way, and give it to some needy person, whom the Lord might indicate; and, Mrs. Mulliken, after the services, I asked the Lord to whom I should give this money, when I thought of you, and therefore I come here to give it to you.' Those ten dollars paid the grocery bill and the house rent."

The Rev. George E. Jayne, Pastor at Provo City, Utah, writes: "Will you be kind enough to thank the people through your paper for sending me through the mail packages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and ask them and others to continue to send them, for a few weeks. I received quite a number, which I have distributed from house to house, and I hear good reports from them. I can use 500 per week if I can get them."

The Bible and Prayer Union.—Any Request for prayer sent to us under this head in future will be sent on to the "Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, New York." But our readers are reminded that it will be more convenient to send their communications to that address direct.

The Wife of a French Nobleman Died in a New York garret, poor and friendless, on January 10th. She had lived by washing and other housework for some years, and her extreme poverty had excited the commiseration of her neighbors. As she had not been seen for two days, the door of her miserable room was broken open, and she was found lying in bed dead. A post-mortem examination demonstrated that her death had resulted from insufficient food and exposure.

Inquiries for her friends elicited the fact that she was the wife of the Marquis d'Apromont, the head of a noble French family raised to the peerage four hundred years ago. The family estates had been lost in the revolution of 1830, and the Marquis, the dead woman's husband, left France with nearly half a million francs ($100,000), which he squandered in wild living and unsuccessful business ventures. His misfortunes in the end affected his mind. When he reached this country he had little or nothing, and in his old age found only poverty and hard work. The rich and noble of this world are the general objects of envy, yet this incident shows that in the vicissitudes of life they may lose all their treasured possessions; but the humblest Christian who is "rich in faith" is heir to an inheritance that fadeth not away (1 Peter 1:4).

We Learn with Regret that Mr. Eli Johnson, whose portrait and life appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 23d, 1880, is temporarily laid aside from his temperance work by a painful affliction. He attended a temperance service on Sunday night, January 9th, held in one of the theatres, and as he was leaving the building at its close, he slipped on the stairs and fell, seriously injuring his right knee. It will be some consolation to Mr. Johnson and his friends that he was permitted to carry to a successful conclusion his work in connection with the State Temperance Convention in New York before he sustained his hurt. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God," and sometimes a season of enforced retirement from active labor is beneficial both to the work and the worker. It has been remarked that whenever the Apostle Paul was in need of invigoration after a period of protracted exertion, he was, in the providence of God, shut up in prison, and there took the rest he would never voluntarily have allowed himself.

An Iron Collar at White Heat Placed a mechanic's life in peril on Thursday, January 6th, at the American Iron Works in Pittsburg, Pa. The workman in the course of his duties had to catch a bar of metal at white heat with his tongs. On that day he accidentally missed the bar, and the machine in front of him rapidly twisted it into a ring, threw it into the air, and it fell around his head, resting on his shoulders. Instantly, with wonderful nerve and presence of mind, he seized it with his tongs and his bare hand and lifted it over his head, and so saved his life, though his hand was burned to the bone. The man suffers intense pain from his wound, but is thankful that his life was saved even at that cost. The escape illustrates our Saviour's teaching as to the higher life of the soul, for the salvation of which a right hand or a right eye is not too costly a sacrifice (Matt. 5:29-30).

"The Last Man's Society," of Cincinnati, Became extinct on January 13th by the death of Dr. John Loring Vattier, who died suddenly on that day. On September 30th, 1832, seven then well-known young men of that city met and formed a club, from its peculiar object called the "Last Man's Society." The seven were to hold an annual dinner each year, or as many as survived, and at the first dinner, held October 6th, 1832, in a mahogany casket a bottle of wine was placed, and the casket was locked, the lock sealed, and the key thrown away. This casket was to be kept by the members of the society, and when six had died, the seventh was, on the 6th of October next following the death of the sixth, to open it and drink the wine. This agreement was faithfully carried out. In June, 1855, Mr. Lawson, the fifth man died, and his death is said to have produced such an effect on the mind of Mr. Tatum, in whose custody the box was at the time, that he died two months later. In his delirium preceding death he is said to have begged that the casket be removed from the house. By the death of Mr. Tatum, Dr. Vattier became the last surviving member, and up to the date of his death Dr. Vattier regularly, on each October 6th, has prepared and eaten all alone a dinner in memory of the Last Man's Society, the six empty chairs of the deceased members being placed around the table.

The solemn fact that "it is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. 9:27) has been recognized in many strange ways, such as in this society and in the Tontine speculations, but comparatively few men are moved by the fact to make their peace with God while they have time and opportunity.

The Pitiable Condition of an Imprisoned woman was discovered by a lady near Flushing, L. I., on January 13th. She went to collect the rent of a house she owned, and had let to a Mrs. Allen. The tenant was not at home, but an upper window was thrown up in response to her knock, and a miserable-looking woman thrusting her head out pleaded piteously for food and water. The lady procured a loaf of bread, and being unable to get into the house, which was locked up, she took a rail from a fence in an adjoining field, and sticking the loaf on the end, held the bread up to the famished woman. She showed the greatest anxiety to secure the food. No sooner did she get it in her hands than she began ravenously to devour it. When the house was broken open it was found that the imprisoned woman was confined in a room the entrance to which was fastened up by boards nailed across the door, and she said she had been several days without food. She claims that she had fallen under the influence of Mrs. Allen, who, after inducing her to surrender to her all her property, had ill-treated and finally fastened her up in the empty house and left her to starve. The woman was placed under the care of some friends, while the affair undergoes investigation.

Mr. J. B. Gough's Cigars Once Caused Him some embarrassment in public. He relates that on one occasion, many years ago, he met a friend who insisted on his accepting a present of a few cigars of a very excellent brand. To avoid offending his friend, he took a few and placed them in his hat. He was on his way to deliver an open-air address to a large number of boys. It was a cold day, and he spoke with his hat on. He forgot all about the cigars, and after cautioning the boys against drinking, chewing, and smoking, he called for a ringing cheer for "Temperance in all things." He set the example by waving his hat vigorously, when the forgotten cigars were scattered in all directions. Mr. Gough says he never felt so humiliated in his life as when a boy picked up "one of those dreadful cigars," and bringing it to him, said, "Here is one of your cigars, Mr. Gough."

A Welcome Gift of Ten Thousand Dollars has been made by Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt to the fund established by the Rev. C. F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., of New York, for the aid of indigent students at the University of North Carolina, some particulars of which we gave in our issue of August 5th, 1880. Dr. Deems writes: "When I began to make my little donations toward building up that fund, my trust was that some friends might be found in North Carolina who, after I am dead, would, for old love's sake, make it up to a few thousand dollars, but now my large-hearted friend, from whom I have never solicited anything, steps in and makes it quite as large as I had hoped it might grow in a quarter of a century."

A Church Fair Lottery has been Stopped by the police in New York. The Society for the Prevention of Crime called the attention of the Board of Police to the gambling going on in the Roman Catholic church fair in aid of a hospital. The Superintendent was instructed to enforce the law. The manager of the fair, when requested to prevent the lottery, said they were doing only what others do. We may hope, now that this decisive step has been taken, that the large number of gambling places well known to the police will also be closed and the wicked practice under every guise will be put down.

I WAS BEFORE.

"Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious."—1 TIMOTHY 1:13.

What Paul was—The Lightness of Sin—Paul's Case Typical—A Model Convert—Inferences from a Retrospect—I. It Should Excite Adoring Gratitude—In the Reception of Blessings—II. Deep Humility—A German Philanthropist—Rowland Hill and the Scotchman—III. Genuine Repentance—IV. Fervent Love—A Pernicious Doctrine—V. Ardent Zeal—VI. Hopeful about other People—The Man who will Advertise Christ—VII. Confidence for Ourselves.

I AM not going to dwell at this time upon the special items of the text as to what Paul was before his conversion, because none of us have been exactly as he was. We have all gone astray like lost sheep, but each one of us has taken a distinct course from all the rest. You might have to describe your transgressions in very different words from those used by the apostle, because yours has been a different form of guilt from his. Paul said of himself that he "was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious."

Saul of Tarsus was a blasphemer. He does not say that he was an unbeliever and an objector, but he uses a very strong word, though not too strong, and says that he was a blasphemer. He was a downright, thoroughgoing blasphemer, who also caused others to blaspheme. From blasphemy, which is a sin of the lips, Saul proceeded to persecution, which is a sin of the hands. Hating Christ, he hated his people too. He was also injurious, which I think Bengel considers to mean that he was a despiser; that eminent critic says "blasphemy was his sin toward God, persecution was his sin toward the Church, and despising was his sin in his own heart." He was injurious—that is, he did all he could to damage the cause of Christ, and thereby injured himself. He kicked against the pricks, and by doing so injured his own conscience. Having sinned thus grievously, Paul makes a full record of his guilt in order that he may magnify the grace which saved even the chief of sinners.

Note here, before we come to the special purpose we have in view, that godly men never think or speak lightly of their sins. When they know that they are forgiven they repent of their iniquities even more heartily than before. They never infer from the freeness of grace, the lightness of sin, but quite the contrary; and you shall find it as one trait in the character of every true penitent that he is rather inclined to blacken himself than to whitewash his transgressions. He sometimes speaks of himself in terms which others think must be exaggerated, though to him, and indeed to God, they are simply true.

You have probably read biographies of John Bunyan in which the biographer says that Bunyan labored under a morbid conscientiousness, and accused himself of a degree of sin of which he was not guilty. Exactly so, in the view of the biographer, but not so in the view of John Bunyan, who, startled into sensitiveness of conscience, could not find words strong enough to express all his reprobation of himself.

We will consider the case of Paul just a minute or two, because it is a type and pattern of the work of God's grace in other believers. He tells us in the sixteenth verse of this chapter, "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting." He was a typical instance of divine longsuffering, a pattern and specimen of all who believe on Christ, and all conversions are to a large extent similar to that which transformed the blaspheming, persecuting, despising Saul of Tarsus into the great apostle of the Gentiles.

Now notice when he is describing his own past life how he dwells upon it with painful minuteness. He is not speaking before God in private, as Job was in the words we have quoted, else I can conceive that he would paint his sin in still darker colors; but he is answering for himself before King

Agrippa touching the things of which he had been accused by the Jews, and you will see that he puts his offence against Christ and His church in as strong a light as he very well could. His enemies have no such accusation to bring against Him as that which he voluntarily makes against himself.

Now I want you, dear friends, who know the Lord, to follow me in a very simple way, rather by your emotions than by anything else. I want the text of my sermon to be, "I was." The apostle tells us what he was—what he was before conversion. Now I want you to think what you were before the grace of God met with you, and changed you. I do not know that I shall help you much to recollect the details of your sin, but I want you to see seven very profitable inferences which will arise out of an impartial retrospect of your life before conversion.

I. The first, I think, will be that if we think of what we were it will excite in us

ADORING GRATITUDE.

Paul was full of gratitude, for he thanked Christ Jesus that he counted him faithful, putting him into the ministry. He is so glad of the favor of God that when he comes to the seventeenth verse he must put down his pen while he signs, "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen." If, then, you and I look back upon what we were before the Lord saved us, we too shall be full of adoring gratitude as we think of even the least of all the favors that He has bestowed upon us.

"I am not worthy," said the patriarch Jacob, when he was returning to his country at the command of God—"I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast shewed unto thy servant," and we can each one say the same. Is it not a wonderful thing that you who were—I will not say what, you know what you were, and God knows—that you should be a teacher of others; that you should be permitted to stand up and speak of pardon bought with blood; that you should be allowed to talk of holiness though your lips used to speak of any other theme but that; that you should be allowed to extol the Christ for whom you had no words of praise a little while ago—for whom, indeed, you had only words of contempt and scorn?

Paul was astonished to think that he was put into the ministry; and when I look back upon my own life before I knew the Lord, I am amazed that ever I should stand here, seeing that for so long I refused my Lord's love, and put aside His favors, and would have none of them. Ah, I did not know what would happen to me one day. Little did I then think that I should ever stand here to "Tell to sinners round

What a dear Saviour I have found."

But it does fill me with gratitude which makes me bow before God in thankful adoration to think that He should have looked on me, and to know that "unto me," as well as unto Paul, "is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

I ask you, dear friends, to recollect this gratitude in the reception of every blessing. When you enjoy church privileges, when you come to the communion-table, think, "Here comes one to sit with the children of God who once was like a dog outside the house." When you stand up and praise the Lord, think, "And I too am permitted to offer the sacrifice of praise—I, who once sang the praises of Bacchus or of Venus rather than of Christ Jesus!"

Oh! if your heart does not leap at the very sound of the name of Jesus, surely you cannot possess a heart at all. Such a change, such a wondrous, matchless change, has passed upon you that if you do not praise the Lord to-day, and to-morrow, and as long as you have any being, what shall be said of your ungrateful silence? "I was"—I was before—all that I ought not to have been, but grace has changed me, and unto the God of grace be all the glory. Do not all of you who love the Lord unite with me in this utterance of adoring gratitude?

II. A second very blessed inference (we can only speak briefly upon each one) is that a sense of what we were should sustain in us

VERY DEEP HUMILITY.

It did so in the case of the apostle Paul; and I would refer you to his expression of it in the first epistle to the Corinthians, the fifteenth chapter, and the ninth verse, where he says, "I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God." When he was compelled to glory in what he was through the grace given unto him he said that he supposed he was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles; yet he here says of himself that he was not worthy to be called an apostle, because before his conversion he persecuted the saints of God.

Now, dear brothers and sisters, if we have been a little while converted, and have united with the church of God, and the Lord has given us a little work to do, we may be tempted to think, "Now I am somebody. Really, I am not now quite the humble dependent that I used to be; I am getting to be of some service to my Lord and Master, and I am of some importance in his church." Ah, that is the way many Christians get into sad mischief. "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." You must always strive against that kind of spirit, and one way to avoid it is to remember what you were in your unregenerate state.

I have heard of a good man in Germany who used to rescue poor, destitute boys from the streets, and he always had them photographed in their rags and filth just as he found them; and then in years afterward, when they were clothed and washed and educated, and their characters began to develop, if they grew proud he would show them what they were, and try to teach them what they would have been likely to be if it had not been for his charity. If you are inclined to lift up your head, and boast what a great man you are now, just look at the likeness of what you were before the Lord made you a new creature in Christ Jesus. Oh! who can tell what that likeness would have been but for the interpositions of divine grace?

I think you would say what the Scotchman said to Rowland Hill when he called to see the good man in his study. He sat and looked at him, and Rowland Hill's face, you know, if you have seen his portrait, is one to be remembered; there is a peculiar comic look about it. So the Scotchman said, in answer to the question, "What are you looking at?" "I have been studying the lines of your face." "And what do you make out of them?" said Mr. Hill. "Why, that if the grace of God had not made you a Christian, you would have been one of the worst fellows that ever lived." "Ah!" said Mr. Hill, "and you have hit the mark this time." I should not wonder too if some of us, when we look in the glass, were to see somebody there that would have been a very deep-dyed sinner if it had not been for the change of heart which sovereign grace has wrought. This ought to keep us very humble, and very lowly before God.

I invite you, friends, to think this over, and when you feel yourselves beginning to swell a little, let the bladder of your foolish and wicked pride be pricked with the needle of conscience as you recollect what you used to be, and you will be all the better for letting some of the gas escape. Come back as speedily as you can to your true shape, for what are you, after all? If you are anything that is good, or right, or pleasing in the eyes of the Lord, still you must say, "By the grace of God I am what I am."

"All that I was, my sin, my guilt,
My death, was all mine own;
All that I am I owe to thee,
My gracious God, alone."

III. The next is this—the remembrance of our former condition should renew in us

GENUINE REPENTANCE.

When we look back upon what we used to be before the Lord met with us, it should breed in us a perpetual repentance. There are some who seem to think that we only repent of sin when we are first converted. Do not you be deluded by any such false notion. When you leave off repenting you have left off living. You are not living to God as you ought to do unless you daily repent. Remember that we are not saved by a single act of faith which terminates the moment we receive the assurance of the divine forgiveness, but by a faith which continues as long as we live, and as long as ever we have any faith we must have repentance too, for these are twin graces—faith with a bright eye, like Rachel, who was beautiful and well-favored, and repentance, tender-eyed, like Leah, but with a lovely eye for all that.

"Repentance," says one, "why, I thought that was a bitter thing, that was taken away when we believed!" No, but it is a sweet thing; I could wish to repent in heaven, though I suppose I shall not. We cannot carry the tear of penitence in our eye into heaven; it will be the only thing we might regret to leave behind. Surely we shall be sorry even there for having grieved our God. Even there, methinks, we shall repent, but certainly as long as we are here we must daily repent of sin—ay, and repent of the sin that is forgiven, repent more because it is forgiven than we did when we had any doubt about its being pardoned.

"My sins, my sins, my Saviour!
How sad on Thee they fall,
Seen through Thy gentle patience,
I tenfold feel them all.

"I know they are forgiven,
But still their pain to me
Is all the grief and anguish
They laid, my Lord, on Thee."

Smite on your breasts while you think that it was necessary that Christ should die that you might be delivered from sin, and its penalty and power, and as your love increases let your sorrow abound, that such a Lord should have needed to be crucified for you.

IV. And now, fourthly (we have but a word on each inference, you see), the retrospect of our past lives should kindle in us to the Lord who has redeemed us.

You remember Christ went into the house of one of the Pharisees who had a measure of respect for Him; this was Simon, who desired Him to eat with him; but when He entered in, Simon treated Him as a common guest, and offered Him none of the delicate attentions which men give to choice friends, or to superiors. Christ took no note of this, nor had He need to do so, for there was another who stole into that room who did for him all that Simon ought to have done, and more than Simon could have done.

"A woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood at His feet behind Him weeping." She stood behind the couch upon which He was reclining, and let her tears fall down upon His blessed flesh till she had washed His feet with them, and then unbraiding the luxurious tresses of her hair, she wiped those holy feet with it, her love, her humility, her adoration, and her penitence mingling as she kissed His feet, and anointed them with the ointment which she had brought. Our Lord explained why this woman had performed this extraordinary action. He said it was because she had been forgiven much. Now rest assured that this is a rule without an exception, that those who are conscious of having had much forgiven are those who will love Christ much.

I think there is nothing better than to retain a vivid sense of conversion in order to retain a vivid sense of love. Do not be afraid of loving Christ too much. I see the cold carping criticism of this age objects to any expressions of love to Christ which we use in our hymns because it says that they are sensuous. My only answer to such talk is—God give us more of such blessed sensuousness! I think that instead of diminishing these utterances it will be a token of growth in grace when they are more abundant, not if they become so common as to be hypocritical; then they would be sickening; but as long as they are true and honest I for one would say to you who love the Lord, Go on and sing—

"Safe in the arms of Jesus, Safe on his gentle breast."

Go on and sing—

"Jesus, I love thy charming name,
'Tis music to mine ear."

Oh for more love arising out of a deep, intense sense of what we once were, and of the change which Christ has wrought in us!

"But," says one, "I do not know that any great change has been wrought in me." No, and there are some who tell us that we do not want any. There are certain Pædo-baptists preaching nowadays that the most of children of pious parents do not need conversion. We have long had the Church of England teaching us baptismal regeneration; now we have got some Nonconformists trying to persuade us that no regeneration at all is wanted. This is a new kind of doctrine that I know nothing of, and that the Word of God knows nothing of, and it will not do for us. It will eat out the very life of Christianity if it be believed.

Pious ancestors could not save one of you—even if your fathers and mothers, and grandfathers and grandmothers, and great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers, as far back as ever you like, had been all saints, nevertheless, their faith could not avail for you. You must be born, "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." "Ye must be born again" is as true of one child as of another; as true of you as it was of me, and as true of me as of the thief confined in prison to-day. But some of us have been changed: we are washed, we are sanctified, we are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. It has been a real work of grace, the turning of us upside down, the reversing of the course of nature, a turning of night into day, a turning of the powers of our spirit from the dominion of Satan to the dominion of Christ; and we must and will therefore love Him who has wrought in us such a wondrous transformation.

V. Well now, fifthly, remembering what we were, should be aroused in us.

Look at Paul. He says, "I was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious." What then? Why, now that he has become a follower of Christ, he cannot do too much. He put many saints in prison; now he goes into many prisons himself. He hunted them even to strange cities; and now he goes into all manner of strange cities himself. He dragged them before tribunals; and now he himself goes and stands before Roman proconsuls, and before the Roman emperor himself. Paul can never do too much for Christ, because he has done so much for the devil.

I remember one who lived four or five miles away from a place of worship, who used to say, "You old legs, it is no use being tired; for you have got to carry me. You used to take me to the place of amusement when I served the devil, and you shall carry me now to the house of God, that I may worship and serve Him." When sometimes he had an uneasy seat, he used to say, "It is no use grumbling, old bones, you will have to sit here, or else you will have to stand. Years ago you put up with all kinds of inconveniences when I went to the theatre, or some other evil place, when I served Satan; and you must be content to do the same now for a better Master, and a nobler service." I think some of us might take a lesson from that old man, and say to ourselves, "Come, covetousness, you are not going to hinder me from serving the Lord. I used to be liberal to the devil, and I do not intend now to be stingy to God." If ever I am tempted in that fashion, I will give twice as much as I had thought of doing, so as to spite the devil, for he shall not have his way with me.

Some, when they serve Satan, go as if they rode a race-horse, and whip and spur to get in first. How they will destroy body and soul in the service of the evil one; but if a Christian man gets a little lively they say, "Oh, dear me, dear me, he is excited, he is fanatical, he has grown enthusiastic." Why should he not be in earnest? The devil's servants are enthusiastic; and why should not the servants of Christ be the same? Black prince, black prince, art thou served by heroes, and shall Christ be served by dolts? Oh, let it not be so, my brethren. Surely if anything can wake up all the powers of our nature, if anything can make a lame man leap as a hart, if anything can make a palpitating, trembling heart to be bold and brave for Christ, it should be the love which Christ has shown in looking upon such as we were, and changing us by His grace.

"Ah, but you must not do too much," says one. Did you ever know anybody who did? If anybody ever does too much for Christ, let us rail off a piece in the cemetery that we may bury him in it. That grave will never be wanted; it will be empty till Christ comes. "Ah, but you may have too many irons in the fire." It depends upon the size of the fire. Get your fire well hot—I mean get your heart well hot, and your nature in a blaze; then put all the irons you can ever get into it. Keep them all at a white heat if possible. Blow away, and let the flames be very vehement.

Oh, to live for God a life of ecstatic zeal, even if it were only for a short space of time! It were better than to have a hundred years of bare existence, in which one went crawling along like a snail, leaving slime behind, and nothing else. It were better far than drivelling out, as oftentimes we do—

"Our souls can neither fly nor go
To reach eternal joys."

VI. Now, sixthly, I am sure that another inference that should be drawn from it is this: If we remember what we were, and how grace has changed us, it ought to make us very HOPEFUL ABOUT OTHER PEOPLE.

Paul was, for he says, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief. Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting." Well, friend, you are saved: then anybody can be. You never ought to despair of the salvation of any one, for you know yourself, and feel yourself to have been the most undeserving of men; and yet God's grace has really made you to love Him. Well, then, that grace can light on anybody. Already it has fallen on the most unlikely spot possible. Now, from this moment never indulge the idea that it is useless to attempt to benefit any of your fellow-men.

I recollect—indeed, I have often met with the circumstance of persons saying, "Why did you not ask So-and-so to attend a place of worship?" "Ask him? Oh, I never thought of him." "Why not?" "I did not think it was any use." It is a very singular thing that those are the kind of people who, if you do get them to hear the word, are generally converted—the people you think it is no use to bring. Men who have been accustomed to speak very disrespectfully of religious things when once brought under the sound of the truth are often the first to receive a blessing. Those are the kind of fellows to try at, for there is some hope of reaching men who are in such need of the Gospel we have to proclaim as they are. You know there is virgin soil there, so it is the very place to sow the good seed of the kingdom.

There is good fishing in a pond that never was fished in before; and here is a man who at any rate is not Gospel-hardened: he has not got used to the sound of the Word, so as to take no notice of anything that is said. Bring him in; he is the very man we want: bring him in. "But he is a swearer." Well, but if you were a swearer before your conversion, you ought never to say anything about that. "Oh, but he is a very hardened man." Yes; but if you were converted, notwithstanding what you were, you ought never to make that objection against any one. "Oh, but he is such a low-bred man." Well, there are plenty of us who cannot boast much about our aristocratic descent. "Oh, but," says one, "he is such a proud man, such a haughty man;" or, "he is a rich man; he is a purse-proud man." Yes, but there are others like him who have been brought in; and while that man has sinned in one way you have sinned in another way; and if the grace of God met your six it can meet his half-dozen.

Depend upon it, God meant us to be hopeful about other people when He saved us. See that man coming out of the hospital. He has had pretty nearly all the diseases you ever heard of, and yet he has been cured. He is not the man to say, "It is no use going in there, you will get no good by putting yourself under the treatment of that doctor;" on the contrary, whenever he meets with anybody who is suffering, he says, "You go and try the physician that healed me. If you can get a bed under his care, if you can come under his notice, you are almost certain to get cured; your maladies cannot be worse than mine, and he met my case exactly, and he can meet yours."

He is the man who will advertise Christ, and will proclaim His fame the whole world over—who has tasted that He is gracious, and has proved in his own case the converting power of the Holy Ghost. Oh, I pray you, dear friend, despair of nobody. You who go with your tracts, go into the worst houses; you who talk in the workhouses to those who are, perhaps, as far gone as any—who find them dying in the infirmary, and rejecting the word as you speak it, yet keep on; keep on. "Never say die" concerning any. Since the Lord has saved you, the grace of God can save anybody, however far he may have sunk in sin; it can reach even to the very vilest of the sons of men.

VII. The last inference is, that what God has done for us should confirm our —our confidence, not in ourselves, but in God, who will perfect that which He has begun in us. There is not half as much grace necessary to bring you to heaven if you are a believer as you have had already to bring you where you are. You have got to be perfected; but remember that it was the very first step that had the difficulty in it. It always reminds me of the legend of St. Denis, who picked up his head after it was cut off, and walked, I think, forty leagues with it. But a wit said that there was no trouble about walking forty leagues: the difficulty all lay in the first step. So it did; and so all the difficulty of the walk of faith lies in the first step—that first coming of a dead heart into life, that first bringing of a reprobate soul, a carnal mind that is in enmity against God, into friendship with God. Well, that has been done; that first great work has been wrought in you by God the Holy Ghost; and now you can say with the apostle, "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life."

Do you think the Lord ever converts a man with a view of showing him the light that he may go back again into the thick darkness forever? Does he drop a spark of heavenly light into our souls that it may go out never to be rekindled? Does he come and teach us to eat heavenly bread, and drink the water of life, and then leave us to starvation or die of thirst? Does He make us members of Christ's body, and then allow us to rot and decay? Has He brought us thus far to put us to shame? Has He given me a heart that cries after Him, and pines for Him; has He given me a sighing after perfection, an inward hunger after everything that is holy and true; and does He mean, after all, to desert me? It cannot be:

"His love in time past forbids me to think
He'll leave me at last in trouble to sink;
That gracious conversion I have in review,
Confirms his good pleasure to help me quite through."

So let us go on our way rejoicing that it shall be even so with each one of us. Amen.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

MRS. CRAPPIT'S GRIEVANCE.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

MRS. CRAPPIT had a grievance. It is true she generally had one. But this was so much a grievance that, by the side of it, all that she then had, or ever had, in fact, sank quite away into nothingness.

Would you like to hear what Mrs. Crappit's grievance was?

Nothing easier in the world. You have but to draw somewhere near her abode to hear all the ins and outs of the matter set as plainly before you as a free and easy tongue can do it. Mrs. Crappit has such a wonderful gift of expressing herself, and is so rarely at a loss for a word, that no one is better able than she to put you in possession of a fact. And, moreover, so loudly and distinctly is she able to speak that distance is even more favorable to the listener than nearness. Mrs. Crappit has also great powers of endurance, and can talk a very long time without being fatigued thereby; so you will not, I am sure, find it at all difficult to choose either time, place, or opportunity to gather what her grievance was.

"Was woman ever saddled with sich a man as I've got? There he sits soak, soak, soak all the day long at that there 'Blue Anchor.' Whatever possessed me to marry the feller I don't know. Here I've got to slave night and day to keep the house open and put bread into my children's mouths; and there's the old sot forever putting his hand to his mouth and a swallowing the beer. I sometimes wish I wor dead, that I do. And when I talks to him for his good, up he jumps, and puts hisself into such a tantrum, and looks that fierce, that I'm fit to jump out of my skin, that I am. And all the thanks I get for my good advice is that off he goes to the public again. I'm fit to drop now, that I am, with the wear and tear I've got to go through.

"He's a bad lot, is my man; and how I'm going to live with him much longer I don't know. Temperance! I wish somebody would come and try it on him. The sooner he's converted the better. I've tried my best. I've tried soft words, and I've tried sharp ones. But what's the good? He's worse than ever. And what call has that Mrs. Snow got to interfere between man and wife? Not talk so much indeed! I will talk. It's all a poor, weak, defenceless woman can do is to talk. Aggravate him! Well, and what if I do? Don't he deserve it? Don't he aggravate me? I should think I've lived long enough with my man to know how to treat him; and I should thank Mrs. Snow and all her lot to mind their own business, and not put their fingers into other people's pies."

I have stopped here, my readers. But Mrs. Crappit is going on, and won't stop for a long time. However, as it is in a great measure a repetition of what you have already heard, why continue it?

You will, doubtless, have gathered from Mrs. Crappit's remarks that her man Sam was a big, burly fellow, with tremendous muscles, and a very fierce expression of countenance. No such thing. He was a small, pale man, about half as small again as his angry spouse.

And I am bound also to confess, knowing Sam Crappit most intimately, that his character was not so bad as she was in the habit of representing it to be. True, he was a drunkard, and a very bad one; but it was only lately that he had become so. He used to take only a moderate glass at the "Blue Anchor" bar: but from one cause and another he had grown worse and worse. Some said he was driven there by Mrs. Crappit's tongue, and that, what with words and wet linen, which Mrs. Crappit would dry under his very nose, Sam was driven to take refuge at the "Blue Anchor." However, be the cause what it may, Sam had really gone wrong and spent most of his money in strong drink.

Look at the man now, staggering home; his hat pushed in, and all on one side; a great patch of dirt on the back of his coat, where he had just fallen down; and a smirk on his face, as though he were profoundly of the opinion that he was moving in a perfectly straightforward direction, and would take in Mrs. Crappit tremendously, so that she would certainly be deceived as to where he had been, and what he had been doing. He is an object of great delight to certain small boys, who are following him home.

"You'll catch it when you get home," they shout into his ear. "Oh, my! won't your missus lather you?"

At last Sam reached the door, and after vainly attempting to put his hat straight, and to screw himself up to as sober a condition as circumstances would permit, timidly knocked. It opened with a swing, and revealed Mrs. Crappit herself, who, immediately seizing her unfortunate husband by the collar, whisked him in, and shut the door with a bang that resounded through the street like a clap of thunder.

If we could, with propriety and respectability, have stood still for a few moments outside (no need whatever to put your ear to the door, or look through the key-hole as some of Sam's young sympathizers were doing), we should have been able to gather some fresh ideas as to Mrs. Crappit's treatment of her husband. We must content ourselves, however, with his young friend's account, that "Sam was a being talked to and scolded like anything!"

I have said that Mrs. Crappit's great wish was that somebody or other would try and convert Sam to quite a new way of life, and that she wouldn't mind his becoming even a teetotaler if it could by any means be accomplished. This was a great concession on her part, for in days gone by she had been known to say some very harsh things about teetotalers. She appears to have had a mean idea of them, and to have considered them rather weak and unmanly. Therefore you will see that her opinion had undergone a change, at least in her husband's case.

Now it so happened that this was also the great desire of her neighbors, Mrs. Snow and her husband. They had made an agreement, those two, sitting over the fire one evening, that while she looked after Mrs. Crappit, he could look after Sam Crappit; and not a few conversations on the subject of temperance had they each with their respective charges.

Their aim was, not merely to save the family from the drink curse, but to make it a decidedly Christian household, where the Lord Jesus Christ should be trusted in, loved, and served, as they themselves tried to do. Every day they went down upon their knees together and prayed for the unhappy home, asking for wisdom to act and speak to the best advantage.

"It's no good our trying, John, in our own strength. He's got all the wisdom and the power," his wife would say. And so they tried in the strength of the Strong One to save poor Sam, and to direct Sam's wife, watching for every opportunity to say a word, or do a kind action. John would wait about until Sam came back from work, and then joining him, would give him good advice, and quote his own experience how he had been saved from the drink, and how he had never been so well and so prosperous in his life.

"But," Sam would answer, "your wife's different from mine. Your wife don't talk to you like mine. Mine is always a jawing. And then when I gets home there's nowhere to sit. And what with the clothes a drying in front of the fire, and the slapping of the children, and the making of 'em squeal, and the talk, talk, talk, morning, noon, and night, why 'tain't in human nature to keep out of the public."

"I'll tell you what, Sam," said John Snow, a bright idea having just struck him, "if you'll come in and sit by our fire, me and my wife'll make you heartily welcome. Will you come? Say yes, now."

"Shan't I be in the way?" questioned Sam.

"Not a bit of it," responded his friend heartily.

"Well, I'll come; and I'll give up the drink into the bargain. When it ain't tidy at home I'll come in, that I will, and thank 'ee."

"Begin to-night," urged John; and Sam assented.

That night not a drop of strong drink crossed Sam Crappit's lips. The Snows could vouch for that, for he sat with them until after nine o'clock, and John himself saw him home. John had a double reason for accompanying him. He did it in order to see him safely past the "Blue Anchor," and also to acquaint Mrs. Crappit with the great change that had taken place in Sam's habits. When they had knocked, John's heart grew very sad as he noticed the rough way in which the door was opened, and the shrill tones with which she addressed her husband.

"Come back again, you sot!" she said. "Drunk as a pig, of course. Want me to take off your boots, I suppose, just as if I was your servant gal who hadn't nothink else to do. Come in, you miserable crittur. Don't stand gaping there."

Mrs. Crappit had not seen John Snow. But when she saw him she looked somewhat abashed, and said, "I wish my man was like you, Mr. Snow."

"Well, Mrs. Crappit," said John, "he's going to be. He's signed the pledge to-night, and I've come in to tell you so."

"Why, Mr. Snow, you've a'most took my breath away, said Mrs. Crappit, after an astonished pause. Then shaking her head somewhat doubtfully at Sam, as though she had but little faith in him, she said, "Well, I hope he'll keep it, that's all."

ARTHUR HAMILTON AND HIS WIDOWED MOTHER.

GERTRUDE HAMILTON was the widow of a British naval officer who had died shortly after his return from a long voyage. Her grief at the loss of one who had always been a loving and devoted husband was greatly increased by the thought that her only son Arthur, a bright boy of seven years, was thus left fatherless. Her heart was bound up with the welfare of the boy, and all that the wisdom of love and the love of wisdom could do to form his mind and to guide his conscience she did with prayerful and unwearied solicitude.

Very touching and memorable were the visits which Mrs. Hamilton and her son regularly paid to his father's grave. Accompanied by her executor, Mr. Townsend, or, as happened more frequently, alone, they often lingered about the spot, talking of Mr. Hamilton's wishes respecting the future of his son, or recalling some fondly-cherished recollection of the departed, in a tone inexpressibly tender and loving. Mrs. Hamilton would say, "Your father always believed that friends who go to heaven know each other there, and with his very latest breath he said to me, 'I shall be on the look-out for your arrival in the shining land, and for Arthur's too. We are but a small family; let us not think of it as broken up. I go a little while before, but you and dear Arthur will follow, will you not?'" The boy listened with open-hearted and intense interest to all such recollections of his father, and received impressions which, though apparently obliterated for a time, proved in after years to have become part of the very fibre of his character.

When he was old enough to enter as a student at Cambridge University, he found himself associated there with companions who, while observing the forms of religion, manifested utter ignorance of its spiritual nature and its practical power. With such surroundings, and under such difficulties, it was no wonder that Arthur lost something of the simplicity and guardedness which he had brought from home. A mind of more than common acuteness and activity rendered him especially open to the influence of young men of intellectual vigor, whose range of knowledge and experience was wider than his own. Here, too, the difficulties of which all thoughtful men in modern times feel the pressure began to take definite shape in his mind. Although he shrank from the thought of wounding the feelings of his mother, there had been here and there in his letters, and occasionally during the vacations, "a shadowed hint," which filled her with apprehension.

Mysterious are the ways of Providence! Who would not have thought that the loss of such a mother, at such a time, would be one of the greatest calamities that could befall one so situated. That loss did befall Arthur Hamilton, for a telegram summoned him to the deathbed of his mother.

She had almost come to her last gasp when he arrived, but, as if strengthened with preternatural energy, she addressed him in words to which all that is awful in the prospect of eternity lent solemn emphasis.

"Arthur," she said, "when you were a little boy you promised me that you would never forget your dear father's last request, that you and I would meet him in heaven. I am going to him, Arthur. Shall I tell him that you are cherishing the expectation of coming too, or that philosophy, falsely so called, has led you to abandon the hope you once cherished, and cast away the confidence in which is great recompense of reward? I know I shall see him there; what message shall I convey?"

Arthur buried his head in his hands and wept bitterly. He felt that the fascinating speculations which "lead to bewilder and dazzle to blind" are but an idle mockery when the fountain of the great deep of man's spirit is broken up. He could but give one answer—an answer which conveyed, though in broken words intermingled with sighs, the assurance that he would, with the help of God, walk in the footsteps of his father, and cling to his father's Saviour. His affections came to the aid of his faith, and he made the discovery which many had made before, and which all must make sooner or later, that even as an organ of spiritual knowledge the love of the heart is ever a surer guide than the deductions of the intellect.

THE BUDDING FIG-TREE.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Fig-tree a Symbol of the Jewish Nation—The Budding of it a Sign of the End—Budding Evinced by—1. Position of the Jews—2. Increased Interest in the Land of Israel—3. Political Importance of the Jews—4. Growing Spirit of Persecution Against them—Anti-Jewish Feeling in Germany Shared by Court and People—Bismarck's Opinion of a Jew—The Three Demon-Powers Identified with—1. Militarism; 2. Infidelity; 3. Spirit of Persecution.

IT is generally agreed among students of unfulfilled prophecy that in the "fig-tree" spoken of in the parable, Luke 21: 29–31, as in that other barren "fig-tree" upon which our Lord pronounced His solemn judgment (Matt. 21: 19, 20), we are to recognize a symbol of the Jewish nation. And by the shooting forth of its early leaves, indicating as they do the near approach of the genial and prolific season of summer, we are of course to understand such various signs of reviving vitality in the nation itself, as well as such increased interest manifested toward it by other nations, as shall supply unquestionable evidence that the long winter of Israel's spiritual rejection and political abasement is drawing to a close, and the millennial season of her exaltation and glory even at the door.

Now the object of the following article is to show that among the many evidences that the shadows of are rapidly gathering around us, and darkening into the brief but terrible night of the last great tribulation, this of the budding of the Jewish fig-tree is not wanting. For, as has been truly said, the special and most conclusive proof that we have not only entered upon but advanced far into the last days is to be found not so much in the appearance of this particular sign or the other, but in the simultaneousness with which all the predicted signs are manifesting themselves, all the lines of prophetic evidence converging to a single point of time, which point of time seems to lie immediately before us.

Behold, then, the budding of the fig-tree; or, to speak without figure, let us observe some of the most striking signs of Israel's rejuvenescence as they manifest themselves in the character of the eventful days in which our lot is cast.

I. In the first place, we may surely point, as one of the signs of the budding of the fig-tree, to the very prominent position which the Jews have come to occupy during the last fifty years—a position much more prominent than during any previous period since the long centuries of their dispersion and tribulation commenced. It is not too much to say that during the present century the Jew has, in Europe at least, from an object of contempt and oppression became one of envy and fear. This result is no doubt due in some measure to the accumulation by certain Jews—more especially by one family, whose name has become a very synonym for a millionnaire—of such vast wealth as has made them practically

THE BANKERS OF EUROPE.

There must also be taken into account, however, the emancipation laws passed in favor of the Jews in various countries, and the consequent improvement in their social position. Nor must we omit to notice the remarkable abilities and genius which have in recent times raised Jews to the very highest positions alike in the political, scientific, literary, and artistic world.

We have had eminent Jewish statesmen, Jewish philosophers, Jewish generals, Jewish authors, Jewish artists, and even Jewish theologians. In a word, we may say that the Jewish fig-tree has blossomed intellectually in a manner giving splendid promise of the nation's fitness, in this respect as in others, to fill the position of earthly supremacy to which it is destined in the coming days.

II. Again, we may point, as another indication of the budding of the Jewish fig-tree, to the increased interest in the land of Israel which has of late been so remarkably exhibited. Who has not heard of the Palestine Exploration work, and the many interesting discoveries thereby elicited; the various schemes, both Jewish and Gentile, for the agricultural improvement and colonization of Palestine; the Euphrates Valley Railway, and various others, whereby the whole country would be opened up and brought into easy communication with surrounding countries? All these, to say nothing of the fact that a tour to the Holy Land is now as ordinary a thing as was a tour to Paris sixty years ago, assuredly furnish a striking fulfilment of the prophet's words: "Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion: for the time to favor her, yea,

"THE SET TIME, IS COME.

For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof" (Psalm 102: 13, 14).

III. Another very significant sign of the shooting forth of the Jewish fig-tree is to be found in the fact that, owing to the rapid decline of the Turkish Empire, and the gradual breaking-up and re-formation of the countries of which it was composed, the Jewish nation has become of some political importance. The kings and statesmen by whom Europe is governed, in their various and conflicting schemes for the partition of the "sick man's" remaining goods when his final hour has come, are now compelled to take Palestine into account. It will, perhaps, be found that the only practical solution of the great Eastern Question lies in the restoration of Israel to his own land, a work which, it seems highly probable to many students of prophecy, England may find herself called upon to effect, in accordance with that remarkable prophecy in Isaiah 18: "Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia: that sendeth ambassadors by the sea, even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters, saying, Go, ye swift messengers, to a nation scattered and peeled, to a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled," etc.

IV. But there is yet another indication of the budding of the Jewish fig-tree at the present time which is very remarkable, and to which we desire here to direct special attention, and that is the growing spirit of hatred and persecution against the Jews which is manifesting itself in many parts of Europe, and more especially in Germany. In Servia and Roumania, as well as in Bulgaria, the Jew has long been hated and oppressed, and this feeling of hatred has of late years been increased by the known sympathy of the Jews with the Turkish cause. In Russia, also, the Jews have always been subject to cruel oppression, and in that vast empire again the national feeling against them has been intensified by their actual, or supposed, complicity in the recent Nihilistic movement; indeed, they are widely believed to have been the chief instigators of it. In Germany, however, the present political movement against them, which threatens speedily to develop itself in actual persecution, owes its origin to other causes, and is every way more significant, as we shall endeavor to point out. But before doing this there are one or two very interesting facts in reference to the present condition of Israel which we desire to bring under notice.

when viewed in connection with their divinely-revealed restoration to their own land, is worthy of our attention. It is computed by the best authorities that there are about SEVEN MILLIONS of Jews at present in the world. Now it is certainly a very remarkable fact that of these seven millions not far from FIVE MILLIONS are to be found in Russia, Austria, Turkey, Germany, in Asia, and in certain parts of Africa bordering on the Mediterranean. In Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain, Sweden, and even America, the Jews are comparatively few in number. And yet, while they enjoy the most complete liberty in the western countries of Europe, and are still subject to persecution and degradation in the eastern, it is to the eastern that they most tenaciously cling.

The Slav has ever been the persecutor of the Jew, but, nevertheless, it is in Slav countries that the most cherished haunts of the Jews are to be found. So that, in point of fact, the Jews may still be regarded, not merely by descent and religion, but also by habitation, as an Eastern people. How is this to be accounted for? "It cannot be attributable," says a recent able writer, "to lack of enterprise, or unwillingness to push fortune in strange lands, or to incapacity of assimilation with foreign habits and customs.

has to be sought."

And what is this "further and deeper solution?" At least two elements in it seem to be discernible. On the one hand may we not discern the Divine intention in thus keeping this ancient people more or less in the vicinity of their future home, so that when God shall give the signal they may the more readily and rapidly obey it? God wants them to be, so to speak, "at hand" when His "set time to favor Zion" shall have come; and therefore He retains them, by the invisible but powerful influence of an unconscious patriotism, from wandering too far away—the land exercising a secret magnetic influence over those who are yet again to inherit it.

And as one Divine purpose is thus answered by keeping the Jews for the most part in Eastern lands, so is another met by so ordering it that these are the very countries in which they are the most despised and persecuted. "The people shall dwell alone" is at once the Divine purpose and prediction concerning them; they must, in order that their great destiny may be worked out, remain unmingled with other peoples; and this end is most effectually attained by putting enmity between them and the nations among whom they dwell, this enmity tending necessarily to the isolation of the Jews, and begetting on their part a corresponding repulsion; so that union and absorption becomes morally, as well as socially, impossible.

(To be concluded.)

A Hymn that Saved Life.—When the Seawanhaka was burning in the Sound last summer, one of the Fisk University singers, who was on board with his wife, cast himself into the waves, bidding his wife cling to his shoulders when in the water. She obeyed, until her strength becoming exhausted, she said, "I can hold on no longer!" "Try a little longer," was the response of the wearied and agonized husband; "let us sing 'Rock of Ages.'" And as the sweet strains floated over those troubled waters, reaching the ears of the sinking and dying, they encouraged others also fighting for life.

Soon in the distance a boat was seen approaching! Singing still, they laid hold of the life-boat, upon which they were borne in safety to land. This is no fiction; it was related by the singer himself, who said he "believed Toplady's sweet 'Rock of Ages' saved many another besides himself and wife."

A Ride to Bethany.

ALICE had never heard Evelyn speak of religion before, and had no idea how much she was changed since she had seen her last. She would have turned the conversation to some other subject if Evelyn had not spoken.

"You look surprised, Alice," she said; "you did not expect me to say that, did you?"

"No, indeed," said Alice, laughing; "I thought that both you and I were quite free from all sentimental nonsense. I am afraid Miss Lindsay has been talking you over to her way of thinking."

"Is it nonsense?" said Evelyn, gravely, passing over Alice's last words; "because if it is not nonsense, surely it is a great reality!"

"Oh, I don't know," said Alice, lightly: "Claude says the greater part of religion is nonsense, and I suppose he ought to know; he has studied the matter, and I have not."

"Oh, Alice," said Evelyn, with tears in her eyes, "if you only knew how very, very happy I have been lately! I never knew before that it was possible to be as happy as I am now!"

"That may be," said Alice, "and I am not happy. Sometimes I am miserable," she said, bitterly, with that grave, sad expression that I had seen on her face once before; "but still I cannot help agreeing with Claude, that it is better not to be comforted at all, than to get comfort out of a lie."

"Oh yes," I said, "Mr. Ellis is quite right in that; but the whole question turns on this: Is the Bible Satan's lie, or God's truth? It must surely be either the one or the other."

"Well," said Alice, lightly, "it is too hot to enter into a theological discussion. I will call the dragoman and get him to send us some lemonade: our cook makes it splendidly."

"Poor Alice!" said Evelyn, when we were left alone in the tent.

"Yes," I said, "she is very much to be pitied for she is not comfortable in her unbelief; she has doubts even about her own doubting."

Alice came back to tell us that the gentlemen had planned a ride to the Mount of Olives, and the dragoman had gone to hire horses for the whole party, so that we might start together from the Damascus Gate as soon as it began to be a little cooler.

Meanwhile Mr. Stanley guided us to our hotel. We went back a different way, keeping outside the city, till we reached the Jaffa Gate. Sir William and I walked first, and Mr. Stanley and Evelyn followed, but as Sir William was reading his guide-book, which he kept open in his hand and consulted as he walked along, I had much time for thought, and once or twice I could not help overhearing the conversation which was going on behind me.

"So you know Lord Moreton, Miss Trafford?" I heard Mr. Stanley say.

"Yes; papa knows him very well, and he likes him very much," said Evelyn, laughing.

"And you do not?" said Mr. Stanley, gravely.

"Oh, I don't dislike him," said Evelyn; "only I think him very stupid and uninteresting."

I thought Sir William must have heard this remark, but if he heard it he took no notice of it, but appeared to be deep in his book.

"Lord Moreton stupid! Lord Moreton uninteresting!" repeated Mr. Stanley; "then excuse my saying, Miss Trafford; that if that is your opinion, I am sure you do not know Lord Moreton: no one who really knew him would ever come to such a conclusion."

Mr. Stanley had spoken rather warmly, and Evelyn said in an apologetic tone: "I am very sorry, Mr. Stanley. I see Lord Moreton is a friend of yours; I did not know you knew him at all."

"Yes," he said, smiling, "we were college friends, and have been like brothers ever since. I think I may say that I know Lord Moreton better than any one else knows him, and the more I know him, so much the more I respect him and love him."

"He always seems to me to be so shy and awkward," said Evelyn.

"Yes, so he is with strangers," said Mr. Stanley; "he is a highly nervous man; it is his infirmity, and he knows it; but if he can only shake off his nervousness, he is quite another man. I wish you could have heard him address a meeting of undergraduates the other day, you would not have believed it was the same man."

"Addressing them! On what subject?' asked Evelyn, now more astonished than ever.

"Oh, about personal religion. Lord Moreton has a wonderful power with young men. He is not at all nervous when speaking to them. It is you ladies that make him so shy," said Mr. Stanley, laughing; "you are such formidable beings!"

"Well, I am surprised!" said Evelyn; "I could not have believed it, if you had not told me. And he is a real Christian? I am very glad to hear it."

"Yes," said Mr. Stanley, "he is a man who lives very near to his God; and his one desire and aim is to bring all under his influence to the Saviour. Indeed," he added, in a lower voice, "if it had not been for Lord Moreton, Miss Trafford, I should have been to this day a man of the world; it was his words and his example which first made me decide for Christ."

I could hear no more, for we had reached the Jaffa Gate, and had passed into the noisy square in front of the Tower of David.

Whether Sir William had overheard the conversation I did not know. He looked very pleased and half amused as it was going on; but perhaps he may have been reading some interesting anecdote in his guide-book.

Mr. Stanley left us at the Tower of David, and we went to the hotel to rest until the evening.

It was still very hot when we started from the Damascus Gate and rode in the direction of the Mount of Olives.

"What a wretched little hillock it is!" said Claude, as we drew near to it. "It does not deserve the name of hill, much less of mountain."

But to most of us this "wretched little hillock" was the most sacred spot on earth. There was no doubt about its identity; "the mountain on the east side of the city" could not be mistaken for any other. No vain superstition, no improbable legend had fixed upon this hill as the place where our Lord's feet had so often trod. The hand of time, and the cruel devastations of war, which had laid low the beautiful temple, and made Jerusalem a heap of ruins, had not been able to obliterate this spot, nor to make us doubtful as to whether it were indeed the same Mount of Olives of which we had read so often in the Gospels.

We crossed the Valley of Jehoshaphat, passed the wall of the so-called Gethsemane, and began to ascend one of the steep, stony paths which led across the mountain to Bethany.

"Do you know, Miss Lindsay," said Mr. Stanley, "that these paths, on the hill sides, are probably less changed than anything in the whole country? They must have gone in the same direction years ago, and this is, without doubt, the very road our Lord's feet so often trod to and from the city on His way to Martha's house."

I felt as if it were almost too sacred ground. I did not answer him, for I could not have done so without tears. So we rode on in silence, a little way behind the others, and Evelyn told me afterward she would have been very thankful to have been with us, for Claude and Alice were laughing and talking the whole way, telling amusing stories of things and people in England, and taking little or no notice of the scenes and places around them. The Mount of Olives was nothing to them!

Mr. Stanley rode forward as we came to a turn in the road on the shoulder of the hill, and made them all stop and look round at the city: for it is at this place that, when coming from Bethany, Jerusalem first comes in sight, and there, he said, must have been the very spot on which our Lord stood when "He beheld the city and wept over it."

Evelyn came close to me and whispered, "Oh, May, I cannot help it, the tears will come; let us go a little way off by ourselves; Claude and Alice will chatter so."

We got off our horses, and left them with the dragoman, and went a short distance from the road to a clump of olive trees; and here we stood, looking down upon the city. If our Lord wept as He gazed on it in its glory, because He saw, in the far distance, the shadow of ruin and desolation creeping toward it, how much more should we weep, who saw the once beloved city, the joy of the whole earth, made a very curse among men!

"Look forward as well as backward," said Mr. Stanley's voice behind us.

"Forward to what?" Evelyn asked.

"Forward to that day when the Lord will no longer weep over Jerusalem, but will rejoice over her. Do you remember that passage in Isaiah 65: 'Be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in My people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying.' You see the Lord will rejoice in Jerusalem Himself, and call upon us to rejoice with Him; and surely those who have been one with Him in His sorrow will be the ones whom He will call to rejoice with Him in His joy."

"Doesn't it remind you of the shepherd's joy," I said, "as he brought back his lost sheep, rejoicing himself, and calling together his friends, saying to them, 'Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost?'"

"Yes, indeed," said Mr. Stanley; "I never thought of that; the two passages are wonderfully alike."

"Oh, Mr. Stanley," said Evelyn, as he turned round, "must we go? It is so delightful to be here."

"I think we must come again another day, by ourselves," said Mr. Stanley, in a whisper, "your friends are rather impatient to be moving; they find very little to interest them on the Mount of Olives."

"I am not surprised," said Evelyn; "half the Bible they do not believe in, and the other half they do not care for, but, oh dear, I do wish they had not come with us; I did not think we should feel it so much."

Evelyn went on, reluctantly, to join her father. Mr. Stanley stayed behind a moment, and gathered a spray of olive-leaves, which he gave to me and asked me to keep it, "as a remembrance of the place, and of our coming here together." I have that spray of olive-leaves now, and shall keep it as long as I live.

So we went on to Bethany. The road must have taken the same course in our Lord's time, for there is a deep valley, and the road runs at its head. And it must have looked just the same then, with the same wild flowers growing by the wayside, the same blue mountains of Moab in front and the same green valley beneath. Mr. Stanley pointed out to me some fig-trees, growing close to the road, just as they did when the Saviour, hungry with His long walk from Bethany, searched among the leaves for fruit to refresh Him on the way.

I had had no idea before that it was so far from Jerusalem to Bethany. He must have been very weary as He went backward and forward every day of that last, sad week of His life on earth. Only once do we read of Him riding; it was all on foot, in the weariness and heat of the day, with the same sun beating on His head as was shining on us at that very moment.

And then, as I rode at Mr. Stanley's side, he reminded me of that last walk, when He led His disciples out as far as to Bethany, and we wondered if, as they trod this road, they knew that He was so soon to leave them, and that it was the last walk that they would take with Him. If so, surely they must have been very sorrowful, surely their hearts must have been so full of the parting with Him that they must have lost sight, for a little time, of the blessing that parting was to bring to them, and the realisation of which was so soon to make them return, by that very road, to Jerusalem, "with great joy, praising and blessing God."

I never enjoyed anything so much as that ride to Bethany; it was very quiet and peaceful, for Sir William and Claude were some way in front with the dragoman, and Evelyn, who rode next with Alice, was not much inclined for conversation, and kept her laughing companion tolerably still, so that we were not interrupted in our quiet talk together.

Then we came to Bethany, a miserable, wretched dirty village, and here a troop of squalid Arabs came out of their houses to look at us, and to beg of us, and a number of noisy dogs barked, and howled, and jumped up at our horses' heads, and we were very glad to get as quickly as possible out of the narrow, filthy street, and gradually to ascend the eastern side of the Mount of Olives.

"I think the Ascension must have taken place somewhere here," said Mr. Stanley; "it would be just far enough away from the noise of the village, and such a likely place for them to come to."

A lovely view was spread out before us; the village of Bethany lay at our feet, and then there stretched far away the great wilderness of Judea, and, beyond it, in the far distance, the fertile plain of the Jordan, like a line of silver running into the deep blue Dead Sea. Then the view was shut in by the grand Moab mountains, standing out like a wall against the sky.

"This is very fine!" said Claude, as we stood looking at it; "this is well worth coming to see!" It was the same view that Lot had gazed on, yet where were the cities of the plain which he had seen in their glory?"

Then we crossed over the top of the mountain, and began to descend the western side, by the very path which David took when fleeing from Absalom, when we read he climbed up the ascent barefoot, and with his head covered, weeping, as he went, at the ingratitude and cruelty of his son.

We had a different view now, and yet a very beautiful one. The city of Jerusalem was lying at our feet, nestling among the hills.

SIMEON AND THE CHILD JESUS.

S.S. Lesson for January 30. Luke 2: 25–33. Golden Text, verse 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHEN the Lord Jesus was eight days old He was circumcised like any other Jewish child, and the name which the angel Gabriel had commanded Mary, the name of Jesus, was given Him. When God gave Abraham the covenant of circumcision, He charged him, "Walk before Me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17: 1); but only in Abraham's "Seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3: 16), was the command carried out in the Spirit and to the very letter; the Lord Jesus walked before His Father, and He was perfect. "In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circircumcision of Christ' (Col. 2: 11). God's covenant with Abraham was in his flesh (Gen. 17: 13); His covenant with us is in Christ's flesh. Through the suffering of Christ in the flesh, from His circumcision until His death, "the body of the sins of the flesh" in us is put off, and by faith we have put off self and put on Christ, and He by one offering hath perfected for ever them which are sanctified (Heb. 10: 14).

"And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished (Lev. 12: 2), they brought Him to Jerusalem, to present Him to the Lord." Our blessed Lord must then have been exactly forty days old. Thus He was forty days on earth before He, as a Son of Adam, was presented to the Lord according to the law of the firstborn, He was forty days fasting and tempted in the desert, and forty days on earth after His resurrection. God claimed all the first-born as His special possession: "For all the first-born of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast, on the day that I smote every first-born in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself" (Num. 8: 17).

"And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ." It is probable that this old man was little known in Jerusalem although well known in heaven. "Just and devout," was this the characteristic of the religion of his day? Many there were in his time who did their works "to be seen of men" who made "broad their phylacteries," and enlarged "the borders of their garments," who for a pretence made long prayers, who built the tombs of the prophets and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, who paid tithe of mint and anise, and cummin but "omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith" (Matt. 23). "Judgment, mercy and faith" were the atmosphere in which Simeon breathed, he was a just man towards men, and a devout man towards God; and so is every one of whom it can be said, the Holy Ghost is upon him.

Such men waited then for the consolation of Israel, such are the "blessed and holy" ones who wait for God's Son from heaven (Rev. 20: 6; 1 Thess. 1: 10). This was a man who understood the language of the Holy Ghost. English, French, German, Spanish, Italian, Latin, Greek and Hebrew are learned in the schools, but there is only one school where men can learn the language of the Holy Ghost, and He Himself is the Teacher. He told Simeon "that he should not see death until he had seen the Lord's Christ." O how many Christians there are who long for this clear direction of the Holy Ghost. But let us remember that the Holy Ghost does not serve our ends, but Christ's; does not glorify us, but Christ; does not lend Himself to us that He may guide us for our comfort, but He possesses us that He may guide us for Christ's sake. To be guided by the Holy Ghost, we must cease to have preconceptions or predilections, we must yield ourselves to the Holy Ghost.

Simeon knew that God would not deceive him, he knew that neither sickness nor accident could bring him to the grave until "he had seen the Lord's Christ." Old age could only bring his long-cherished hope nearer, he counted on the Word of his God. "And he came by the Spirit into the temple." Some might have said it was pure imagination, that God did not speak in the present day as He did to the prophets of old, and that it was presumption in Simeon to think that He did, and they might have regarded him as a superstitious man, or as one half fallen into dotage; but he knew the Spirit's voice and followed it. Some may say, "But are there not many enthusiasts who have arisen, and laid claim to be led by the Holy Ghost, and they have fallen into all kinds of error and extravagance." This is only too sadly true; but such can never be the case when self is laid down, and when every thought is brought into captivity to "the obedience of Christ" (2 Cor. 10: 5).

When Simeon "came by the Spirit into the temple," there was nothing in what he found there to gratify the eye of sense. A helpless infant in the arms of a poor woman, and Joseph the carpenter with her, this was all. Could he recognize in such utter helplessness, the Lord's Anointed? Yes, he had God's Word for it, and faith demands no more. To this little babe God had given "a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2: 9–11). "Then took he Him up in his arms, and blessed God and said, Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, according to Thy Word: for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." Simeon's only warrant for his faith was the Word of the God who cannot lie. Have we a like faith? When God tells us that His Word shall not return unto Him void, do we expect results from the preaching of it? When He says of His Church, "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16: 18), do we expect the power of Satan to give way before God's people? Who of us is counting certainly upon the undoubted fulfilment of God's written Word?

Simeon's eyes had now fulfilled their mission, "mine eyes have seen Thy salvation;" nothing now hindered him from dying the death of a man of God. He saw by the eye of faith that which the twelve apostles after three years' intercourse with Jesus had not learned, that the salvation of God's Christ was not to be confined to the Jews. The teaching of Jesus on earth, and His teaching during the forty days which followed the resurrection, and even the baptism of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, had not sufficed to teach Peter this lesson; he needed a special visitation by a vision at Joppa to make him understand it. But Simeon said of Christ's salvation, "Which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of Thy people Israel." Israel might indeed have the glory, for "salvation is of the Jews" (John 4: 22), but all people should share in its light. "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be my Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be My salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Isa. 49: 6).

"Joseph and His mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of Him," they were not yet prepared to understand all the honor which God put upon them. "And Simeon blest them," "the less is blest of the better" (Heb. 7: 7). Thus Mary, although she was the mother of Jesus, did not bless, but was blest by, old Simeon. And he said unto her, "Behold, this Child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel." Did he mean that they should stumble, that He should be to them a stumblingstone, because they looked for a reigning and conquering Messiah? Or did he mean the death and resurrection of which all who believe in Him must partake? "And for a sign which shall be spoken against." Such is Jesus, such is His truth, unpopular, unrecognized in the world, because to the pride of human nature it is so unpalatable. ("Yea, a sword shall pierce through thine own soul also), that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." Mary's heart should be pierced by the death of Jesus, and the thoughts of many hearts, their thoughts of God, and their thoughts of themselves should be exposed, and brought out prominently to view, when tested by the death of the Lord Jesus.

One other was there who recognized God's Christ, the Saviour, in the little babe. She was a prophetess and a widow. She must have known the power of the Spirit of God as Simeon did, for it is by the Spirit that the gift of prophecy is given (1 Cor. 12: 8–10). Anna was an old woman, perhaps too aged to engage in much active service for the Master, perhaps so ripe in her soul that she had learned the best service was in intercession; thus she "departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day." How little is the ministry of intercession understood among us! How few men or women give themselves to a life of prayer! How few there are who could do so, who understand enough of God's heart, and of the real needs around them, to bear a continual burden of God's interests upon them! How few there are who have so experienced the working of God's mighty hand, that they have confidence enough in Him to stand in the Name of Christ on the side of His Word, to pray for and count upon its fulfilment in spite of all the torrent of unbelief, indifference, and sin which has sunk the Christianity of our day to such a level that we find many comparing its results to those of Buddhism and Mahometanism!

"She coming in that instant, gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spake of Him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem." Like Simeon, she saw all things after the Spirit and not after the flesh, she did not look upon Simeon as a visionary, the same Holy Ghost was in them both, and the communion of saints which subsists by the Spirit of God was to them a blessed and realized experience. Not only did she herself believe that she saw the Lord's Anointed but "she spake of Him." Much useless conversation would be avoided if we "spake of Him." Anna did not relate her own experience or speak of the results of her prophesying, Himself filled her horizon, "and out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," thus she spake of Him. She seems to have had Godly fellowship with a little band who looked for redemption in Jerusalem. A little unknown group of believers whose heart and whose treasure was not on earth. To these Anna went and spake of Him, to these she confided the glad intelligence that the Saviour of the world was born. My reader, have you the spirit of a Simeon or an Anna?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Deadlock in the British Parliament has been produced by the tactics of Mr. Parnell and his friends. On the day of the opening of the session, the Home Rule leader gave notice that he should move an amendment to the address which it is customary for the House of Commons to present in reply to the Queen's speech. The amendment related to the threat of coercion, and declared that "peace cannot be promoted by a suspension of the Constitution." It is usual to vote the address promptly, but the policy of obstruction has again been called into play, and it was not until Friday, January 14th, that a vote on Mr. Parnell's amendment was reached. Then it was negatived by a vote of 435 to 57. There are other amendments still to be debated before the address can be voted and the ordinary business of the session commenced. It is expected that some stringent measure of authority will have to be put in force before the obstruction is quelled.

An Explosion in the Barracks at Salford, near Manchester, England, on January 14th, it is suspected, was effected by Fenians. The rifles of the volunteer rifle corps were kept in the building, and there were several thousand stand of arms there at the time. There was a ventilator in the wall between the shed of the barracks and the street, and one theory is that the explosive material was dropped through this ventilator. It is also asserted that the regiment now quartered in the barracks contains many Irish, and that Fenianism had been previously suspected among them. A fuse was found in the ground near the shed, and the explosion forced a hole through the outer wall of the barracks large enough to admit a man. The barracks are situated in a very populous district, and one woman was seriously, and a boy, it is feared, fatally, injured, but no arms were stolen.

France, Almost Alone Among European Nations, appears to be enjoying a period of prosperity. In 1870–71 she had a baptism of misfortunes; suffered a mighty invasion and a crushing defeat; had to pay all its extraordinary war expenses and some two hundred millions as an indemnity to Germany; and passed through the agonies of a revolution by overturning a corrupt Imperial system and building up a republic on new foundations. The increase in revenue in France during the year now terminated is sufficient to enable the Government to take off one hundred and twenty millions of francs ($12,000,000) without endangering the equilibrium of the Budget. Thus side by side with the decay of Austria and the industrial depression and social sufferance of Germany—two of the oldest monarchies of Europe—we see the expanding industries, the diminishing debts, and the reviving hopes of the young republic.

Germany and the Turkish Question.—For some time Prince Bismarck seemed anxious to persuade the world that he and his country took very little interest in the Eastern Question. But recently German officials are being summoned to Constantinople for consultation; at the last moment Germany played a leading part in securing the transfer of Dulcigno; and she is now using all her influence to bring about a pacific solution of the problem relating to Greece. The secret of this change probably lies in German jealousy and fear of Russia. Prince Bismarck's policy aims at preventing Russian aggrandizement in Turkey. There is the difficulty as to the Power which shall succeed the Turkish government when it falls to pieces. Russia plainly intends, if she can, to extend her empire to the Bosphorus; but Germany cannot afford to let her gratify her ambition. As England appears, under Mr. Gladstone's policy, to assist rather than to oppose Russia, Prince Bismarck takes up the work Lord Beaconsfield was obliged to lay down.

A Dispute Between the Pope and the Portuguese Government on the subject of marriage ceremonies has threatened the existence of the amicable relations which for so long a period have existed between the two Powers. The Government of Portugal resolved to legalize civil marriages. The Nuncio insisted that, in case of a civil contract, the religious ceremony should precede it, and should be the only valid one. This the Portuguese Government absolutely refused, but offered as a compromise, that both marriages should be absolutely requisite, giving precedence in time to the religious ceremony. The Pope has accepted this offer, which gives him the power he desires of rendering the services of the priest necessary to a valid marriage.

An Incident Related in a Letter by Charles Russell, M.P., to the London Times illustrates the evils of which the Irish tenantry complain. On an Irish land-owner's estate was a piece of land which spade had never entered. An industrious man applied for permission to occupy it, and it was granted on his paying a rental of $35 a year. The tenant built his homestead upon it, he fenced it, did such drainage as was needed, and after years of toil brought it into a state of decent cultivation. He died last year. His widow, finding herself unable to work the land, desired to sell her interest, which would, she thought, bring her a considerable sum. There were many people who would pay her a premium for the privilege of occupying the highly-cultivated land at the rental of $35. But the land-owner refused to let it at that rate any longer, and demanded $75, its market value. Thus he prevented the widow realizing the results of her husband's energy and industry.

Afghanistan.—The Position of Abdhul Rahman, whom England made Ameer of Afghanistan, would appear from the latest intelligence from Cabul to be still very insecure. He is still pushing on the enlistment of soldiers and the manufacture of arms, and has imprisoned the Mir Butcha chief, whose name was a year ago so familiar as one of the leaders of the antagonistic Yakoob faction. Sirdar Yassuf Khan, formerly the Governor of Cabul, is also arrested, and Sirdar Shere Mahommed Khan has been banished to Turkestan for disrespectful conduct in a durbar. The Ameer is said, moreover, to have been unsuccessful in an attempt to collect the arrears of revenue for the last two years, and to be somewhat unpopular with the people. Thus the settlement effected by England at the cost of so much blood and treasure is already in jeopardy.

The Elections in France Held Last Week register a decided gain to the party led by Gambetta. Over two million voters cast their ballots, and the gain of the Republicans over Radicals, Monarchists, and Bonapartists amounted to three hundred seats. It was expected that the expulsion of the Jesuits and the closing of their schools would have entailed on the Government a loss of popularity, especially in the rural districts, but these elections show that the republican form of government still maintains its hold on the confidence of the people.

The Greeks are Clamoring for War with Turkey, but it is believed that the King of Greece, who is aware of the relative strength of the two countries, is averse to entering on the conflict, especially as he hopes to attain his object by peaceable measures. It is once more reported, and this time from Paris, that the European Powers have finally decided upon the arbitration scheme, and that the French minister at Athens has been instructed to declare that the Berlin Congress conferred no rights upon Greece, and that if the Greek Government goes to war it must not count upon the support of France.

The Paris Temps counsels the Powers to concert a solemn collective declaration that Greece has misconstrued the bearing of the decisions of the Berlin Conference, and defining their real character. The Temps says such a declaration would give the King of the Hellenes the power he needs for resisting the popular current.

Mr. Campbell, the Daring Blind Man, who recently ascended Mont Blanc, states that he was born in Tennessee in 1834, and was for eleven years the friend and co-worker of Dr. S. G. Howe, of Boston, the eminent philanthropist and instructor of the blind. In 1871, after spending some time in Germany, he visited London, where he was so much impressed with the deplorable condition of the thirty thousand helpless blind of Great Britain, that he resolved to do what he could to alleviate their condition. The prejudice he had to encounter was as mountainous as Mont Blanc or the Matterhorn, but he has gradually overcome it, and now between 80 and 90 per cent of the pupils are independent, active, and useful members of society. He has often taken his pupils on long excursions. He once chartered a schooner and went out to sea on a fishing voyage of several days. In his London institution he compels them to engage in vigorous athletic sports, even in skating, which is systematically taught. In this way he has elevated both the brain and the physique of his blind pupils, and has succeeded not only in making them forget their misfortunes, but in becoming proficient in the art of music.

The Poor of Bristol, England, are Receiving assistance to emigrate from Mr. Budgett, a merchant of that city, who is the son of the well-known philanthropic Christian tradesman, whose memoir under the title of "The Successful Merchant" was widely circulated here and in England a few years ago. He has acquired a large tract of land to the south of Lake Superior, and is colonizing it from among the industrious and frugal inhabitants of his native city who are unable to earn a livelihood there.

Papal Hypocrisy.—Among the Papers of the late Cardinal Antonelli, the chief minister of the late Pope, has been found a letter written by Victor Emmanuel to Pius IX. at the time of the occupation of Rome by the Italian troops. The King says in it that he thought he was rendering a service to the Church by occupying the city in a regular manner, instead of leaving it a prey to the revolution. On this passage there is a marginal note in the hand of Pius IX., to the effect that he quite comprehends this reasoning, and is grateful to the King, but that before the world it is necessary for him to protest. What can be thought of a man who esteemed the world's opinion so highly that he simulated a passion he did not feel?

The Czar of Russia and his Son, the Czarewitch, are reported to have been completely reconciled, and there is now no further talk of an abdication of the Emperor Alexander, and the position of the Czar's new wife is acknowledged in society. From the beginning of the new year the Czarewitch is to be associated with his father in the government of the Empire, but the Czar will retain complete control over Russia's foreign policy.

The World's Bill for Intoxicating Liquors.— The New York Evening Post says that in the year 1879 there was paid out for intoxicating drinks by the people of Germany the sum of $650,000,000, and by those of France $580,000,000, of Great Britain, $750,000,000, and of the United States, $720,000,000—making a grand total of $2,700,000,000.

The First Missionaries Landed in New Zealand about half a century ago. Now, says Sir George Grey, ex-Governor of the province, out of a native population of 100,000 persons, there are not over 1000 who do not make a profession of Christianity. There is a readiness to contribute one tenth of the produce of their labor for the support of their Christian teachers, and to make liberal grants of lands for the endowment of schools. Most of the work has been done by the Church Missionary Society.

IN a sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 17th, 1880, some interesting details were given of the remarkable conversion of Rev. W. Haslam, who, although a clergyman, had never experienced a change of heart. We are now enabled to give our readers a full account of the facts, with other information about Mr. Haslam and his work.

William Haslam was born in India, and spent the early years of his life in that country. He subsequently went to England and studied at the University of Durham, where he took his B.A. degree in 1841, and having done so, contemplated ordination and marriage, in order that he might settle down as a country clergyman.

BUT A DARK CLOUD

fell almost immediately upon this scene. The young lady to whom Mr. Haslam was engaged, was taken dangerously ill, and having been informed of the fact, he journeyed for thirty hours as rapidly as wheels could carry him, and at last, full of mental suffering and apprehension, hurried along to the house of his betrothed.

The door was opened by a relative of the young lady, who had been anxiously watching for Mr. Haslam's arrival. He was at once conducted to what he expected was a sick-chamber, when, to his horror, the first thing he saw was the lid of a coffin standing up against the wall, and in the middle of the room was the coffin itself, with candles burning on either side. In speaking of his feelings at this painful moment Mr. Haslam says: "The sight of the coffin and its quiet inmate did not awaken sorrow so much as surprise, and with that something like anger and rebellion. I was weak and exhausted in body, but strong in wilful insubordination, murmuring, and complaining, I spoke unadvisedly with my lips." At length, however, his violence of rebellion was dispersed by the calmness of acquiescence and resignation.

The funeral took place on the same morning, and referring to it, Mr. Haslam pathetically remarks: "I thought of the dear one I had lost, but yet more of the God of love I had found; and to remember that she was with Him was an additional comfort to me. The funeral service was soothing and elevating beyond expression, and yet when it was all over such a sense of desolation came upon me that I felt utterly forlorn and truly sad."

The strain and excitement were followed by illness. Mr. Haslam was seized with inflammation of the lungs, and became dangerously ill. Other complications of a threatening nature supervened, and the doctor pronounced the case hopeless and conjured his patient to prepare for eternity. Having received this solemn warning, he used the Prayer-Book Office for the Visitation of the Sick, and read it from three to seven times a day. He had no wish to live, for the world was blank and desolate to him; he felt that to be with God would be far better.

He little dreamed that if he had died in that unpardoned and Christless state he would have been lost forever; for at this time he was profoundly ignorant of the necessity of a change of heart—perfectly unconscious that he must be born again of the Holy Spirit. That truth had never entered his mind; he felt a modified love of God, and in his spirtual ignorance he wished to die.

Six months passed away, and three physicians told Mr. Haslam that his lungs were affected, and that recovery was hopeless. Notwithstanding this authoritative announcement, the "dying man" had a conviction that he would get well, and during the next few months he certainly gained strength.

With returning health, Mr. Haslam gave himself more fully to the purpose for which he supposed his life had been prolonged. He travelled by easy stages to London, and was there ordered to confine himself to the house for the remainder of the winter. During his retirement he spent his time in reading and prayer. He was thankful to God for having saved his life, but as yet knew nothing of the fact that between God and himself there was an "impassable gulf."

At this time he was absorbed, not so much in reading the Bible as in the Tracts for the Times—a publication which was engaging much attention. The effect of these tracts on Mr. Haslam was similar to their effect on many other ministers, leading them to formalism, and trust in ceremonies and ordinances instead of in the Saviour. As a consequence he became very diligent in fastings, prayers, and alms-deeds. Mr. Haslam read them with avidity, and formed from them certain ecclesiastical proclivities which carried him forward with renewed zeal.

A HINDOO'S SINGULAR CONDUCT.

Referring to the experience of this period, Mr. Haslam relates the following incident:

"As a boy in India, I remember being greatly struck with the calmness of the Hindoos, as contrasted with the patience and angry spirit of the English. On one occasion I observed one of the former at his devotions. He, with others, had been carrying me about in a palanquin all day in the hot sun. In the evening he most reverently took from his girdle a piece of mud of the sacred river Ganges, and dissolving this in water, he washed a piece of ground, then, having washed his feet and hands, he stepped on this sacred spot and began to cook his food. While it was preparing he was bowed to the ground, with his face between his knees, worshipping toward the setting sun.

"A boy who was standing by me said, 'If you touch that man he will not eat his dinner.' In a thoughtless moment I did so with my hand, and immediately he rose from his devotions; but, instead of threatening and swearing at me, as some might have done who belong to another religion, he only looked reproachfully, and said, 'Ah, Master William!' and then emptying out the rice which was on the fire, he began his ceremony all over again. It was quite dark before he had finished his 'poojah,' or worship, and his meal. This man's religious self-possession made a greater impression on me than if he had abused or even struck me for hindering his dinner. I thought to myself, 'I will be a Hindoo when I grow up!' And truly I kept my word, though not in the same form; for what else was I in my earnest, ceremonial days?"

HIS FIRST CURACY IN 1843 IN CORNWALL.

In the spring of 1842 Mr. Haslam thought he would go and see the physician who had examined him some months before. He, after a careful examination, gave very little hope of recovery, but suggested that if the patient went to the north coast of Cornwall there might be a chance for him. On his return home Mr. Haslam took up an Ecclesiastical Gazette, though it was three months old, and looked over the advertisements. There he observed one which invited a curate for a church in the very neighborhood. A letter was therefore despatched, asking the vicar for particulars, and in reply he was informed that his letter had been sent to the bishop, with one from the vicar himself, and that he should hear from his lordship in a few days.

This precipitation of affairs much surprised Mr. Haslam, and his surprise was intensified when he received a note shortly afterward from the Bishop of Exeter, bidding him to come immediately, that he might be in time for the Lent ordination. Accordingly, he started westward, and having passed his examination, he was sent with letters dimissory to the Bishop of Salisbury, and a year afterward was admitted to priests' orders by this prelate.

The ordination day passed away, and the newly-made priest was much depressed through the solemnity of the Bishop's address. He sounded the other candidates in the evening; they thought the Bishop a very holy man, but did not seem at all solemnized by the consideration that they had undertaken "the charge of souls." The next day Mr. Haslam proceeded to his first parish, called Perranzabuloe, about eight miles from Truro, on the north coast of Cornwall.

The morning after his arrival the new minister obtained the keys and made his way to the parish church. He was greatly grieved at the sight of a neglected churchyard and dilapidated church; and when he went inside his heart sank, for he had never seen a place of worship in such a miserable condition. He was told, moreover, that the parish was seven miles long, and that its large population of three thousand souls was scattered on all sides, excepting round the church. The question arose in his mind, "What am I to do with three thousand people, and how am I to reach them?"

Sunday morning arrived, and with the help of a neighboring clergyman Mr. Haslam got through the service, being the only one for the day at the time. There were about twenty listless persons lounging in different parts of the church for a congregation. As time went on his parochial duties increased, but in the midst of them all, he felt increasing disappointment and dissatisfaction. The congregation was increasing, and the church having been restored, it began to be the talk of the neighborhood.

RITUALISM AND OPPOSITION.

For about three years (1843–46) Mr. Haslam was much engaged in antiquarian research, but did not neglect the interests of his parish. From the very commencement of his ministry, he as a general rule, preached Dr. Newman's sermons (who is now Cardinal Newman in the Church of Rome), abridged and simplified, for in that day he thought them most sound in doctrine, practical, and full of good common-sense; but his people were far from satisfied with them.

There was a constant feud between the parishioners and the ritualistic parson. He thought they were schismatics, and they knew that he was unconverted, and did not preach the Gospel of Christ, or the way of salvation through Him.

After the feuds and dissensions in the parish the church was almost deserted, and left chiefly to the now unpopular curate, his clerk, and a few poor people. One day Mr. Haslam was absorbed in re-writing a text over the porch-door of the church. It was, "This is none other but the house of God and this is the gate of Heaven." A man who was standing at the foot of the ladder said "Heaven is a long way from that gate, I reckon." Mr. Haslam pretended not to hear him, but the speech produced a deep impression. He found from this, and many other indications, that the people had no respect for the church under his ministrations.

About this time the vicar for whom Mr. Haslam was acting as curate died, and thus ended Mr. Haslam's connection with Perranzabuloe. The dean and chapter did not appoint the curate to succeed the vicar, and so he had no alternative but to make arrangements for his departure.

HIS NEXT PARISH OF BALDHU,

on the Earl of Falmouth's estate, near Truro, was presented to Mr. Haslam by its noble patron that he might make it into a new parish. To make a beginning, a room was taken, which was used for a village-school in the week, and for Divine service on Sunday. This succeeded so well that in a few months the building was enlarged to accommodate three hundred people.

Amid the realization of his cherished scheme and multiplied activities the "priest of Baldhu" was far from being satisfied. He felt that something deeper was wanted. He desired to reach the hearts of the people, in order to do them good. God was speaking to him, but His misguided servant did not hear, or, hearing, misapprehended. He had no idea that he was a lost sinner, but thought that he was as safe as the Church herself and that the gates of hell could not prevail against him.

PUZZLED ABOUT CORNISH CONVERSIONS.

He had many conversations with the earnest people in his parish, but they were evidently resting not where he was, but on something he did not know. One very happy woman told him, "Ah, ou went to college to larn the Latin ; but though don't know a letter in the Book, yet

" 'I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies.'"

Another woman, whenever he went to see her, nade him read the story of her conversion, which vas written out in a copy-book. Several others, nen and women, talked to him continually about heir "conversion." He often wondered what hat was.

HIS GARDENER CONVERTED.

Soon after, his gardener, a good Churchman, fell eriously ill. No sooner did he see eternity before im than his heart sank within him. In his dis-ress of mind he did not send for his master to ome and pray with him, but actually sent for a converted" man who lived in the next row of ottages. The consequence was he was brought nder deep conviction of sin, and eventually found eace through the precious blood of Jesus.

Immediately it spread all over the parish that the parson's servant was converted." The poor an sent for his master several times, and at last is entreaties prevailed. Instead of lying on his ed, a dying man as Mr. Haslam expected to find im, he was walking about the room in a most joy-il and ecstatic state. "Oh, dear master!" he xclaimed, "I am glad you are come! I am so appy! My soul is saved, glory be to God!" Come, John," said his master, "sit down and be uiet, and I will have a talk with you, and tell you hat I think." But John knew his master's houghts quite well enough, so he burst out, "Oh, aster! I'm sure you do not know about this, or ou would have told me. I am quite sure you ve me, and I love you—that I do! but, dear aster, you do not know this—I am praying for he Lord to show it to you. I mean to pray till I ie, and after that if I can, till you are converted." He looked at his master so lovingly, and seemed so uly happy, that it was more than the clergyman ould stand. Almost involuntarily, he made for he door, and escaped before he could be stopped.

He went home greatly disturbed in his mind—ltogether disappointed and disgusted with his ork among the Cornish people. "It is no use ; ey never will be Churchmen!" He was as hope-ss and miserable as he could be. He felt that s superior teaching and practice had failed, and at the inferior and, as he believed, unscriptural gmas had prevailed. His favorite and most omising Churchman had fallen, and was happy his fall ; more than that, he was actually pray-g that his master might fall too!

HIS CONVERSION.

Mr. Haslam had promised a visit to the Rev. W. tken, rector of Pendeen (father of Rev. W. Hay tken), to ask him about his church, which was en building, and in order to divert his own oughts, resolved to go to him at once. Soon er his arrival, as they were seated by the fire, r. Aitken commended his energy and activity, d added, "But, my brother, are you satisfied?" No," said his guest, "I am not satisfied."

In the course of a prolonged conversation next y on the fourth chapter of St. John, Mr. Aitken nted out the difference between getting water by wing from a well and having within a living ll springing up eternally. "Have you this liv-water?" inquired Mr. Haslam. "Yes, thank d," was the exultant response, "I have had it the last thirty years." "How did you get it?" s the next question. "Look here," said the t, pointing to the tenth verse, "Thou wouldest e asked of Him, and He would have given thee ng water." "Shall we ask Him?" inquired Haslam ; and Mr. Aitken cordially respond-" with all my heart," and immediately pushing k his chair, knelt down at his round table and yed. The young clergyman was completely rcome, and melted to tears. He sat down on ground, sobbing, while Mr. Aitken cried aloud, sing God.

uring the next few days Mr. Haslam's mind in a revolution. On the Sunday he was so ill he was quite unfit to take the service. Mr. en had said to him, "If I were you, I would the church, and say to the congregation, 'I will not preach again till I am converted. Pray for me.'"

Before he could make up his mind to put off the service the bells struck out a merry peal, and sent their summons far away over the hills. He had no intention whatever of reading more than the morning prayers, but while reading the Gospel he thought he would say a few words in explanation of it, and then dismiss the congregation. So he went up into his pulpit and gave out the text, "What think ye of Christ?"

Whether it was something in his words or something in his manner it is impossible to tell ; but all of a sudden a local preacher, who happened to be in the congregation, stood up, and putting up his arms, shouted out in Cornish manner,

"THE PARSON IS CONVERTED!

The parson is converted! Hallelujah!" and in another moment his voice was lost in the shouts and praises of three or four hundred of the congregation. Mr. Haslam himself joined in the outburst of praise and gave out the Doxology,

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow," which the people sang with heart and voice. When this had subsided there were at least twenty people crying for mercy. They all professed to find peace and joy in believing.

Mr. Haslam says :

At the end of this great and eventful day of my life—my spiritual birthday, on which I passed from death to life by being "born from above"—I could scarcely sleep for joy. I awoke early the next morning, with the impression on my mind that I must get up and go to a village a mile off, to tell James B—— of my conversion. He was a good and holy man, who had often spoken to me about my soul, and had been praying for three years or more on my behalf. I had not gone half way before

I MET JAMES COMING TOWARD ME.

He seemed as surprised to see me as I was to meet him. He looked at me in a strange way, and then, leaning his back against a stone fence, he said, "Are you converted?"

"Why do you ask me?" I replied. "I am just on my way to your house to tell you the good news—that I have found peace. My soul is saved." The man said, "Thank God!" and it came from the very depths of his heart. Shedding tears of joy, he went on to say, "This night I woke up thinking of you ; you were so strongly in my mind that I got up and began to pray for you ; but I could not 'get hold;' I wrestled and cried aloud, but it was all of no avail ; I begged the Lord not to give you up ; but it seemed I could not pray. After trying for more than two hours, it came to my mind that perhaps you were converted. This thought made me so happy that I began to praise the Lord, and so I dressed and came to see if it was true."

"Yes," I said, "it is true ; the Lord has saved my soul ; I am happy!" I thanked him then and there for all the help he had been, and for the patience he had so long exercised toward me. We spent a happy time together, thanking and praising God, and then he returned home to tell his friends and neighbors the news.

From that time Mr. Haslam began to preach the Gospel, and has not been ashamed to declare everywhere what God has done for his soul. The conversion of the minister was the inauguration of a revival which lasted for nearly three years, during which all the people who dwelt on the hill on which the church was built were converted.

There came now upon the scene a very remarkable man named Billy Bray. On opening the door one morning after breakfast, Mr. Haslam saw a happy-looking little man in a black Quaker-cut coat, and the following colloquy ensued :

"Well, my friend," I said, "who are you?" "I am Billy Bray," he replied, looking steadily at me with his twinkling eyes ; "and be you the parson?" "Yes, I am." "Thank the Lord! Converted, are ye?" "Yes, thank God." "And the missus inside" (pointing to the dining-room), "be she converted?" "Yes, she is." "Thank the dear Lord!" he said, moving forward, and suddenly caught Mr. Haslam up in his arms and CARRIED HIM ROUND THE ROOM.

Then, having accomplished the circuit, he set his burden in a chair, and rolling on the ground for joy, said that he "was as happy as he could live." He then rose with a beaming face, magnifying God.

PELTED ON HIS WAY TO CHURCH.

With one more incident we will conclude our present sketch of the Rev. W. Haslam. In 1855, a clergyman having asking him if he would take charge of his church and parish at Tregoney for six weeks, he consented to do so, and one Saturday arrived at the place. He learned that a crowd of men and boys had resolved that "the Revivalist chap," as they called him, should not preach in the village. But Mr. Haslam was not to be deterred by opposition, and on Sunday morning set out for the church, encountering the crowd on his way. We shall let Mr. Haslam speak for himself :

On the way I observed stones flying past me in every direction ; but I walked on, till at last I was struck on the cheek with a patch of muddy clay which was thrown at me. There was an universal shout of laughter when the men and boys saw that I had been hit. I put my hand to the place, and found that the patch of clay was sticking to my cheek, so I pressed it there, hoping that it would remain. I said to the crowd, who were laughing at me, "That was not a bad shot. Now, if you come to church you shall see it there ; I will keep it on as long as I can." So saying, I walked on amidst the jeers of the people.

When I arrived at the vestry, the clerk was in great trouble when he knew what had happened. He said, "Do let me wash the mud off, sir."

"Oh, no," I replied, "I mean to show that all day, if I can."

During the morning service, at which there were about fifty people present, I succeeded in keeping on my mud-patch, and returned to dinner with the same.

In the afternoon I said that I would have a service for children, as there was no Sunday-school, to which about twenty came. Before addressing them, seeing that they were intently looking at the patch on my cheek, I told them how it came there, and that I intended to keep it on all through the evening service.

This news spread over the whole place, and the consequence was that such numbers of people came out of curiosity that the church was filled to overflowing. I preached without any reference to what had taken place, and succeeded in gaining the attention of the people ; so that after the service I said I would have a prayer-meeting in the school-room. We had the place crammed, and I announced that I would preach again the next evening.

A revival soon broke out in that place, and the crowds who came to the meetings were so great that we had as many people outside the large school-room as there were in.

At the end of the six weeks the new vicar returned, and I was able to hand over the parish to him, with a full church, three Bible-classes, and a large Sunday-school. This I did, thanking God for the measure of success and blessing He had given to my efforts in that populous and wicked place.

In 1855 Mr. Haslam resigned the living of Baldhu in order to settle at Plymouth, where he preached in the neighborhood. In 1872 the late Earl Howe made him perpetual curate of Curzon Chapel, Mayfair, London ; but after two or three years Earl Howe, who was of evangelical views, died, and the present Earl Howe, whose religious views differ widely from those of his predecessor, manifested disapproval of the perpetual curate, and Mr. Haslam soon afterward resigned, and has since been engaged in holding special mission services throughout England, in connection with the Rev. W. Hay Aitken's Committee for Special Services and Missions.

MRS. HASLAM,

Whose portrait is on our frontispiece, is Mr. Haslam's second wife, whom he married about four years ago, after he had been a widower for a considerable time. She has long been an active Sunday-school teacher, district visitor, and can give excellent Gospel addresses. His family are all grown up, and consist of nearly a dozen children. His eldest son, the Rev. John H. Haslam, is a popular preacher at St. John's Church, Highbury Vale, and afternoon preacher at Christ Church, Highbury, London.

THE DRAMATIC ELEMENT.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, January 23, 1881.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."—EXODUS 20: 16.

A False Accusation—An Opportunity to Illustrate—Remarkable Conversion of a New York Reporter—Newspaper Slanders—Bombardment Followed by Blessing—Slandered Ministers—John Wesley Accused of Drunkenness—A Vital Question—The Drama an Echo from a God-Implanted Feeling—Shall We Suppress it?—The Drama in the Bible—The Drama Distinct from the Theatre—The Dramatic S. S. Teacher—A Drama of Accident—Eminent Dramatic Preachers—The Drama of Your Life—No Encore—The Spectators in the Gallery.

THIS thunderbolt of Mount Sinai, like the zig-zag lightning you have sometimes seen on the summer skies, strikes this way and that, and in many directions. He sins against this Divine enactment who slanders man, or woman, or family, or newspaper, or institution. I propose this morning, and next Sabbath morning, to preach radical, very radical sermons on a subject I have never discussed, and on which I have read nothing, and yet a subject involving vast issues, and perhaps the eternal welfare of a multitude, namely: "What shall we do with the dramatic element which God hath implanted in many of our natures?" Not in ten, or a hundred, or a thousand, but in the vast majority of the human race.

You ask me, "Why discuss that subject just now?" I reply, Because more of the public attention seems to be aroused on that subject than for many years. And then, Because it has been announced all over this land that I have in this place assailed a foreign actress who is now in this country when all the people know that I have not assailed her character, and the thousands who have attended here from Sabbath to Sabbath know that I have not made the slightest allusion to her either in prayer or sermon.

I had several reasons for saying nothing on that subject. One was, I knew nothing. I had no proof for or against her. She may, for all I know, be among the best, or among the worst. I have refrained from reading on that subject. I know more about almost every public person than about her. I have cultured ignorance in that direction. My ignorance on that subject is so rank that the stalks of it have grown up ten feet high, with leaves two feet broad. There is no bound to my ignorance in regard to her, and therefore I have said nothing.

Then, in the next place, I wanted a powerful and conspicuous illustration of the

that are ever being told about me and this church. I thought to myself, I will let that report go on, that falsehood go on, until I will some Sabbath nail it up in the presence of the whole nation as a specimen falsehood of the misrepresentations which are in some directions ever going on in regard to me and my work; for it so happens that all the people who have attended here Sabbath by Sabbath will unanimously testify that I never made the slightest allusion in that direction; and I said, Now this is my opportunity to illustrate.

I make no complaint about this or any other assault upon myself, for all these things work together for good. Many of the best people and the most earnest Christians in this congregation are those who came here originally to see what extraordinary thing would be said or done, and some of them were converted to God under the first sermon, as was the case of a reporter who was sent from New York to caricature one of our Sabbath evening services. He told me that he came early, that he had his lead-pencil well sharpened, and his reporter's pad well planted, and that he began to make fun of everything, and went on until the sermon was half done, when his hand trembled so he could not write, and he put up his pencil, and at the close of the service he asked for the prayers of the people, and that night he gave his heart to God; and he is now preaching the Gospel as an evangelist, and he tells me he has almost perpetual revivals under his work.

So all these things work together for good. But I thought that this would be such a grand opportunity for me to illustrate to friends all over the country the monstrosity and the absurdity of the falsehoods that are ever being uttered in regard to me and my work.

For the most part the newspapers of this country are friendly and generous, and they more than do me justice, and I make no complaint of them; but here and there is a newspaper which has planted somewhere amidst the Hoe's cylinder printing press a machine with wheels and hoppers and bands so constructed that they could, if necessary, turn out lies about me about fifty a minute! So that I should not be surprised very much if I saw in to-morrow morning's paper a document purporting to be my last will and testament, signed and sealed, giving two million dollars to the suffering poor of New York, when I do not propose to give more than half that.

Some people say, "Why don't you stop this, and answer that, and answer the other thing?" Bless your dear hearts, then I could do nothing else. I will tell you now for the first time how I have arranged it. I have made a bargain with my blessed Lord that if He will look after me and my reputation and my family, I will preach the best I can, and comfort all the trouble I can, and encourage all the young men I can; and God is doing His part faithfully, and I am doing my part imperfectly, but as well as I can.

Besides that, I am contented that such falsehoods as this conspicuous one I have just mentioned in regard to the foreign actress—that such falsehoods should go on, when I remember in the history of my ministry for twenty-four years that right after every season of especial abuse and outrage there always comes a season in my church of especial blessing. Just as the weather observers will tell you that after a heavy cannonading there is a heavy rain, so after I and my church have been bombarded by there has always come right after it a shower of blessing.

Seven years ago, after a season of especial abuse and outrage and misrepresentation in regard to myself, we received one Sabbath into the membership three hundred and twenty-eight souls. About two hundred of them I baptized that Sabbath morning, until my hand was well-nigh palsied with the service. And so, not long after the close of the famous ecclesiastical trial, we received into this church within four weeks six hundred and seventy-eight souls; and I have noticed that the Divine blessing very much corresponds to the violence of the human and satanic assault that preceded.

Now I am expecting that this year we shall have at least two thousand souls converted to God in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Besides that, I am very much consoled when I see these falsehoods flying about the community—I am very much consoled by the history of ministers in the past far better than myself. Blessed John Tenant! glorious John Tenant! immortal John Tenant!—his name a benediction in the churches—was arraigned, actually arraigned and tried for horse stealing!—his innocence at last proved only by almost miraculous interposition.

John Wesley, the father of Methodism, and a man who had done more probably for the evangelization of the nations than any man since Paul the apostle—John Wesley stood in his church and said, "Brethren, I have been charged with all the crimes in the catalogue save one, and that is drunkenness," when a woman arose in the congregation and said, "You know you were drunk last night!" Then John Wesley replied, "Bless the Lord, the catalogue is complete!" Now if these great masters of Christian greatness could not escape, surely we, the insignificant servants of the Lord, ought not to expect a furlough.

But I thought that this would be as grand an opportunity as I should ever get of letting our friends throughout the country and the world know, by reason of this falsehood in regard to the foreign actress—I thought this would be the time to nail it up in such a conspicuous place that our friends would know that of the hundred remarkable things that may be said about us for the next twenty years, ninety-five of them will probably be as unfounded.

But I must pass on from personalities to grand principles, and I want this morning, and next Sabbath morning, and for several Sabbath mornings following, to discuss especially addressing myself to young men, for there is a reason now, which I never had before, for the going out of my heart very warmly toward all young men. I want to discuss this morning the question, What are we to do with the dramatic element which God has implanted in our natures? Some people speak of the drama as though it were something built up outside of ourselves by the Congreves, and the Goldsmiths, and the Shakespeares and the Sheridans of literature, and that then we attune our tastes to correspond with human inventions. Not at all.

THE DRAMA

is an echo from the feeling which God has implanted in our immortal souls. It is seen first in the domestic circle among the children three or four years of age playing with their dolls and their cradles and their carts—seen ten years after in the play-houses of wood—ten years after in the parlor charades—after that, in the elaborate impersonations in the Academies of Music. Thespis and Æschylus and Sophocles and Euripides merely dramatized what was in the Greek heart. Terence and Plautus and Seneca merely dramatized what was in the Roman heart. Congreve and Farquhar merely dramatized what was in the English heart. Racine Corneille and Alfieri only dramatized what was in the French and Italian heart. Shakespeare only dramatized what was in the great world heart. The dithyrambic and classic drama, the sentimental drama, the romantic drama, were merely echoes of the human soul.

I do not speak of the drama on the poetic shelf nor of the drama in the play-house; but I speak of the dramatic element in your soul and mine. We make men responsible for it. They are not responsible. They are responsible for the perversion of it; but not for the original implantation.

GOD DID THAT WORK, and I suppose He knew what He was about when He made us. We are nearly all moved by the spectacular. When on Thanksgiving Day we assemble and the church is decorated with the cotton and the rice and the apples and the wheat and the rye and the oats, our gratitude to God is stirred. When on Easter morning we see written in letters of flowers the inscription, "He is risen," our emotions are stirred. Every parent likes to go to the school exhibition with its recitations and its dialogues and its droll costumes. The torchlight procession of the political campaign is merely the dramatization of principles involved. No intelligent man can look in any secular or religious direction without finding this dramatic element reveling, unrolling, demonstrating itself. What shall we do with it?

Shall we suppress it? You can as easily suppress its Creator. You may direct it, you may educate it, you may purify it, you may harness it to mu potent usefulness, and that it is your duty to Just as we culture the taste for the beautiful and sublime by bird-haunted glen, and royster stream, and cataracts let down in uproar over mossed rocks, and the day lifting its banners victory in the East, and then setting everything fire as it retreats through the gates of the We and the Austerlitz and Waterloo of an Aug thunder-storm blazing their batteries into a su afternoon, and the round, glittering tear of world wet on the cheek of the night—as in way we culture our taste for the beautiful sublime, so in every lawful way we are to cult the dramatic element in our nature, by every st cato passage in literature, by antithesis and s thesis, by every tragic passage in human life.

The plainest man has in his plainest day so thing histrionic. This dramatic element in all natures, or nearly all our natures, is exception strong or weak in some; just as there may million men who admire poetry where there only one poet, one Tennyson to England, or ongfellow to America, just as there may be a illion people who admire music where there is nly one Ole Bull to Norway, and one Wagner to ermany, and one Morgan to America.

THE DRAMA IN THE BIBLE.

low I have to tell you not only that God has im-lanted this dramatic element in our natures, but I ave to tell you in the Scriptures He cultures it, He ppeals to it, He develops it. I do not care where ou open the Bible, your eye will fall upon a rama. Here it is the Book of Judges;* the fir-ee, the vine, the olive-tree, the bramble—they all ake speeches. Then at the close of the scene ere is a coronation, and the bramble is proclaimed ng. That is a political drama. Here it is in ie Book of Job. Enter Eliphaz, Bildad, Tophar, lihu, and Job. The opening act of the drama, l darkness; the closing act of the drama, all sun-ine. Magnificent drama is the Book of Job!

Here it is in Solomon's Song. The region, an ori-ital region—vineyards, pomegranates, mountain myrrh, flock of sheep, garden of spices, a woo-g, a bride, a bridegroom, dialogue after dialogue, tense, gorgeous, all suggestive drama is the ook of Solomon's Song. Here it is in the Book Luke. Costly mansion in the night. All the ndows bright with illumination. The floor uake with the dance. Returned son in costly rments which do not very well fit him, perhaps, they were not made for him, but he must iftly leave off his old garb and prepare for this temporized levee. Pouting son at the back or, too mad to go in, because they are making ch a fuss. Tears of smpathy running down the l man's cheek at the story of his son's wandering d suffering, and tears of joy at his return. Hear rdock recite the Prodigal Son in one of his read-s, and you will not know whether to sob or out. Revivals of religion have started just under reading of that soul-revolutionizing drama of Prodigal Son.

Here it is in the Book of Revelation. Crystalline ; pearline gate; opaline river; amethystine cap-ne; showering coronets; one vial poured out in-nadining the waters; cavalrymen of heaven gal-ing on white horses; nations in doxology—Halle-uhs to the right of them, hallelujahs to the left hem. As the Bible opens with the drama of the t Paradise, so it closes with the drama of the ond Paradise.

Find you, when I say drama I do not mean myth fable, for my theology is of the oldest type—five dred years old, thousands of years old, as old he Bible. When I speak of the drama at the inning and the close of the Bible, I do not mean llegory, but I mean the truth so stated that in aping and in startling effect it is a God-given, ld-resounding, heaven-echoing drama. Now od implanted this dramatic element in our na-s, and if He has cultured and developed it in the ptures, I demand that you recognize it.

ecause the drama has again and again been de-led and employed for destructive purposes is ing against the drama, any more than music at to be accursed because it has been taken n and again into the saturnalian wassails of thousand years. Will you refuse to enthrone ic on the church organ because the art has trampled again and again under the feet of ascivious dance?

is nothing against painting and sculpture that orinth and Herculaneum they were demonstra-of vulgarity and turpitude. The dreadful eum at Pompeii shall throw no discredit on ers's "Greek Slave," or Church's "Heart of Andes," or Rubens's "Descent from the s," or Angelo's "Last Judgment." The very that again and again the drama has been ged through the sewers of iniquity is the on why we should snatch it up and start it out grand and a holy and a magnificent mission.

ne say at this point in my sermon that the a will never be lifted to its rightful sphere hose people who have not sense enough to guish between drama is no more the theatre than a hymn-book is a church. I am not speaking in regard to the theatre at all. The drama is a literary expression of that feeling which God implanted in the human soul. Neither will the drama ever be lifted to its proper sphere by wholesale denunciation of all dramatists. Whoever dared utter a word against Charlotte Cushman? If you have not known men and women connected with the drama who are pure in heart, and pure in speech, and pure in life, it is because you have not had very wide acquaintance.

Some one will say to me, "Didn't you some years ago preach a sermon in wholesale denunciation of all dramatists?" I reply that that sermon, which was printed in a secular paper, then copied in many religious papers, was written by a literary wit who had never seen this church or seen me, who found out what the text was from some one who had been present, and then composed the whole thing on his own desk—the whole thing a caricature representing me as hostile to zoological gardens, and as considering it a great sin to look at an elephant or a crocodile! Mr. Davenport, no wonder, at the close of a play a few nights after that in Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, stepped before the curtain and denounced that sermon. He could not have hated it more than I did.

Wholesale denunciation of all dramatists will never elevate the drama. Yonder stand a church and a theatre on opposite sides of the street. The church shouts over to the theatre, "You are all scoundrels; the theatre shouts back, "You are all hypocrites;" and they both sin against my text, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." Dropping all indiscriminate jeremiads against all dramatists, and realizing that the drama is not necessarily connected with this institution or with that, I want to show you how the dramatic element in our natures may be of civilization and Christianity. Next Sabbath morning I will give you a unique plan by which the dramatic element may be brought into our recreations and be made administrative of the interests of society. I will show you how, according to my idea, it may be done; but this morning I shall devote the few remaining moments to showing you how the dramatic element may be forced into the service of our holy religion.

You Sabbath-school teachers ought to have more of the element in your instructions. By graphic Scripture scene, by anecdote, by descriptive gesture, by impersonation, urge your classes to right action. Two or three Sundays ago, by agreement of the International Series of Sunday-school Lessons, children in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America on one day studied the song of Mary. Those teachers who most graphically presented that Gospel heroine got the firmest grip upon the attention of their listeners. We want in all our schools and colleges and prayer-meetings, and in all our attempts at reform, and in all our churches, to have less of the style didactic and more of the style dramatic.

Fifty essays about the sorrows of the poor could not affect me as and suffering I saw one slippery morning in the streets of Philadelphia. Just ahead of me was a lad, wretched in apparel, his limb amputated at the knee; from the pallor of the boy's cheek the amputation not long before. He had a package of broken food under his arm—food he had begged, I suppose, at the doors. As he passed on over the slippery pavement cautiously and carefully I steadied him until his crutch slipped and he fell. I helped him up as well as I could, gathered up the fragments of the package as well as I could, put them under one arm and the crutch under the other arm; but when I saw the blood run down his pale cheek I burst into tears. Fifty essays about the sufferings of the poor could not touch one like that little drama of accident and suffering.

Oh! we want in all our different departments of usefulness—and I address hundreds of people who are trying to do good—we want more of the dramatic element and less of the didactic. The tendency in this day is to drone religion, to whine religion, to cant religion, to moan religion, to croak religion, to sepulchrize religion, when we ought to present it in animated and spectacular manner.

Sabbath morning by Sabbath morning I address many theological students who are preparing for the ministry. They come in here from the different institutions. I say to them this morning, If you will go home and look over the history of the church you will find that those men have brought most souls to Christ who have been dramatic. Rowland Hill, dramatic; Thomas Chalmers, dramatic; Thomas Guthrie, dramatic; John Knox, dramatic; Robert McCheyne, dramatic; Christmas Evans, dramatic; George Whitefield, dramatic; Robert Hall, dramatic; Robert South, dramatic; Bourdelais, dramatic; Fénelon, dramatic; John Mason, dramatic; Dr. Knott, dramatic. When you get into the ministry, if you attempt to culture that element, and try to wield it for God, you will meet with mighty rebuff and caricature, and ecclesiastical counsel will take your case in charge, and they will try to put you down; but the God who starts you will help you through, and great will be the eternal rewards for the assiduous and the plucky.

What we want, ministers and laymen, is to get our sermons and our exhortations and our prayers out of the old rut. I see a great deal of discussion in the religious papers about why people do not come to church. They do not come because they are not interested. The old hackneyed religious phrases that come soaring down through the centuries will never arrest the masses. What we want to-day, you in your sphere and I in my sphere, is to freshen up. People do not want in their sermons the sham flowers bought at the millinery shop, but the japonicas wet with the morning dew; nor the heavy bones of extinct megatherium of past ages, but the living reindeer caught last August at the edge of Schroon Lake. We want to drive out the drowsy, and the prosaic, and the tedious, and the humdrum, and introduce the brightness and the vivacity, and the holy sarcasm, and the sanctified wit, and the epigrammatic power, and the blood-red earnestness, and the fire of religious zeal, and I do not know of any way of doing it as well as through the dramatic.

As to

and mine, it will soon end. There will be no encore to bring us back after the curtain has dropped. At the beginning of that drama of life stood a cradle; at the end of it will stand a grave. The first act, welcome. The last act, farewell. The intermediate acts, banquet and battle, processions bridal and funeral, songs and tears, laughter and groans.

It was not original with Shakespeare when he said, "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players." He got it from St. Paul, who, fifteen centuries before that, had written, "We are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men." A spectacle in a Coliseum fighting with wild beasts in an amphitheatre, looking down. Here we destroy a lion. Here we grapple with a gladiator. When we fall, devils shout. When we rise, angels sing. A spectacle before gallery, above gallery, gallery above gallery. Gallery of our departed kindred looking down to see if we are faithful, and worthy of our Christian ancestry, hoping for our victory, wanting to throw us a garland, glorified children and parents, with cheer on cheer urging us on. Gallery of the martyrs looking down—the Polycarps, and the Ridleys, and the M'Kails and the Theban Legion, and the Scotch Covenanters, and they of the Brussels market-place, and of Piedmont—crying down from the galleries, "God gave us the victory, and He will give it you."

THE GALLERIES FULL,

Gallery of angels looking down—cherubic, seraphic, archangelic—clapping their wings at every advantage we gain. Gallery of the king from which there waves a scarred hand, and from which there comes a sympathetic voice, saying, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Oh, the spectacle in which you and I are the actors! Oh, the piled-up galleries looking down!

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The Anxious Family—The Doctor's Opinion—The Great Blank—Edgar sent for—Real Comfort—All Over—Light for the Bereaved—The Practical Outcome of Sorrow—A Visit to a Sick Man.

A GLOOMY silence pervaded the long corridors as the doctor passed through them on his way to the bedside of his patient. The drawing-room, that had hitherto looked its brightest as the old silver-faced clock daily chimed out the hours of five, now seemed wrapped in sorrow's dark curtain, and its cheerful fireside for once was deserted. The footman came in, stirred the reddened embers, put on fresh blocks of coal, placed the lamps on the tables, and the tea tray with its glistening adornments on the low three-legged stand. But his summons to one and another were unavailing. Scattered over the house, the brothers and sisters with bated breath hushed their voices and waited to know "what the doctor said of him!"

At last the doctor appeared in the dressing-room doorway. Arthur's father was with him. The two men stood and talked.

. . . . "Very ill," said the doctor; "very ill. . . . Is there no one you could send for? . . . no one whom he would like to see? . . . He may take a turn for the better; . . . but—" and they parted. A moment more, and the great door, studded with iron nails, had closed with a muffled clang.

Etta buried her face in her hands and sobbed. He was her beloved one, her favorite brother, and her friend.

"Mother!" said a voice from the darkened bed. "Dearest mother! I don't feel happy. . . . I want some one to talk to me. . . . All beyond this life is unknown. Such a blank. Help me, dear mother! Can you? Will you? No! I don't think you can."

"My darling! what do you mean?" sobbed out the mother as she half sat, half knelt, by his bed. "You may get better; you know the doctor said so. But you are so good and so dear. You are brave, too; you never knew what fear meant. There is nothing to make you sad or anxious. The anxiety and" . . . . her sobs interrupted her . . . "are ours. But we will hope."

"Mother! the doctor said something about danger to-day. I heard him; that is quite enough. I must see some one who can answer some questions. If you love me, send for Edgar . . . Edgar Harcourt. I had many talks with him first at college; and again when I saw him in his vicarage this year . . . . My cousin, you know! Oh! why not he?" he urged as he saw his mother hesitate.

A telegram was sent. Edgar came. He had not been thought much of in that house before this night; but for all that he had an influence—an influence more potent than he imagined. On his arrival he received a warm welcome, though a tearful one; and a very few moments found him seated beside the sufferer, simply answering, in loving, Scripture words, question after question, as they came in short, half-expressed sentences from that troubled mind, until at length the heavenly balm began to steal into its very depths, and Edgar could whisper to his aunt,

"I think he is comforted—and now he is sleeping, I will go to my room; afterward I will see my cousins."

But Arthur was not sleeping; for presently he said, "Mother, will you pray?"

"Oh! I can't—I can't—where's a book?" said the mother to the nurse as she crossed the room.

"A book!" groaned the young man; "where is Edgar?"

So Edgar was summoned. With clasped hands the young men prayed together. The one in strong health, and ardent love to his newly-begun work—the care of souls; and the other passing from a life of unshared pleasures and disappointed hopes, now, shattering one by one, to meet the forgotten Saviour, and to enter the unknown land. . . .

But the prayer did its work; it comforted him, and then he whispered,

"Talk to me of Him! Tell me His name."

"Jesus?" answered Mr. Harcourt as he leaned over him. Is it Jesus of whom you long to hear?"

"Yes! Why doesn't mother talk of Him? and the girls? Does no one in the house know Him? . . . Surely if they know Him they would speak of Him! of course they must. Nobody could help it. . . . Did He die for me? Did He do all that? . . . Oh! tell me again . . . leaving nothing for me to do? Oh! I thank Him. I thank Him; but I am too weak. I would like to live for Him. . . . . I can't! I am too ill. . . . . Send Etta to me."

"Not now, darling; you are tired," said his mother. "You must be quiet now. You shall see her by and by."

It was morning before Etta was allowed to see her brother, and then the sad report from the doctor's lips was confirmed.

"Very little hope!" he had said.

"Read me something, dear Etta," Arthur asked as soon as he saw his sister. "I want a quiet talk. Edgar has comforted me very much. The words he said are slipping away from me, but the comfort remains. It is all Jesus. That I know. His name is my one shelter—my support, my refuge. . . . Etta! why did we never talk of Him, and pray to Him, and live for Him?"

The answer, if there was any to this question, was bathed in Etta's tears, and buried in Arthur's pillow, but it never was spoken.

* * * * * * *

He died. Yes! it was all over. The hopes and the fears, the anxious questionings, the suspense, and the long agonized watchings—all were over; and the blank—did you ever feel it?—was left. On the funeral morning the Bible was placed in the young minister's hands. All heads were bowed while he prayed:

"Lord! visit our souls with Thy salvation!" Then he read:

"It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.

"He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth in the dust, if so be there may be hope.

"He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him; he is filled full with reproach.

"For the Lord will not cast off forever.

"But though He cause grief, yet will He have compassion according to the multitude of His mercies.

"For He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

"The Lord's hand has been among us," he said. "Our brother is taken from us. The presence of the Blessed One, the Altogether Lovely, is here. Jesus is in the midst. Breathe into His ear your sorrow. From Him draw the comfort no earthly one can give you. Your Father listens; He listens; He speaks; He warns; He entreats. Listen to Him, through Jesus. Speak to Him, in Jesus' name; and by His Holy Spirit's mighty, yet tender dealing, He will bring to your hearts the balm of Gilead.

"He will keep you within the limits of that 'peace that passeth understanding.' Consider the Lord as a person. Value Himself; and His holy words. They are life-giving. 'Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you.' Let us pray!"

And amidst the sobs and the tears of his solemnized audience Edgar prayed:

"O God! come down anew into this home! Bring Thy strong consolations into every heart. Let each one before Thee know the God of all comfort, the God of love! May Thy Holy Spirit, like the gentle dove, bring sweet tokens of promise from out of the dark waters of heavy bereavement; purify and sanctify all under this roof by the streams of thy cleansing fountain—Christ's precious blood!

"As these comforts are received, may our lives be consecrated anew to Thee! and each benefit Thou dost bestow, we would freely share with those around us. Above all, we would humbly participate in the personal revealings of Thy great love to ourselves; and in return we would make that love known to the sorrowing and suffering ones around us." Sobs interrupted his petitions.

When all arose from their knees tears were on every face. Cold reserve had been broken down. Hearts were melted beneath the double tide of sorrow, and the open tide of a true, deep consolation.

"Must you go to-morrow?" asked the father at a quiet moment. "You are such a comfort to us; and our boy loved you."

"Yes! I must," was Edgar's reply; "I have many calls waiting for me in my little home."

"Then you will read once more before you leave? To-morrow morning?"

"I will," and with a pressure of hand that told of a heart-union born from sympathy, the uncle and nephew separated in preparation for the sad work before them.

* * * * * * *

At parting, Mr. Harcourt read 1 Peter 1, and left as his comment on that exquisite chain of promises, each so precious in its weighty assurance, the little committal of concurrent responsibility given in 2 Corinthians 1:4. At the conclusion of his remarks he said, "You shall be comforted by drawing nigh to the Giver of comfort. Then share those blessed consolations, this priceless balm, with those around you."

There was no time for conversation. He was gone only too soon; but his words sank into one heart. Etta "kept" and "pondered" upon them.

"Don't you know of any sick people in the town?" she asked her maid one day as she was fastening on her deep mourning dress trimmed with its folds of heavy crape.

"Well! miss; I heard yesterday that there is a young man taken very ill, something the same way as . . . . Mr. Arthur . . . . something of a chill. The doctor was there in the evening. The poor mother's in a terrible way, and the father too—and they say he's no ways fit; nor none of them for that matter."

"Whereabouts is it?" asked Etta, with a gasp. She had come face to face now with the reproaches that during the past few days had been absolutely tormenting her. "I shall see if there is anythng that I could take. He would like" . . . . And the maid left her weeping. . . .

"Mother," she said, gently tappng at the well-known door of that room, from which neither son nor daughter was ever turned away, "may I come in? Mother, I want to take some jelly to a sick person this afternoon! You remember what Arthur said to us—no! dear mother! I won't talk about anything that would grieve you. Let me go to-day; and I will talk about the reasons when I can quietly . . . without giving way, like this" . . . and she was gone with a tender kiss.

Gone out into the pretty stone porch, across the shrub-covered lawn, and into the short avenue that led by the nearest way to the town—gone on an errand by which, for the first time, she was led by the Saviour's voice.

"Follow Me," she could almost hear Him saying as she walked in the stillness of that soft air. Wrapped in her sombre garments, grave and sweet, her quiet footsteps slackened as she reached the gate; and she began to hesitate. It was an effort untold that she was about to make. But it was only for a moment. Her hand was on the latch, and she was in the little street.

"Beg your pardon, miss," said a voice behind her, "I have been a-wanting to see you."

Rather startled, she turned, and saw an old man, with not a handsome face, but an earnest manner, that caught her attention. As he proceeded with his next sentence, his strange smile of unusual brightness still more attracted her, while his words created a new interest in her heart.

"You've lost him! you have. Yes, and knowed you was fond. Poor dear! The young gentleman—he was ill. I heard of him, an' I asked many a one—and—I be so very sorry."

Etta struggled to answer something civil, and pursue her way; but her voice was gone; words would not come.

"Yes, he's gone!" said the old man, "but is he up there?" pointing to a cleft in the clouds, through which the parting sun was streaming in its lost glory rays.

Poor Etta! She nodded, but she could not speak.

Her inclination was to hold out her hand, but she thought of her gloves, and remembered that he was only a poor man who was thus addressing her. So she went on, but the old man, nothing daunted, followed her, saying,

"May I keep pace, miss? Beg pardon. You're just a young lady, and I am an old man. 'Rich and poor meet together,'" he muttered to himself, "Rich? poor? poor? rich?—it is so difficult always to know how 'tis. Can I show you the way anywhere, miss?" he suddenly asked, recovering his manners.

THE GERMAN ANTI-JEWISH AGITATION.

As regards the extraordinary movement of persecution of the Jews which has broken out in Germany, this is partly traceable to two causes. The first is the personal feeling of the Emperor and his great minister, Prince Bismarck. Prince Bismarck in his early political life made no secret of his opinion that the Jewish race ought to be put down by law, and the result of the three days' debate in the Prussian Parliament in November last seems to indicate that on this, as on most other subjects, the German chancellor retains his original convictions.

"Before he was trammelled by the shackles of office," says a daily newspaper, "Herr Bismarck gave expression to views on this question which are not forgotten at the present time by those who now agitate against what they call the Semitic invasion. He used to hold that the Jews as a body were a stain on the face of civilization; that it was rare that one of them was found following any honest or useful employment; and that the nefarious occupations to which they resorted were tending to degrade the communities in which they lived. In Parliament, when he arrived there, Prince Bismarck openly declared that he was opposed to the admission of a Jew to any official position." Recent events go to prove that he is of the same opinion still.

This anti-Jewish feeling is said to be fully shared by the Emperor, and seems to be evidenced by the attitude of the court. Notwithstanding that the strongest influence has been brought to bear on the Emperor and the royal family, no order has been issued to restrain Herr Stocker—the leader of what is called the Christian Socialist party in Germany, and also the Emperor's court chaplain—in his almost fanatical denunciations of the Jewish population of Germany. Indeed, it has been publicly asserted that his Majesty said to Herr Stocker, speaking of the Jews, "Go on, my dear chaplain; give them no rest." That is, at all events, precisely what Herr Stocker has done, being joined in his exertions by the historian, Professor Treitschke.

But this spirit of hatred against the Jews and apparent determination to renew the persecution of the Middle Ages is by no means confined to the German court—it is thoroughly shared by the German people. The explanation which has been given of this, and which is doubtless true, at least in part, is as follows: "Of late years there has been a considerable tendency among the Polish (and Russian) Jews especially, to settle in Germany. This increase has given serious umbrage to the Teutonic population of the empire. The more phlegmatic German, notwithstanding the cultivation which of late years he has received, finds himself outwitted and overpassed by Jewish intelligence and Jewish enterprise.

His trouble is the very reverse of what England is experiencing with the population of Ireland. Her difficulty is what to do with a race by no means wanting in natural abilities, but so improvident, so ignorant, so superstitious, and consequently so turbulent, as to be a ready prey to priests and agitators. The German anxiety is of a totally different character. The Jew is neither improvident, nor ignorant, nor superstitious, nor turbulent. He has no dealings with the Pope or any other power hostile to that of the country in which he dwells. He has no interest in disorder and confusion, which can only impede his own material progress. The chief complaint alleged against him is that he is too intelligent, too sharp-witted, too money-loving and money-getting, too rich, and too important in the State."

As yet all this is witnessed with tolerable equanimity in England and in France, but the movement in Germany may spread to and should it do so, the Divine intention in its permission is not difficult, in the light of what has been already said, partly, at least, to perceive. For a long time past, demoralized by the very privileges they have enjoyed, there has been a disposition manifest among many of the Jews, if not to deny their nationality, at all events to deprecate and even ridicule the idea of a return to Palestine, preferring rather to identify themselves as far as possible with the Gentiles among whom they dwell. They would fain be considered Germans, or French, or English, rather than Jews, and live in ease and luxury in Berlin, or Paris, or London, careless of "the pleasant land, the land of desire," and that holy city of which the Psalmist said, "Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I prefer not Jerusalem above my joy."

Now, by a renewal of persecution, Judenhetze, or Jew-baiting, as it is now called in Germany, God would seem to say to them, as he said to their fathers of old by the mouth of Ezekiel (20 : 32), "That which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be as the heathen (the Gentiles), as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone. As I live, saith the Lord God, surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with will I rule over you: and I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out from countries wherein ye are scattered." Thus, while many of "Israel after the flesh" may forget and even despise "the promises made to the fathers," they may have it forced upon their reluctant minds that God's purposes must be carried out in their integrity, and by this resuscitation of mediæval prejudice there may, as the Jewish Chronicle itself admits, "be brought out the latent spark of patriotism in the heart of many a Jew who has been drifting toward religious and racial indifferentism."

In fine, then, we are disposed, for our own part, to hear in this new anti-Jewish crusade the ominous croaking of one of those three frog-like spirits of which we read in Revelation 16. It seems to us not improbable that many interpreters of that remarkable prophecy may have gone somewhat wide of the mark from not clearly perceiving its distinctively Jewish bearing. In their attempts to identify the three demon-powers they have proceeded on the assumption that the special mission of these frog-like spirits is to hasten the manifestation of the last personal Antichrist, and thus to precipitate the great-tribulation. But this is not correct.

Their special mission, as we have it expressly stated, is "to gather the kings of the whole world (i.e., the Roman world) to the battle of that great day of God Almighty . . . And," it is added, "he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon" (verses 13–16). And what is this battle of Armageddon? We surely have the answer in Zechariah 14 : 1–4: "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee. For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle, and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished, and half the city shall go forth into capitivity; but the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city. Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle," etc.

Are we not warranted in looking in these

for a distinct anti-Jewish element? And if so, may we not, with much probability, identify the three demon-powers with (1) the Militarism which is making Europe one vast camp; (2) the Infidelity which, like a spreading pall of darkness, threatens to eclipse all heavenly lights of faith and hope; and (3) the Spirit of Persecution which, like the foul exhalation from a pit long covered, but now once more opened, is shaming our boasted nineteenth century civilization. For if it be asked,

What will be the final result of that militarism? we hesitate not to answer, Even that fearful conflict of which Zechariah speaks. And if it be asked, Why should the spirit of persecution be directed in a special manner against the Jews? our answer again is, Because Infidelity, the third of the three demon-spirits, if our identification be correct, knows full well that Judaism is, as it has ever been, the great witness for Theism in the world, corrupt Christianity having become, by reason of Mariolatry and saint-worship, a practical Polytheism. "Ye are my witnesses," saith the Lord to Israel, the witnesses of the truth of My existence as the One Supreme and Eternal; and as such the Jew must necessarily be the object of Antichrist's persecution, since his most distinguishing characteristic is that he "denieth the Father as well as the Son" (1 John 2 : 18).

THE COMING PRINCE.

UNDER the title of the "Coming Prince" a valuable prophetic book is just published by Robert Anderson, LL.D., an English barrister-at-law.

It explains at considerable length the prophetic visions of Daniel, especially that of the seventy weeks, and maintains that the seventieth week (Dan. 9 : 27) will be fulfilled by the future Antichrist making a seven years' covenant with the Jews seven years before the end of the age, and breaking the covenant in the midst of the week, and then enacting his persecuting career for three and a half years until his destruction. The Second Advent of Christ in the air to remove His waiting people is shown, to precede those final three and a half years. The following is one of Dr. Anderson's remarks:

"WHAT IS IT THAT ALL EUROPE IS LOOKING OUT FOR?"

These words are quoted from a leading article in the London Times, on the recent finding of Agamemnon's tomb. "What is it that all Europe is looking for? It is the king of men, the great head of the Hellenic race, the man whom a thousand galleys and a hundred thousand men submitted to on a simple recognition of his personal qualities, and obeyed for ten long years. . . . The man who can challenge for his own the shield of Agamemnon, now waiting for the challenge, is the true Emperor of the East, and the easiest escape from our present difficulties. The realization of this dream will be the fulfilment of prophecy. True it is that popular movements characterize the age rather than the power of individual minds. It is an age of mobs. Democracy, not despotism, is the goal toward which civilization is tending. But democracy, in its full development, is one of the surest roads to despotism. First, the revolution; then the plébiscite; then the despot. The Cæsar often owes his sceptre to the mob. A man of transcendent greatness, moreover, never fails to leave his mark upon his times. And the true king of men must have an extraordinary combination of great qualities. He must be a 'scholar,' a statesman, a man of unflinching courage and irrepressible enterprise, full of resources, and ready to look in the face a rival or a foe." The opportunity, too, must synchronize with his advent. But the voice of prophecy is clear, that the hour is coming and the man.

"In connection with this legend of the reappearance of Agamemnon, it is remarkable that the language of Daniel 8 has led B. W. Newton and others to fix on Greece as the very place in which the future Great Antichrist, the man of prophecy, is to have his rise, and it leaves no doubt but that he will first appear as a sovereign within the territorial limits of theold Grecian Empire."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Postal Committee of the House of Representatives have prepared a bill which, it is hoped, may issue in the revival of American shipping interests. The bill appropriates $1,500,000 for ocean mail service, to be given to American lines of steamers to be established between this country and Central America, South America, and trans-Pacific ports. Under such a law, it is said that the Post-Office Department would be able to secure the establishment of at least five new lines of American steamers for ocean traffic, of which two would traverse the Pacific and three the Atlantic, between our ports and those of the nations affording the chief markets for our products. The annual rate of pay is not to exceed $30 per mile one way. It is stipulated that the steamers must be constructed in our own shipyards.

The Refunding Bill has Passed the House by the votes of some members who are opposed to its provisions. Ten Democrats voted against it, but ten Republicans voted in its favor on the ground that it would be amended by the Senate. It is generally believed that the Senate will recommend a three and a half per cent rate, and will either negative or radically amend the clause relating to the banks, which, it is feared, would impose vexatious restrictions on banking business throughout the country. It is also expected that the term of the bonds will be extended from five to twenty years. Assurances have been given that Democratic Senators will unite with the Republicans in the effort to render the bill financially sound and practicable.

The Population of the United States and Territories is declared by the Superintendent of the Census to be 50,152,866, and that of the States alone to be 49,369,595. It is necessary to newly apportion the members of the House to the thirty-eight States, under this new enumeration, and the work appears likely to arouse some bitter party animosity. The figures are in the hands of the Census Committee, the members of which are trying to agree upon the number of members which the new House shall contain. The chairman has expressed his opinion that the number should be 301. But other members of the committee are in favor of a larger number.

The Superintendent of the Census has sent to Congress tables showing the effect of different plans of reapportionment based on the total number of members to which it shall be decided to limit the new House. From these tables it appears that if twelve members be added, raising the number of Representatives from 293 to 305, three of the twelve additional members would come from the North, and nine from the South. On the other hand, the South would get but nine additional members under 307, while the North would get five. The present distribution is as follows: New England, 28; Middle States, 68; Northwestern States, 92; South, 105. If it is decided to leave the total number at its present limit, New York would lose three of her members and Pennsylvania two.

Mr. Richard W. Thompson, Ex-Secretary of the Navy, attended the sitting of the House Special Committee on January 17th to explain the situation of the Panama Canal Company in relation to the Government. Mr. Thompson has accepted the presidency of the company, and was desirous of convincing the committee that the project was not antagonistic to the Monroe doctrine. Mr. Thompson also attempted to prove that the doctrine has not the force of a law, but was merely a Presidential utterance. The question of route and of practical obstacles in the way of the scheme Mr. Thompson did not discuss; he referred all those questions to the engineers of the company.

Captain Eads, before the same committee, urged the advantages of an interoceanic ship railroad, which, he contended, would prove the most practicable solution of the question. How important a subject this severing of the Isthmus is, and how closely it affects national prosperity, may be inferred from the fact that the wheat alone to be exported from California this year will weigh 900,000 tons, and from Oregon 200,000. Captain Eads, as an argument in support of his scheme, said that the Mexican Government had given the company 1,000,000 acres of land, a right of way one half mile wide across the Isthmus, and the right to import free of duty for ninety-nine years all the material necessary for the railway. He asked of the United States Government that it should guarantee $50,000,000 of the capital stock necessary to construct the road.

The Proceeds of the Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections in New York on December 25th and 26th from the churches, subscription lists, and the boxes deposited at railway stations, ferries, drug stores, etc., are reported by Mr. Charles Lanier, Treasurer of the Association, to be as follows: "For general fund, $23,611.22; designated gifts from churches, lodges, and individuals, $15,240.89; designated gifts sent to hospitals direct, $4,357.68; total, $43,209.79. The total expenses to be deducted from the general fund, including charges for the manufacture of seven hundred tin boxes, $1396.46, will reduce the amount to be distributed among the hospitals to $41,813.33.

An Effort to Reduce the Expenses of this city has been made by the newly-appointed Comptroller of New York. Over fifty employees have been removed from the Department since Mr. Campbell accepted office. The saving effected on the salary list by the change amounts to fifty thousand dollars per annum. It will be remembered that a short time before the late Comptroller retired from office he testified before the Senate Investigating Committee that the Finance Department could not dispense with the services of a single one of the persons then employed therein.

Destructive Avalanches are Reported in Utah. Intelligence from Salt Lake City, dated January 16th, says: "Snow has fallen almost continuously in the Wahsatch Mountains, about the heads of the Little and Cottonwood Rivers, since Christmas. The mountains surrounding the mining town of Alta are steep and high, and the trees have been cut down. On January 12th a snow-slide carried away the Flagstaff ore house and four hundred feet of the railroad sheds, and swept across the flat and the creek to the opposite mountain. Later, another slide passed over the Victoria and Imperial houses, burying two men, who dug their way out in ten hours. Continuing, it swept away a boarding-house, in which were eight persons, of whom four were killed. Another slide smashed and buried the Toledo works and boarding-house, killing two men.

"The avalanche swept away every building owned by the Joab Lawrence Company, together with their tramway, inflicting a loss of $20,000. It buried the Buffalo House, but three men had retired into a tunnel and were rescued exhausted. Fifty persons came down last night, leaving twenty who for various reasons could not get away. The trip down was fearful. Leaving their homes with nothing but the clothes on their backs, the women waded through the snow as best they could, the men carrying the children. There remains enough of the mountain slope still undenuded to complete the destruction of the town, and it may slide at any moment."

New York and the Adjacent Cities were visited on January 21st with weather of almost unprecedented severity. Such a storm has not passed over this part of the coast for a number of years. Snow fell early in the morning, and soon turned to rain, which froze as it fell, covering everything with a thick coating of ice. Branches of trees were borne down by the weight of ice on the twigs, and were broken off, lying across the car tracks and impeding traffic. The telegraph wires, with their icy covering nearly two inches thick, swayed and broke under the strain, and many poles fell under their heavy burdens. Telegraphic communication with places outside of the city was entirely suspended for hours, and although merchants and persons anxious to transmit important intelligence offered any sum to have a telegraphic message sent, it was impossible; the city was cut off from the rest of the country, and it was then realized how dependent we are on telegraphic facilities. The damage to the wires alone caused a loss of over $100,000. Personal injuries from the swinging signs blown down, from overturned chimneys and flag poles, were numerous, and it is feared that many will terminate fatally.

The Frequenters of Gambling Houses in New York had a surprise on January 22d. The familiar implements of the games had disappeared, and in some cases the saloons were closed altogether. The cause of this strange phenomenon became obvious in the evening when Mr. Comstock's agents made a raid on these establishments and in only one case effected a capture. The proprietors of the haunts had received timely information of the projected, raid and had taken precautionary measures.

It would be interesting to learn how the information was given, for strict secrecy had been enjoined. It is said that no policemen were to be employed in the raid, and that the only persons who should have known beforehand that it was to take place were Mr. Comstock, the police commissioners, and Superintendent Walling.

The Call to Service Should Never be Disregarded. An incident related at a public meeting last week is a striking evidence of this fact. A speaker said that he had for some time past been anxious for the eternal welfare of an acquaintance. "Why not call on him and speak with him on the subject?" something seemed to say. He believed that the impulse to call came from God, and on Christmas day he called. He found his friend was in a receptive condition, and he seemed glad to be spoken with. He was anxious to become a Christian, and was waiting for instruction in the way of life. He has since found peace with God through faith.

The Attempt Recently Made by a Prominent New York minister to define the word "temperance" has called forth many pungent criticisms. Dr. Miner, of Boston, Mass., referring in his sermon, on Sunday, January 16th, to the dictum that temperance means moderation, not total abstinence, said that if the definition was good for anything, it implied that a man, to be temperate, must use at least a little of everything. So men must use a little chloral or a little tobacco in order to be temperate. The proper definition is, that temperance is a moderate use of all good things, and total abstinence from all bad things.

A Portrait of the Late Mr. T. DeWitt Talmage, the eldest son of Rev. Dr. Talmage, will appear in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with a sketch of his life.

Mr. Moody's Services in San Francisco have resulted in a widespread revival. Not only in the city itself, but, through the reports of sermons published in the daily press, the surrounding country has been affected. The correspondent of a New York journal mentions an interesting incident in this connection of a letter, received from a church officer in the southern part of the State, grieving for the death of his wife, but rejoicing that the reading of Mr. Moody's sermons and of the Gospel Hymns had brought her, on her deathbed, into precious light and peace. A remarkable feature of the San Francisco services has been the attention given to the subject of the conversion of children, and it has been noticed how large a number of young people have attended the meetings.

To Spend a Fortune in Drink and then Commit suicide was a purpose deliberately formed by a man in Iowa two years ago, and accomplished on January 11th. The reports say that he was a farmer who had accumulated considerable property, and lived happily with his wife, one daughter, and four sons, till 1878, when his wife died. He had been a hard-working, intelligent man, quiet in demeanor, very temperate in his habits, and an exemplary citizen. But upon the death of his wife he became morose and despondent, neglected his work, and appeared to take little interest in either his children or his home. His melancholy increased as the days went by, and all attempts at rousing him from his broodings were vain.

One day the unhappy man disposed of his farm and stock for cash, and declared his purpose to expend the entire sum on drink and then kill himself. He kept steadfastly to his purpose, and drank whiskey incessantly for two years, during the whole of which time he was in a state of intoxication, but never lost his peaceable disposition. At length, on the 11th of January, 1881, when his money was reduced to $5, he ended his existence in this world with a dose of poison. Such inconsolable grief is natural to persons of sensitive feelings, whose whole hopes are confined to this life. But if the man had turned his thoughts to "the continuing city" which is to come (Heb. 13 : 14), his hope would have revived under his great bereavement.

A Limb Saved in Answer to Prayer.—A letter from a wife and mother to the Witness narrates a remarkable incident. The writer says that her husband, a very short time ago, had a wound in one of his limbs. Several doctors examined it but gave scarcely any encouragement. At last it was decided that the limb must be amputated. She burst into tears, and said she was opposed to the operation, being convinced that the Lord could heal it. Earnest prayer was offered, and in a day or two after, a great change took place for the better, to the astonishment of all who saw it. And in ten days from the day appointed for amputation the limb was healed, and the man was able to work for the support of his family.

The Clever Device of a Farmer Saved Him from drowning during the recent frost. He was crossing the ice on Kalamazoo River, near his residence at Marengo, when he slipped through an air-hole concealed by a thin crust of ice. He extended his arms on the solid ice as he fell, and thus saved himself from complete immersion, but he could not extricate himself, for his hands had no hold on the smooth ice, and most of his body was in the water and was weighted with his wet and heavy clothing. At length he conceived the idea of wetting the buckskin mittens he had on and letting them freeze to the smooth surface, when he believed they would be sufficiently firm to enable him to pull himself out by them. By carefully bringing his right hand back by his side he succeeded in wetting the mitten on that hand, and then extending it ahead as far as he could reach, held it until the mitten was firmly fastened to the ice; he then withdrew his hand and seized it, and thus had a firm support. He served the mitten on the other hand the same way, and when both were fixed he grasped them firmly, and with their aid climbed on to the firm ice and was safe.

It was the hazardous expedient of a man rendered desperate by imminent peril, and, happily for him, it was successful. In spiritual matters men have exercised similar ingenuity to find a way of escape from spiritual death, but they have always failed. Only by giving up trying to save themselves, and trusting to Christ alone, is salvation possible (Rom. 3 : 28).

A Funeral Astray on Lake Erie was one of the strange spectacles witnessed during the recent inclement weather. A Buffalo, N. Y., correspondent of the Providence Journal says: "A funeral procession of six or eight carriages started on Thursday, the worst day of the storm, to go to the cemetery. They were obliged, on account of the drifts, to take the road that runs along the Lake shore, and slowly plodded their way along what they supposed was the proper route. Finding they did not reach their destination, they stopped after a while to investigate, and found to their horror that they were one mile from land out on the frozen waters of Lake Erie. The ice was thin and treacherous, and in their bewilderment they hardly knew which way to turn, but at last, with fear and trembling, and almost perished with cold, they crept back to the shore and returned with their dead to the city, to defer their mournful errand to another day." The mourners and attendants must have been thankful to have reached solid ground after so narrow an escape. Their position on the ice was a type of that in which thousands of people live from day to day.

A Man Convicted of Murder Lost His Pardon in a remarkable way at Frankfort, Ky., a few weeks ago. The circumstances, as related by the Richmond Register, are as follows: A man named Samuel Holmes, now in Frankfort jail undergoing punishment for a murder, received a visit from his old schoolfellow Lucien Young. The Kentucky Legislature recorded some years ago its appreciation of Young's bravery in rescuing several lives from a wrecked vessel, and when Young, moved by Holmes's condition, made an appeal to Governor Blackburn for his pardon, the Governor, remembering his brave action, relented and signed the pardon for his sake. With the document in his pocket Young hastened back to the prison to tell the good news to his friend. Before telling him, however, that he had come to make him a free man, Young commenced a conversation, and, after talking a while upon other subjects, finally said, "Sam, if you were turned loose and fully pardoned what would be the first thing you would do?" The convict very quickly responded, "I would go to Lancaster and kill Judge Owsley and a man who was a witness against me." Young uttered not a word, but turned mournfully away, went outside the prison walls, took the pardon from his pocket, and tore it into fragments. This singular incident suggests many lessons; among others that of heartfelt thankfulness to God that when He gives His children pardon for Christ's sake, He also gives them a new heart (1 Cor. 6 : 11).

A Man was Rescued from a Perilous Position through the sagacity of his dog a few days ago, at Missoulia, Montana. It appears that a man named Whitman, with a companion, climbed the mountains near Rattlesnake River in search of game. The two men separated, and shortly afterward Whitman slipped and fell, sliding down the mountain-side. Just as he neared the edge of a precipice he caught a strong sapling with his arm at the elbow, and quickly grasping his wrist with the other hand, he saved himself from being dashed to pieces. But he was suspended over the abyss by the sapling, and could not climb up the side of the rock or release his hold. His dog came to the edge, and looking at him, whined piteously and went away. Just as he was almost exhausted with pain, he heard his companion coming to his rescue. The dog had found him, and by barking and dragging at his coat had brought him to his master's relief.

The dog's instinct prompted him, though unable to rescue his master, to get the help of some one who could save him. It is a lesson for Christians who see children or friends in danger of eternal death. They often try expostulation, warning, entreaty, but forget to carry the case in prayer to God (1 John 5 : 14, 15).

THE SITTING OF THE REFINER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer untothe Lord an offering in righteousness."—MALACHI 3 : 3.

THIS is spoken of as one of the results of the coming of the Lord: He would test and try all things, destroy the false and the evil, and make those pure whom He permitted to remain. Behold, the Promised One has come! He whom Israel sought suddenly appeared in His temple as the messenger of the covenant. Glad were the eyes of Simeon, and Anna, and all those who waited for Him, and glad this day are our voices as we proclaim that the Messiah has appeared. The glorious Son of God, the anointed of the Most High, has been among men, and faithful witnesses have testified concerning Him, "We beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

That coming, heralded by songs of angels, and prophetic of countless blessings, should have been a day of unmingled light to men; but because of hypocrisy, pride, and self, it was not so; on the contrary, it was to many a day of darkness and not of light. We have abundant historical evidence that our Lord's first advent was a day of great trial to the Jewish people; and when we remember the siege of Jerusalem, and kindred events, we do not marvel that the prophet asked, "But who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? for He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap."

His ministry tried the religion, the orthodoxy, and the saintship of the period, and because it revealed the hollowness of the whole of the profession of the day, it aroused all the enmity of the religious classes. Those who were the leaders of the so-called religious thought of the age were aroused to hate the Lord Jesus, and to take a delight in nailing Him to the tree; for His teaching was so true and good that their word-chopping and ceremony-making could not endure it.

Our Lord, when He came, sat as a refiner, and assayed the age then present; and ever since then His Gospel in the world, His Spirit, His teaching, yea, the very fact of His life—these all together have been a test, a trial, a sort of standard of weights and measures among men.

ALL THINGS ARE ON THEIR TRIAL.

You are constantly hearing of this time and that time as being "crises;" and the saying is true. There is always a crisis to something or other during these days of the Lord's sitting as a refiner. All things are being thrust into the furnace, and the fire is kept burning at a white heat, and nothing evil can abide the flame. Everything that is good shall be conserved, purified, made brilliant; but all that is evil, be it what it may, the whole world over, since Christ has come, shall be tried and dissolved as by fire. When our Lord comes the second time the trial will be still more intense. "Who shall abide the day of His coming" when He shall still further be revealed, and when His purpose shall be rather that of judgment than of mercy?

It is well for us to know that, whenever Jesus Christ draws near to a soul, He comes in utmost mercy to make it clean. Because He is in Himself the incarnation of ineffable love, His coming always means that He is about to purify the soul, for the highest mercy is to rid us of sin. The grandest thing that God Himself can do in the purpose of His love is to purify us into His own glorious holiness. Christ loved His church, and this is how He showed it: "He gave Himself for it, that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."

If any of you, my hearers, are seeking the Lord at this time, I want you to understand what it means: you are seeking a fire which will test you, and consume much which has been dear to you. We are not to expect Christ to come and save us in our sins; He will come and save us from our sins; therefore, if you are enabled by faith to take Christ as a Saviour, remember that you take Him as the purger and the purifier, for it is from sin that He saves us.

We are going to talk of this purifying process. "He shall sit as a refiner."

HOW IS THE REFINING CARRIED ON?

It is carried on in part by the Word of God. "Is not my word like a fire?" Wherever the Gospel is preached thoroughly, out and out, it is a wonderful consumer of dross. I have known certain congregations that have been dead in worldliness, the haunts of wealthy professors, whose love to Christ is a mere pretence. Close to them I have seen another church which has been lively in spirit, and full of zeal for the Lord. Whence the difference? The reason has usually been this—that in the one case there was man's ministry, and in the other there was the Word of the Lord. Ministries of the Spirit worldly people cannot bear. They are displeased with a plain testimony. It rasps their conscience. There is no need to turn them out of the church; they drop away of themselves: it is not the place for them; it is too hot for them, I mean too holy, too spiritual, too devout. By and by they are offended, and murmuringly they prepare to emigrate. There are so many things that they do not approve of, they see so much that is dreadfully orthodox, narrow-minded, and bigoted; and so they trot off among their own cattle. Yes, and so they should. That is God's way of keeping His flock to itself.

Those that are rooted up by the Word of God are best rooted up. We may always be practising this kind of separating the tares from the wheat, for it leaves the testing with God and a man's own conscience, and hence no injustice will be done. It would be ill by excommunications to seek to root up the tares from among the wheat, lest we root up the wheat with them; but by the Word, if it be preached in the power of the Holy Ghost, the process will be always going on.

Another purging operation is by causing His chosen to have more fellowship with His own blessed and glorious self. Of all the means of purging the heart none surpasses this, for when the Lord in great mercy draws His child near to Him, and makes Him feel His love, and know it beyond a doubt, then the favored heart longs to be holy in all things. Jealousy is cruel as the grave, and a holy jealousy does stern work in our hearts with sin. It hangs up the darling sin before the face of the sun, and calls upon the fowls of heaven to come and feast upon the slain. Oh, that we knew Christ better, and lived more in the light of His countenance, for then should we be purged as with the spirit of burning.

After all, the Holy Spirit is the great fire that burns in Zion to purge believers from the love of sin. It is He that makes use of the Word, and makes use of fellowship, and makes use of everything else, to sever sin from the saint, and take away the dross from the silver. He is the immediate agent of our sanctification; all else we must regard as only the means in His skilful hand. To Him be our love and our praise evermore.

As a subsidiary means the Lord uses providence. I have no doubt that He uses very frequently gracious providences, as we call them—that is, providences which please us by gratifying our natural wishes. Some people have been sanctified by prosperity; but I do not think very many have been. Few good medicines are pleasant to the palate. If we were as we ought to be, every joy that comes to us would tend to make us grateful, and so it would make us love God; and what is that but to be more like God and more holy? But, alas, in that we are weak through the flesh, the gentler modes of love far oftener fail than her rougher processes. It remains then, that, if we cannot be preserved in honey, we must be salted with fire, lest corruption should take hold upon us.

Such is the stubbornness of our flesh, that the Lord uses for fuel in His furnace sharp and heavy trials of different kinds. Adversity assumes many forms, and in each and all of its shapes the Lord knows how to use it for His people's benefit. Christ sits as a refiner when He takes away prosperity, and brings the wealthy down to poverty. He often refines men by the losses which they sustain of beloved friends. Bereavement burns like a blast-furnace; and, oh, how much of carnal love has been consumed by it!

Yes, affliction is what most believers think of when they read such a passage as this; but I warn them not to think too much of it, for that is not the Refiner's only fire, nor is it even His best fire. Affliction is but one part of the machinery of the Royal Refinery—one of the fluxes by which the great Lord separates the precious from the vile.

I desire to call your attention to the text by leading you to mark three things. First, I want you to watch the attitude of the Refiner—"And He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." Secondly, the object of His refining—"He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver." And, thirdly, the result of the refinement—"That they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness."

I. Notice carefully

THE ATTITUDE OF THE REFINER—

"He shall sit." The posture would not have been mentioned had it not been instructive.

Sitting looks like the attitude of indifference. There is the metal vexed with a white heat: here is the refiner sitting down. There is the child of God upon the bed of pain, and he cries, "My Lord, come and help me;" and there the Refiner sits, looks on, but does not stir a hand. The child of God is sinking in trouble; he fears, like Peter, that the next step may drown him; and there is his Lord, calm and unmoved. When the apostolic ship was out at sea, and tossed with tempest, Christ was asleep in the hinder part of the vessel.

Unbelief dares challenge His love because of this apparent apathy: How can He sit still and see us suffer. She mutters, "He is indifferent: He does not care." "Carest thou not that we perish?" is the cry of unbelief; and before the heart actually utters it, it begins to think, "Where is the tenderness of Christ? Where is the gentleness of God? Am I thus to be tortured? Am I thus to be tried? Am I thus to be tossed from billow to billow without a helper?" Yet after all our crying and tears the Refiner sits still! Yes, He to all appearance disregards our prayers and entreaties, and fulfils the description of the text—"He sits."

It is wonderful how often God seems utterly indifferent to His people, and how a Christ filled with compassion, because He has been tried in all points like as we are, yet seems to look down upon our sorrows with undisturbed serenity. I once heard a Welshman preach in his own native tongue. It was a sermon in which he got into the spirit of his subject, and spake as one inspired. He used a very simple illustration when he said, "The mother has her dear babe upon her knee. It is time for washing; she washes its face. The little one cries; it loves not the soap; it loves not the water; and therefore it cries. Here is a great sorrow! Listen to its lamentations! It is ready to break its heart! What does the mother do? Is she sorrowful? Does she weep? No; she is singing all the while, because she understands how good it is that the child should suffer a little temporary inconvenience in order that its face, all smeared and foul, should become bright and beautiful again.

"Thus does the great Father rest in His love, and rejoice over us with singing while we are sighing and crying." Ours is but a child's sorrow, sharp and shallow, of which the greatest source is our own ignorance of the great designs of the Perfecter of men. The Lord pities our childish sorrow, but He does not so regard it as to stay His hand from His cleansing work. "Let not thy soul spare for his crying," said Solomon; and our wise Father when He is chastening us does not spare us for our crying.

What if the metal that is put into the furnace should be sentient when the crucible is hot, and should cry out, "Oh, take me out; the fire is too hot; I cannot bear it. I am dissolving; I am melting; take me out." Would the assayer regard the entreaties of the metal? Ah, no! The refiner sits still. Why should he be flurried? He knows what he is at, and He knows that His divine methods are wise and infallible. He is not hurting the silver, but doing it lasting service. He is not even putting it through a needless process. He is taking the shortest way of working when He seems to be longest in His assays. There is a haste that is not good speed, and God uses not such haste as that; He moves at the pace of perfection, and that may seem slow to petulance. He shall sit as a refiner till thou shalt say, "Does He care at all for me?"

Carnal reason may judge as it pleases as to the indifference of Him who seems to sit at ease while His people are melted in the flames, but faith is full well assured that in the attitude of the Divine Refiner there is real attention. Why does the refiner sit, but because he is resolved steadily to watch the crucible? He will not go away and leave it, even for a moment, lest the heat should grow too great or a certain point should be passed over when his presence would be essential to the success of the process.

I have often heard that a refiner sits and looks at the silver till he can see his own portrait in it; but, though I have heard that venerable story many times, and can see the evident moral of it, I have my suspicions as to its being a matter of fact. I certainly should not like to be the refiner who had such a task to do, for when a crucible is in the white heat of the furnace it is almost enough to burn out your eyes to look at it even for an instant, and I do not believe that any human being could watch a mass of molten silver glowing in the furnace till he saw his own image there. Christ's eye can bear the blaze, and He can watch us in the fires. But I use not the illustration, because I have my doubts about the truth of it.

Our Lord sits as the refiner at the furnace mouth, because He is all attention. He has, as it were, given up all other cares just to sit there and watch His treasure. He is determined that His servants shall be purified—that the sons of Levi shall be purged; and so there He is, everything else laid aside, giving His whole heart and soul to those whom He is refining. Poor, bowed heart, Jesus is all attention. His sitting down is not because He forgets, but because He remembers.

"God's furnace doth in Zion stand,
But Zion's God sits by,
As the refiner views his gold,
With an observant eye."

Always observing, always watching. Jesus shall sit—"He shall sit as a refiner."

But we may notice more than this. I think I see in the sitting down of the refiner a as if he seemed to say, "This is stern work, and I will sit down to it, for it will need care, and time, and constant watchfulness. This metal may need to be purified in a furnace of earth seven times, but I am set upon the perfecting of the work, and, therefore, here I place myself. I shall bear with this man till I have delivered him from his faults. I shall bear with this woman till I have made something of her—till I have got away that which weakens and injures her character. I mean to bear with this poor, petulant, unbelieving, complaining, selfish, groaning mortal; he has some love to me, and some life in me; and, therefore, I will bear with him till his life and love shall have conquered all earthly grossness, and he shall be a lump of pure metal fit for my Father's treasury."

I find in looking at the original that the word for "sit" is one which is used many times in Scripture for the posture of a king upon a throne; it is a sort of regal sitting down. So that we have here the posture of power. "He shall sit as a refiner" signifies, then, I take it, that He who seems indifferent, but who is constantly observant and patient, is seated on His throne possessing infinite power over all things, so that the process which He is watching can be checked or quickened according to His own will and wish. He reigns as a refiner, He has power over every coal, over every single jet of gassy flame, power over every breath of air that fans the fire, power over the furnace to its inmost centre and its utmost vehemence, power over the metal itself and its dross, and all that is excellent about it as well as all that is vile. Oh, this is

A GRAND CONSOLATION!

He that has undertaken to purify us can do it, for He sits on the throne of boundless might.

Eternal power performs what everlasting love designs. So I conceive that the text may also teach us the perfect perseverance of Christ in the work of the purifying of his people. "He shall sit as a refiner." Might not your backsliding after you had once reached a great height of sanctity have disappointed Christ, and made Him leave you? Yes, if it were not true of Him, "I am God: I change not," He would have left you to be consumed. But therefore ye are not consumed, because from His blessed purpose He will not swerve. Oh, how many times you and I have seemed to make advances toward purity, but have gone back again to folly, thus manifesting the abundance of our alloy. It did seem as if, at last, the blessed flame of grace had begun to make us bright; and yet we have dulled again back to the old state. But where is the Refiner? Has He gone? By no means. There He is! He has been sitting as a refiner, and He is sitting still.

II. Now, dear brethren, suffer a few words upon of our Lord's refining work. This point has come up all along. May the Spirit of God instruct us concerning it.

The great object of His refining is that He may deliver us from all evil, and make us perfect. Recollect, the subjects of purifying are His own chosen ones—"He shall purify the sons of Levi." Levi was the tribe taken out of the rest for God's service. The Lord has a people whom He has set apart unto Himself, and these He will purify. Do others think that He does them an injustice by this act of choice? Would they like to be purified? Then, depend upon it, He will not refuse it to them. Nay, the quibble lies in words, and has no truth in it.

Men pretend to be angry with electing love, though they have no desire for it themselves. God's election is an election to holiness, and this is a thing which men in their heart of hearts do not desire. Sirs, if you do not wish for purification and holiness, wherefore should you quarrel with God that He gives it not to you? Yet unholy men rave at election to holiness, and call it partiality, and I know not what besides. Ye dogs in the manger, will ye always howl at God because He gives to His own sheep that which you will not care to have? If you wish for it you may have it. Free is the Gospel to every soul under heaven that desires it.

The refiner begins His work by discovering to His people their need of purity. What! purify the sons of Levi? Do they want it? Surely, Reuben, Manasseh, Gad—these might want purifying; but Levi opens and shuts the door of the house of God. It is a Levite that sacrifices, that enters within the veil. Does he require purifying? Ay, that he does. "He shall purify the sons of Levi"—the best, the very best, the holiest—those that come near to God—the true silver and the real gold. He shall purify these. Brother, sister, have you a notion that you do not need purifying? Discard it, for if we walk in the light as God is in the light, and have closest fellowship with God, yet still we need the cleansing blood.

Did you ever notice that the branch which feels most of the knife, and gets most of the pruning, is not the dead branch? Not that withered, crooked branch, does the husbandman wound with the knife. No, the best branch, that bears most fruit, is most worthy of the gardener's visits and shall be most favored with them. That ore which has the most gold in it, in proportion to the quartz, is the likeliest to get into the fire. He that has most of refinement is he on whom Christ will carry out His refining work. "He shall purify the sons of Levi."

Further, observe that He not only discovers to them their need of this purity, but He remedies their impurity. He shall actually purify them as gold and silver. The point is the thoroughness of it. This piece of wood which makes my pulpit, if it is defiled, it is dusted, and it is at once sufficiently cleansed. Your platters are washed; that is all. Your furniture may need beating, dusting, and many processes; but there is nothing thorough in them compared with the metaphor of the text—"He shall purify them as gold and silver." They must go into the fire. The purging that God gives His people is not the washing of the outside of the cup and platter, it is the cleansing of the soul, the heart—the purging of the inward parts of the man—a fiery purging.

Fire does not merely go about the metal, but it penetrates, and passes right into it. The metal is hot; it is melted; it flows; the fire has dissolved the mass. We say in the hymn, "Refining fire, go through my heart;" and that is the nearest approximation of language; but fire does something more than go through the metal. It seems to get into the very essence and nature and character of the metal, and fuse it all, making it all feel its supreme force. The Lord's purification of His people in order to make them fit to be with Him in heaven is a fire process, mysterious, inward, penetrating, consuming, transforming.

This fire process is intended to be thorough, that it may be abiding. If you get a piece of gold or silver, though it has been through the fire it may grow dull again, but it cannot again become impure and alloyed. Silver will soon oxidize upon the surface, but for all that the bulk of the silver vessel is not injured at all; it remains pure silver after it has been through the fire. The work is done, and done thoroughly. The purifications of God will last throughout eternity. Have you ever reflected upon the fact that when Christ's refining work is done upon us there will never be any need for it again? Blessed be God, there is no purgatorial fire. Oh, well may we be content to let the fire burn and let the coals glow as much as ever they will, since it can be only for a very little while, and then come the ages, the eternities, the God, the Christ, the heaven which He has prepared for us when we are prepared for them. This, then, is the object of His refining.

III. Thirdly, and to conclude, what will be of this refining as Christ carries it on? It will be this, "That they may offer to the Lord an offering of righteousness."

First, these Levites shall attend to their business. They ought to have been working at the temple, but they had forgotten their high calling. The sons of Levi had taken up their portion in the world, though their God had never given them any, for He gave no portion to Levi when the land was divided among the tribes. "The Lord's portion is His people," and the Lord is the portion of their inheritance. The Levites had got away from their spiritual calling, and had given themselves up to mind this and that; but it is pleasant to observe that when God purifies them, then they begin to do their own business—"That they may offer to the Lord."

Oh, beloved, if you have been refined by the Word, if you have been refined by the Spirit, if you have been refined by heavenly joys, if you have been refined by sanctified sorrows, you wish to serve God much more than ever you did before. You now pray that if you have lived to self in any degree, you may be forgiven, for you wish to live in Christ, and to Him alone. Now, as the Levite, you say, "What can I do for God? There is nothing here worth living for but to love and serve Him. Here, Lord, tell me what thou wouldest have me to do. I desire to do it at once." Brother, thank God for every trial you have suffered, if it leads you to offer your sacrifice. I will bless God for all I have endured myself, if I am enabled to fulfil my priesthood; for are we not a nation of priests, a peculiar people set apart to offer sacrifice to God?

And this is to be the result of refinement; that we do good work and service unto God. Some of you want a little pushing on in this direction, for I know a great many Christians who live as if the main point in religion was to enjoy yourself. "I enjoyed that sermon. I enjoyed that prayer-meeting." Yes, that is quite right. But

HAVE YOU DONE ANYTHING?

Have you served the Master? Have you offered anything to Jesus? Have you brought forth fruit to His glory? Oh, it is a good thing to be watered; it is a blessed thing to stand in the warm sunlight and grow; but after the watering and the sunshine must come the fruit-bearing, or we shall be barren fig-trees after all. And so it is in the text, you see—"That they may offer unto the Lord an offering."

But, then, next, they are not only to do their work, but they are to do it well. "They must offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness," for, oh, we may do much for God that looks very pretty, but when we get into trial and look back upon our service by the furnace light we do not think much of it. Have you ever taken a little time to look back upon your service of God, and have you not wondered at yourself that you have done it so badly? Have you not said, "Please God I may address that class again, I will be more passionately in earnest?" Have you not said, "Please God I may get out to that village to preach again, I will speak with all my soul, and nothing else but Christ shall be my theme?" Have we not often wished we could do our life work over again, that we might do it better? I do not think that there is any use in that wish. Let us improve what is to be done in the future, rather than wish to undo the past. Let us buckle on our harness, and ask God to give us more spiritual intensity, that what is done may be a sacrifice offered in righteousness unto the Lord.

And then another result of this purification is that they were accepted, for the next verse says, "Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord as in the days of old." When God accepts our persons He accepts our offerings, but if we are not ourselves accepted, then that which we do is rejected. When the Lord Jesus Christ enables us to live by faith in Him, and to see that we are "accepted in the Beloved," and when that faith helps us to work in a right spirit and serve God from a pure motive, then we ourselves and our work are pleasant unto God as in former days.

God grant that the blessed processes of His providence and of His grace which are being carried on in His people may be carried on in you and me, that we may serve God with perfect hearts all our days.

I think I heard somebody say, "I do not want putting through that process. I do not wish for such purifying." You have seen that they throw out from the furnace. They lie in great heaps at the pit's mouth. Will these be a picture of you and your eternal condition? Reprobate silver shall men call them, because God has rejected them. Will you be the slag cast away? the dross left forever? Oh, eternity, eternity, what must it be to be shipwrecked on thy shoreless sea, and drifted forever as a waif and stray from God and hope? Eternity, eternity, what must it be to be rejected and cast away from the presence of God and from the glory of His power, thrown out upon the waste-heap of the universe, forever given up? God save any man from that!

Oh, it were worth wading through a thousand hells to obtain that which makes existence worth the having—namely, rightness with God. But, oh, if there were nothing else to lose but God's love, nothing else to earn by neglect of things divine but to be rejected of God, I would plead with you with my whole soul that you should seek the Lord now. Cry mightily to the divine Saviour that He may now purge you with His precious blood from all the guilt of sin, that He may then go on with the second process by which He shall purge you from the power and habit and defilement of sin, and make you, like Himself, immaculate before the Omniscient. God grant it, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

By a London Clergyman.

MRS. CRAPPIT'S GRIEVANCE.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER II.

SAM kept up splendidly. He was a constant visitor at his neighbor's, and was often induced to join in their little devotions. Those from without who remembered the sad life he had lived before, and now saw him kneeling devoutly down, and turning over the leaves of the Bible, lifted up their hands in the blankest astonishment.

This went on for many weeks. About six weeks after, at the time that Sam generally appeared, his place was empty. It was so the next day, and the next after that again. It was time for some one to look him up. John Snow did look him up, and found, alas! that there was only too good reason for Sam's absence. He had taken to the drink again. Even when John met him he was a little the worse for drink. However, John Snow knew human nature well enough to see that although Sam Crappit was somewhat stupid from drink, he had sense enough to give an account of himself. So, by dint of much persuasion and coaxing, and a little friendly pressure, he got Sam into his own house, and sat him down in front of the fire.

How thoroughly ashamed of himself Sam looked as he sat there gazing into the fire. He was almost too ashamed to look up. He remembered only too well how often he had bent the knee and read the Bible in that very room.

"Now, Sam," said John Snow, "tell us all about it. Who is there to tell if not your old friend John?"

"I couldn't help it. I assure you I couldn't," blurted out the poor fellow. "I felt as if I must have a drop when it was under my very nose, and the smell of it was so strong."

"What do you mean, Sam? When was it under your nose? I don't quite understand you."

"Well, I'll tell you all about it. You know the last night I was here. Well, that was when I got floored. After I left you and got in, there was my wife a drinking of her beer. There warn't nothing extraordinary in that, for she always had her beer every night afore going to bed. Ah! John, I've had some terrible struggles when I've been sitting and looking ather sipping, sipping, with the smell of it a filling the room. She allers puts a red-hot poker into it afore drinking it, to make it warm.

"Well, that night I'd had a bigger tussle than ever with my old appetite, for it so happened, just after she had made her beer hot with the poker, one of the children up-stairs began to squall, and she was obliged to leave it. It was then I tasted it. I couldn't help it. I assure you I couldn't. There, afore my very eyes, was the mug of beer with the froth atop, and, for the life of me, I couldn't help sniffing it. But when I sniffed it, it was all up with me. I took the mug up, and drained the whole lot at one go. And then I was so afraid to meet my missus, and so ashamed to come to you, that off I rushed to the 'Blue Anchor,' and I've been there off and on ever since. There, that's the whole story."

"It was a great temptation, no doubt, Sam," said John Snow; "but it was a pity you gave way to it. Did you ask the Lord to help you?"

"Why, no," responded Sam; "I never thought of it."

"Then no wonder you gave way. I should have given way long ago if it hadn't been for the Lord's help, Sam."

"Would you? Then of course I can't expect to do it alone."

"Sam," said John Snow decidedly, "you must start afresh to-night, and begin again. And I'll set my missus to go round to your wife and give her a bit of advice. But let's kneel down and pray to the Lord about it."

So the two knelt down and prayed, and Sam Crappit rose from his knees firmly determined to start again, and to trust in the Lord to help him to stand without falling.

John Snow and his wife had a long talk about Mrs. Crappit that night.

"I warned her about that supper beer weeks ago, but she wouldn't listen," said Mrs. Snow. "She got quite angry with me, and declared she wouldn't give up her beer for anybody—not she. She'd been used to her beer for twenty years, and she wasn't going to give it up now. If her man was such a feeble creature as to be upset by the little beer she took, why, he wasn't worth a straw. And so she went on."

"Well, I'd try her again," said John. "Perhaps she'll see the evil of it now."

Mrs. Snow went, but it was an utterly fruitless visit she paid.

"I tell you what, Mrs. Snow," said Mrs. Crappit, "if you'll mind your business I'll mind mine. I tell you plainly, I'll never give up my beer as long as I live. There."

What was to be done? The only thing they could think of was for Sam to come in and sit with them while the beer-drinking went on, and thus escape the temptation. This he did, joining in their family prayers, and learning about the Lord Jesus Christ, who gave up everything to do good to poor sinful men.

So the time went on. At last there came the turning point. Mrs. Crappit got ill, and took to her bed; and as Mrs. Snow looked after her household affairs for her, and brought her nice things cooked by her own hands, she could not in all conscience forbid her coming up to read, or even pray with her. She did not relish it at all at first; but after a bit she got more reconciled to it, and even liked it.

It was very sad to see Mrs. Crappit, once so energetic and bustling, fast bound to her bed by weakness, scarcely able to speak, and that only in the faintest whisper. But yet it was the very best thing in the world that could have happened to her. For when she got stronger, and was able to get down-stairs by the help of her husband, a great difference was noticed by all the neighbors, young and old.

"I wonder what's come over Mrs. Crappit?" they asked.

Mrs. Snow could have told them if they had asked her. She could have told them that Mrs. Crappit had learned to look upon her past life with no very favorable eye; that she had at last come to the fixed conclusion that she had been going on in a wrong road altogether; and more than that, had even been heard to say, "God be merciful to me a sinner." And the quietness, humility, and silence of Mrs. Crappit were just the result and consequence of all this. She had learned to trust Jesus as her Saviour, and had promised Him to live no longer for herself, but for Him who loved her, and gave Himself for her.

It was touching to watch Mrs. Crappit now. She was living a new life altogether. She went so softly about the house, shut the doors so gently, and spoke to Sam and the children so quietly, that it was quite a question with Sam which was the quieter house, his or John Snow's.

There were no temptations in the house now. If Sam fell any more into intemperate habits, he would have only himself to thank. Where the linen was dried now was always a mystery to him. And how she managed to keep the children so clean and quiet, give him such nice, savory meals, and always have such a comfortable little corner for him to sit in, was equally mysterious.

Sam would sit on one side of the fire, Mrs. Crappit on the other, and the little ones between; and while the kettle was singing, and the kittens were playing, those two would look upon each other as they once did when they went courting together. And when Mrs. Crappit was moving about to get his supper ready, Sam would watch her with his eyes as full of wonder and delight as they could hold.

Now and then Sam's thoughts used to wander back to days gone by, and, for a moment or two, he would fancy himself the old tippler, and his wife the same old scold. How miserable he would feel then! And what a shock of surprise it gave him when, looking sharply round, he saw Mrs. Crappit in her new trappings, a soft look in her eyes, and a loving word upon her tongue. At such times as that Sam's eyes would fill with tears, and his heart would give a great bound. He would even rub his eyes lest it might be only a bright but shadowy dream.

Mrs. Crappit was not at all a beautiful woman. You might have called her a very plain woman indeed. But how beautiful she did look in his eyes!

And when during the day Sam's mates tempted him to drink, how her homely features did float about him to be sure; not talking and threatening as of old, but smiling—actually smiling upon him, as though she were saying to herself, "What a good joke to ask Sam Crappit to drink!"

How quickly he got home, too, after his work. If truth could be told, he used to run a part of the way. Mrs. Crappit would be at the door holding up the baby—"as pretty a pictur' as you ever did see," as Sam used to say to himself. Indeed, Sam's admiration of his wife got to such a pitch that I verily believe he would have taken it as a most natural thing if she had suddenly sprouted a pair of wings and flown clean away from earth.

What cosey little meetings they had with the Snows; and very proud and happy was Sam when he gave out the hymn and chapter, and led them all in prayer. And how boisterously Mrs. Crappit used to sing, and repeat her "Amens!" Were there ever such happy people?

Sometimes Mrs. Crappit would moralize a bit to herself—"What an old fool I was to go and talk, talk, talk as I did. I must have been as blind as a bat not to see where it would drive my man. Why, we've been and lost years of happiness through this wicked old tongue of mine, and through my sticking to my beer. Beastly stuff! I hate the very sight of it now. Thank the Lord for opening my eyes, and a washing away my sins. It's wonderful how He does help me when I trusts Him. He keeps down my temper, and fills this heart of mine with the beautifullest peace. I wouldn't change with any woman in the world—no, not with the queen on her throne—that I wouldn't; not if she was to go down on her knees and ask me to. And, God helping me, I'll be a real good wife to Sam as long as ever I live."

And as she had no mercy on her old self, so she had no mercy on others who acted as she once did. She would almost seem to have taken it up as a sort of mission to ferret out other Mrs. Crappits, and to give them a bit of her mind. She still used her tongue; but now it was on the right side.

"Now Mrs. Crump," she would say to one who was belaboring her tipsy husband with her sharp tongue, "that won't do at all. That's just the wery wrong way. If you wants him to go to the public, then talk to him. You take some advice from a woman as knows that a long tongue ain't not a bit of good; it only makes matters worser."

"Mrs. Foster," she would say to another, "wet linen's uncomfortable, wery. Men don't like it. It's all right enough to dry your sheets; but to hang 'em up when your man's come home ain't right nohow. There's no wet linen at the public."

"Faugh!" she would exclaim to a third, at the slender spread she had made for her husband's supper, "a cold herring ain't proper wittles for a hungry man. Now I knows why he gets his sausage and tater at the public, and something else upon the top of it."

And so Mrs. Crappit went on from day to day fighting the husbands' battles, ever pointing to her old self, and the change that had come over her, and urging all to seek the Saviour she had found so precious.

The Wicked Practice of Duelling is the Subject of a stringent bill which has been introduced in the South Carolina Legislature. By its provisions a person killing another in a duel, or so wounding him that he dies within six months, is to suffer death; and a person carrying a challenge, or being present at a duel, is to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for two years and fined. The bill, it may be hoped, will become a law, for many valuable lives have been lost by this false notion of honor. A feeling is prevalent among certain classes that to shoot a man in what is called a fair fight is not murder. What conscience and religious teaching has not effected may possibly be done by the fear of punishment.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK,

January 21, 1881.

Coasting Accidents—Higher Appreciation of Boys—Forgotten Childhood—The Anti-Chinese Ordinance—Americans in Need of Cleansing—The Gospel of Soap and Starch—Misdirected Legislation—The Idlers, Not the Workers, to be Watched—The Four Walls of Heaven—Sudden Exits from Life—Life's Alarm Bells—The Voyage on the Eternal Ocean.

THE most noticeable events of the week are the accidents by boys coasting. More disasters of this kind than usual, because for twenty years there has not been such favorable weather for this juvenile recreation. And then such events are now considered more worthy of telegraphy than formerly, for boys are better appreciated than they used to be, and their sports attract more and more consideration.

The accidents of this week have been dreadful, and it is evident that in all our cities these sports need regulation by the authorities; but they do not require suppression. I have been fearful, in view of these that such amusements would be prohibited. Considering the fact that all the boys in America who could get a sled, whether gilded and from the hardware store, or two hickory withes bent back and extemporaneously fastened, have this week been riding down-hill, there have been fewer accidents than might have been expected.

There are dangers attached to all recreations—velocipedes, bicycles, garden-swings, horseback-riding, ball-playing, pitching quoits, and gymnastics. In all these amusements lives have been slain. If we prohibited all things that have dangers attached, we would stop all pleasures and all activities. It is dangerous for you to eat; you might choke. It is dangerous for you to walk down the street, for, slipping on an orange-peeling, you might injure your spine. It is dangerous to breathe, for you might inhale malaria. By all means let city authorities regulate coasting and steer it clear of telegraph-poles and foot-passengers; but enact no city ordinance against the outbreak of healthful human nature.

Within sight of my window for the last ten days, the procession of sleds flying down hill and crawling up—for what genuine boy would not walk up to ride down?—the shout of demonstrative glee, the clear sweep of fun that imperilled neither life nor limb, have been something for all good men and women to smile over and rejoice in. That is the way our youth are to get muscle and nerve and exuberance for the work they will be called to do when they arrive amid the twenties and the thirties and the forties and the fifties of earnest life. The boys who skate no pond, strike no ball, fly no kite, trundle no hoop, coast no hill, will have no strength for the work of coming life.

The truth is that too many men by the time they are forty forget they were ever ten, and by the time they are fifty forget they were ever fifteen. Give the children all the fun they can have. Do not expect them to stay at home and bathe your gout.

Multiply all their facilities for sport. The way to crowd out bad amusements is to increase innocent amusements. When your boy is dead, if that overwhelming grief should ever strike your soul, you will feel more satisfaction in thinking of what pleasures you gave him than what unnecessary self-denials you inflicted upon him.

In all the questions that come up between men and boys, count me on the side of the boys, and all I ask of the latter, in compensation of this defence, is, that some time, when I get back to my accustomed buoyancy of spirits, they take me on board their sleds some starlight night, and with lantern ahead to show the way, and boy's foot behind to steer the craft, they give me a free, swift ride, like a flash going down from Cumberland Street to the foot of the Park. Do not let us stand projecting the shadow of our sorrows upon the sunshine of boyhood and girlhood. After a while their time to weep and struggle and groan will come. It will come soon enough. Let them be happy while they may. Let us not have less but more sportfulness for the young.

Among the profoundly suggestive events of the week is the announcement by Chin Lan Kin, the Chinese minister, to that the ordinance proposed by our Common Council prohibiting foreigners from the rights of laundrymen in this city until a certain number of years of residence, is an ordinance of no effect, and the corresponding fact that Mayor Howell proposes to disregard the ordinance. If our Mayor will put both feet on that ordinance, as he will, he will put all good citizens under obligations, as he has already during his administration of unparalleled popularity.

As I understand it, the regulation does not affect the Chinese more than all the foreigners. The Irish women or the German women who propose to wash for a living, unless they have been here a certain number of years, will be liable to arrest. I declare before God and the people that there ought not to be a foot of ground between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts where any man or woman shall be interfered with in making an honest living. Whether they come from Cork, or Hamburgh, or Peking, give them free washtub. There are tens of thousands of native-born Americans who need to be more thoroughly washed, and if foreigners can bring to them a gospel of starch and soapsuds, the quicker the better.

When the ordinance against foreign laundrymen was read to me by a member of my family, I said, "That must be a joke; some facetious reporter has concocted that story for the public merriment; it cannot be that in this boasted nineteenth century, and in this City of Churches, such a law should be enacted." But I find that it is a serious regulation, and no time ought to be lost in the erasure of such an enactment.

It is not the industrious people of a city who need to be watched and legislated against, but the idlers, who do nothing themselves, and are not willing that anybody else should work. They are the people you need to watch. Especially ought there to be no legal hindrance to the laundrymen. We have in Brooklyn no scarcity of water. With the Ridgewood rushing into our basins, and the East River on one side, and the Atlantic Ocean on the other, there will be plenty of water for the laundrymen to work with, and never since Noah's flood was there less excuse for not being thoroughly clean.

You see the direction in which this disposition to legislate against any foreign people leads out. The same spirit which asks, "Must the Chinese go?" if it be consistent, will after a while ask, "Must the English go?" "Must the Scotch go?" "Must the Germans go?" and if that should come, then the consistent question would be, "Must those born of foreign parents go?" And as that would clear out the most of us, the country would be left to the genuine Americans, whose ancestors all the way back have been Americans—namely, the Modocs, and the Choctaws, and the Cherokees, and the Comanches. No, my religion and my patriotism declare, Let all the people who have come in, whether through the Golden Gate of the Pacific, or through the Narrows of the Atlantic, stay and have a place to work and a home to live in, and an altar at which to worship God in their own way.

This is a mighty big country, and we shall all have plenty of room, though we outlive the age of Methuselah. Every one of us, as long as we are continued in health of body and mind, will be able to take care of ourselves, and our children will be able to take care of themselves, while the good and gracious Lord takes care of us all. What a great and mighty heart He has! with room in it for all nations, and He asks none of them to go.

If after all things earthly are wound up, and all the affairs of the universe are wound up, spirits blest should go out to find the north and south and east and west wall of heaven, it would be found that the four walls of it stand inside the all-encompassing heart of God.

Perhaps the most stirring facts of the week, and indeed of the last month, are the out of human life. Nobody seems to have any final warning. Before you hear your friends are sick you hear they are dead. A prominent gentleman of the city declared to me a few days ago: "I never knew so many sudden departures. I have got almost nervous about looking over the death column in the newspaper day after day. It says of some of my friends or neighbors, 'Died suddenly of diphtheria,' 'suddenly of scarlet fever,' or 'suddenly of pneumonia.'"

The fact is that in this day God gives us so much intelligent warning in time of health that we ought not to expect any extra warning in the last few hours. If for two or three miles along dangerous places, a locomotive engineer has been blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, it is not so important that at any particular crossing he sound a particular alarm. If for twenty, or forty, or sixty years, have been ringing out the uncertainty of human life and the greatness of the next world, we have no right to look for especial reiterations of all this in our last hours. If we will not take the forty years of warning, will we take the three hours?

If we are going on a long voyage, we do not postpone packing our trunk and getting together the appliances of travel to the last two or three hours. We begin days before, saying: "I will want this, and I must not forget that, and I must be particular about these. I must have my letters of credit. I must get permission of the life insurance companies. I must have letters of introduction."

Deliberate and particular and prolonged preparation for all voyages but one, and that the one which puts out on the ocean of ages eternal—for that we postpone to the last hour. God forgive us if we have been following that plan. Calculating upon no great, grand, and protracted opportunity at the terminus of life, may we now make ready. In the next half century, you will have no new data to control your action. With all the tremendous facts before you, act, act quickly, act decisively, act now!

"DON'T TAKE MY CROWN!"

AT a meeting in the London Home of Industry Rev. W. Haslam related the following incident: "A Christian man, who had formerly been an earnest worker for Christ, had become engrossed in worldly pursuits and forsaken his warm first love. One night he dreamed that he had been caught up to heaven, and that he was to see some of the marvellous things in that home of God. Among other things he was taken into a magnificent chamber—the crown-room of heaven. Here the angel who was his guide pointed out one after another of the beautiful crowns, and told him who they were intended for, mentioning the names of various friends of his own well known for their Christian labors. Every one seemed shining in splendor and beauty, but the man in his dream was impressed by one crown in the centre which the angel passed by. He ventured to ask, "Whose crown is this?" but the angel paid no heed to his inquiry.

As he passed on the longing grew more intense to know about that one crown, and again he ventured to ask, "Whose is that crown?" Still the angel paid no heed, but went on to speak of other crowns. The man's whole soul was filled by an eager desire to know about that one crown, and at last he stood still and implored the angel to tell him whose crown it was. A look of intense pity passed over the angel's face as he dropped the rod with which he had been pointing out the other crowns, and said, "It was thy crown; but it is thine no longer." In the agony of this revelation the man awoke from his sleep and sprang out of bed, fell on his knees, and cried out, "Lord, don't take my crown!" There and then he reviewed his past life, saw the danger of his cold and careless state, and, confessing all before God, received pardon afresh, and was brought back to the joy of communion with God. From that time he continued an earnest and faithful laborer for the Lord.

The Scene of the Second Advent.

"'As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people, from henceforth, even for ever,'" said Mr. Stanley to Evelyn and to me, as he rode between us.

"If we could only remember that," said Evelyn, "how happy it would make us!"

"Yes," said Mr. Stanley, "it would indeed; but is it not a comfort to know that He is round us, whether we remember it or not? The mountains do not remove, even though the clouds hide them from our sight."

"I shall never forget this ride," said Evelyn, after a pause.

"I am sure I shall never forget it!" said Mr. Stanley.

"But I thought—" said Evelyn.

"What did you think, Miss Trafford?"

"I thought that it would not seem quite the same to you as it does to us. I thought you would have become so accustomed to it that you would not enjoy it so much."

"Oh, I never feel that about the Mount of Olives," said Mr. Stanley; "other places in Jerusalem, I grant, have somewhat lost their sacredness in my eyes, but the Mount of Olives always seems holy ground. I think we can never forget that this was the last place our Lord's feet touched before He left us, and that it will be the very first place they will touch when He comes again; for 'His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east.'"

"And then," he added, after a pause, "I have enjoyed it specially to-day."

Claude and Alice left Jerusalem the next morning, to continue their journey through Samaria and Galilee; and we were not sorry to be alone when we visited the other deeply interesting places in and near Jerusalem. Sight-seeing in Palestine is, in this respect, perfectly different from sight-seeing in other places; unless there is some communion of heart between you and those who are with you, unless they love the Book and the Name which make every place around you so sacred, their remarks, and indeed the whole tone of their conversation, cannot fail to jar upon you, and to be somewhat trying and irksome to you.

After they were gone, we thoroughly enjoyed our daily excursions in the city and its neighborhood. Although Mr. Stanley was comparatively a stranger, still we had learned to know him so well in those few weeks that he seemed more like an old and tried friend! He was a wonderful help to us in our exploration of the city, for not only did he know Jerusalem well himself, but he had, during his long stay there, made many friends among the residents in the city, who obtained for us admittance into several places which are closed to ordinary travellers.

One of these, a German gentleman, was most kind in guiding us to several very interesting spots, and, among others, to Solomon's Quarry.

"Would you like to see Solomon's Quarry?" said Mr. Stanley to Sir William, one day.

"Solomon's Quarry!" repeated Sir William; "where may that be, pray?"

"It is underneath the city," said Mr. Stanley, "and is a most curious, interesting place. My friend, who will guide us through it, has been very active in its exploration, and he has made a splendid plan of the whole place; so that he knows every inch of the way."

"But is it really Solomon's Quarry?" said Sir William, incredulously.

"Probably so; for it is evident that stone has been taken out of it for some very great building, and then you remember what is told us of the building of Solomon's Temple: 'The House, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither: so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron heard in the house, while it was in building.'

"Now we have only to look at the stones which still remain of the wall which Solomon built round the temple platform, to see that the stones he used were so enormous that they could not have been brought from any great distance. In order to move them at all the labor must have been immense, and it has always been a mystery how such huge blocks could be hewn from any rock within a short distance of the building, so that they could be easily moved to it, and yet be so far away that no sound of axe or hammer should be heard in the temple itself."

"I see," said Sir William; "and the discovery of this quarry explains the mystery, for the stones could be hewn and finished underground, and then brought to the surface, and put at once in their proper positions. How very interesting!"

"But we have a still stronger reason," said Mr. Stanley, "for feeling sure that this is Solomon's Quarry, for there is no other place in the whole country round which shows signs of having been used as a quarry from which stone could have been taken for any large building; and the stone in these underground quarries is, moreover, the very same kind of stone as we find in the temple buildings."

"How very, very interesting!" said Sir William. "When can we go there?"

"I have arranged with my friend to meet us at the Damascus Gate to-morrow morning, if that will suit you," he added, turning to Evelyn.

We had no engagement for the next day, so it was settled that Mr. Stanley should call for us at eleven o'clock.

But when the morning came, poor Evelyn was not well enough to go. She had a slight attack of the ague fever, which is so common in Jerusalem, and the doctor advised her to keep quiet for a day or two, lest she should have it more severely. I wanted to stay with her, but she would not hear of it, and insisted on my leaving her in Clemence's care.

"If you don't go, May," she said, "I shall never hear anything about it. Papa never can describe places; now don't be unkind and disobedient, but put on your hat and get ready." So, rather against my will, I set forth with the others.

The gentleman who was our guide was most kind in explaining everything to us, and in giving us most varied and interesting information.

"How were these quarries discovered?" Sir William asked.

"In a very curious way," he said. "Not many years ago there was a lad shooting rock-pigeons outside the northern wall. He had a dog with him, and the dog suddenly disappeared. He had seen it last going behind an olive tree which grew at the bottom of the rock on which you see the wall is built. He went to look for the dog, and found on the face of the rock quite a small hole, so small that he could not get through it himself, though he heard his dog barking inside. So he came back into the city for help, and then the hole was made bigger, and they discovered this place."

"How very curious!" said Sir William.

"Here we are," said Mr. Stanley, "here is the hole; now, Miss Lindsay, are you ready to leave the sunshine behind?"

We had brought candles with us, and we lighted them and began slowly to descend, crouching for some distance almost on our hands and knees, for there was not room to stand upright. But after we had gone thus for a few yards, we found ourselves in a large rock-hewn cave, as spacious as an immense church, and from this point passage after passage went in different directions.

Our guide led the way and we followed; hall after hall, passage after passage, we explored; we went for nearly a mile underneath the streets of Jerusalem.

"Can you picture the scene 3000 years ago," said Mr. Stanley to me, "when the place was full of Solomon's workmen? Look! here are the marks of their tools in the stone, as fresh as ever. And do you see this?" he said, as he pointed to a little niche in the wall; "this is where the workman put his lamp while he was at work; you see even the black smoke which the flame left on the stone above is still here."

"How very wonderful!" I said; "oh, Mr. Stanley, it is an interesting place!"

"Yes," he said, smiling, "I knew you would like it, that is why I wanted so much to come here; it is one of my favorite places, and I wanted you to see it. It is a great comfort to me, oftentimes, this deserted quarry."

"How can it be a comfort to you?" I asked.

"It is such a wonderful picture," he said.

"A picture of what?"

"Is not there a temple being built now?" he said gently—"a far grander and more beautiful one than Solomon's—the temple in the heavenly Jerusalem; you see now?"

"Yes," I answered, "I think I do; but please tell me; I like to hear your thoughts about it, and why it comforts you."

"Don't you think the dark, dismal quarry is like this world; it is not a very bright place, is it? And you and I both know what trouble is."

"How did you know that I did, Mr. Stanley?"

"I knew it by your face; I can read faces very well," he said, smiling; "but though we are both in the dark quarry now, we shall not always have to stay here—for God, the Master Builder, has hewn us from the rock, cut us away from old surroundings, and from the old nature. We are no longer a part of the old rock, but by God's grace have been taken out of it; do you see?"

"You mean when we were converted?"

"Yes, and it was a hard wrench at the time, was it not? But we can be thankful for the work of the crowbar now."

"But we are still in the quarry," I said.

"Yes, and why? Because the work is not done, we are not yet fit for the Temple—a rough stone would be a disfigurement to God's beautiful building—each stone must be cut and chipped and faced and squared after it is hewn out of the rock. Our bad tempers and habits and unholy thoughts must all, by degrees, be done away with. It is a work of time and patience; and it is not always pleasant to feel the pick and the chisel at work on us, but it is such a comfort to know in whose hand the tool is, and that He can make no mistakes."

"What are the tools?" I asked.

"Don't you think there are different tools for different kinds of work?" he said. "Look how many tools have been used here. There is the mark of a heavy crowbar, which has severed the block from the side of the rock. And look here at this stone which has been left on the ground; you can see the mark of the pick with which the block was brought a little into shape. And here you can see the marks of the finer tools, the chisels, which were used to finish the stones."

"And God's tools?" I said.

"Are just as varied, are they not? A great trouble comes—a heavy blow like the great crowbar, and separates us from the world. But, after that, day by day, and hour by hour, God must work upon us with His finer tools—small vexations, little crosses, little losses, home troubles; all these, I think, are God's tools, making us ready for a place in the Temple. Don't you think it is a wonderful comfort to look upon worries and cares as God's tools?"

"Yes," I said, "that is a nice thought."

"And soon," said Mr. Stanley, "the work will be finished, and then we shall leave the dark quarry behind forever, and be carried to our place in the sunshine and light of the glorious Temple above. So, you see, I was not wrong in saying that this deserted quarry was a comforting place; you will think of it sometimes, will you not?"

"Indeed I shall," I said.

"And next time a trouble comes which you cannot understand, and which seems so very hard to bear, just say to yourself, 'It is God's chisel at work upon me.'"

I had much to tell Evelyn when I came back to the hotel, and much, very much, to treasure up in my own heart for use in days to come.

Mr. Stanley got for me a piece of stone from the walls of the quarry, with the marks of the chisel upon it, and I put it carefully away, with my spray of olive-leaves.

The next morning Evelyn was much better. The fever had passed away, but she felt tired and exhausted, so she decided to keep quietly in her room until lunch time, as she was very anxious to join us in an expedition which Mr. Stanley had planned for that evening.

We were to visit an old tomb, which had just been discovered on the road to Bethlehem, and in which Mr. Stanley's German friend, Mr. Schwarz, took a great interest. Mr. Schwarz would not be able to guide us there himself, as he was going away from Jerusalem for some weeks on business; but he very kindly promised that his daughter would show us the way to the tomb, as Mr. Stanley had never been there before.

Evelyn was most anxious to go with us, so we arranged to start when the day began to grow cooler, for Mr. Schwarz said that, as it was not a long ride, we could easily be back before sunset.

I was up very early that morning, and leaving Evelyn in bed I went down-stairs to write an account of our visit to Solomon's Quarry in a letter to my sister Maggie. Her aunts took great interest in hearing of all the places I was visiting, although they still predicted that I should not come back alive.

THE BOYHOOD OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for February 6th, Luke 2: 39-52. Golden Text, ver. 40. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT is written of the childhood of the Lord Jesus just the same as of that of John the Baptist, "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit;" but there was this addition, "the grace of God was upon Him." Of most children it has been said, "And the child grew," but how often the waxing strong has been in the flesh, and not in the spirit! Strong in muscular development, strong in self-will, strong in pride of heart, but not "strong in spirit." God warns us against glorying in any other strength: "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me, that I am the Lord, which exercise loving kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth" (Jer. 9: 23, 24).

We know that it is a law of development in all living things that growth is in proportion to exercise. Let us beware how we develop that in our children which by and by we shall have no power to suppress. How often is a child brought forward to sing or to recite before strangers something which may attract attention to him, and the self-love and the thirst for admiration are developed which may be a bane to him for years after! How often is emulation and an inordinate estimate of themselves developed among children in their earliest years by parents who contrast them with other children to the disparagement of the latter! "My Charlie would never do as that naughty boy does," says an unthinking mother, and Charlie treasures in his mind that he is essentially better than the other boy, takes care always to appear so, and thus self-righteousness and untruth of character are developed in him. If the mother had said, "Charlie, you and I have hearts which are just as bad as that poor boy's; let us ask God to change his heart, and to keep us from the same sin," then humility and kindliness of heart would have been fostered.

The Lord Jesus was, as a child, "strong in spirit." How this was manifest, or whether it was apparent to people in general, is not revealed to us. He was "filled with wisdom," and yet we hear nothing in His childhood of the outcome of His wisdom until He was twelve years old. "The grace (or anointing) of God was upon Him." Let us never forget that our blessed Lord emptied Himself so fully that, as man, He was dependent on the grace of God as we are. Always sinless, He needed not to be reconciled to His Father, needed not the saving grace which He, the eternal Son, has obtained for us, yet He made Himself as man in all His life dependent upon the grace of God. "In all things it behooved Him to be made like unto His brethren" (Heb. 2: 17). There are those who think that it was easy for the Lord Jesus to obey, and easy for Him to conquer temptation because He was God. But though He was God, and is God, in the days of His flesh He suspended the exercise of His divine power in the combat which men find so hard, and He received grace for it by the anointing of the Holy Ghost, as we do. This was in the exquisite delicacy of His love, and this is it which makes it just for Him to command us, "Follow Me."

And it was just in His unknown, hidden life in Nazareth, where only Mary and Joseph knew of His divine origin, in the learning of lessons, and in the obedience which becomes a child, that "the grace of God was upon Him." Thus we may believe that He was anointed of the Holy Ghost for every tiny service, for every renunciation of His own will which fell to His lot in the home, in the school. Was He beloved by other children? We are not told distinctly, only that He increased "in favor with God and man." Probably it was so, but feared as well as loved, and looked upon with a sort of awe, a consciousness of His being other than they were.

"Now His parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the Passover." This was in obedience to the command of God, "Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which He shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles" (Deut. 16: 16). "And when He was twelve years old (the age when Jewish children attain their majority), they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast." We do not hear whether this was His first visit to Jerusalem after His presentation to the Lord, when Simeon and Anna recognized Him as God's Christ. "And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem." To Him there was an attraction in the city which David called "the city of our God, the mountain of His holiness . . . the city of the great King" (Ps. 48: 1, 2).

Joseph and His mother did not at first discover the absence of the Lord Jesus from their company. Oh, how sadly often is it the case among God's children that when for a time they have journeyed with Him, known His presence at the table, by the way, in the conversations, and still more in the silence, yet when He withdraws, His absence is not discovered! A moment's independence of Him causes Him to withdraw; He never forces His presence. If we think we can do our shopping, conduct our office, or our domestic affairs independently of Him, He does not interfere with us or reproach us, but He withdraws, until a moment of impatience, hurry, unrest, care, pride, or self-seeking makes us look round and say to ourselves, "Where is Jesus?" and then, to our deep shame, we find that some time has passed by since we saw or heard Him. Perhaps our last intercourse with Him was at family prayer, and He "tarried behind," because He was not invited to come with us farther, and we find with sad regret that two or three hours, full of golden opportunities to live Christ in the little things of life, have been forever lost.

It takes longer to find Jesus than to lose Him. The way must be retraced. Joseph and Mary sought for Jesus among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. They might have known Him better than to think that the family gossip which had probably so absorbed them, could have an attraction for Jesus. They supposed Him to have been in the company, but suppositions do not help any one in finding Jesus; they must come to facts. Where did they last see Him? They remembered that it was in the Temple; then Jesus was "in the company," but not since. Oh, how distracted must they have been with other things and persons, that His absence was not sooner discovered! "And when they found Him not, they turned back agan to Jerusalem seeking Him." Did Mary's heart smite her that the holy charge which had been committed to her was neglected?

"It came to pass, that after three days they found Him in the Temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions. And all that heard Him were astonished at His understanding and answers." Here, then, was Jesus where they had left Him. Where had He slept? who had given Him food? God does not satisfy our curiosity about these things. Whether the Son of Man learned at this time to have no place "where to lay His head" (Luke 9: 58), whether he put at this time to the proof that which He afterward declared and proved, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God (Matt. 4: 4), we are not told. Suffice it that the child who was "strong in spirit" found Himself in His element in the truth of the living God, and in the midst of the theologians of Jerusalem He sat in animated discussion. Yet He took the child's place, hearing and asking questions, more the hearer than the speaker; yet when in His turn questions were put to Him, "all that heard Him were astonished at His understanding and answers." He might have said with the Psalmist, "I have more understanding than all my teachers, for thy testimonies are my meditation. I understand more than the ancients; because I keep thy precepts" (Ps. 119: 99, 100), but He did not on that account assume any superiority. He was passing through childhood as God manifest in the flesh, and the first lesson of a child is subjection.

"And when they saw Him, they were amazed; and His mother said unto Him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. And He said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "How is it that ye sought me?" as though to say, "Why seek me where it is so unlikely I should be found?" There is a tone of sadness, almost disappointment, about the words, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "They understood not the saying which He spake unto them."

Do we understand it? Jesus had no business of His own in life; His Father's business was His occupation. And we also are privileged to have no business of our own. Had Jesus sought His own, had He looked out for amusement, pleasure, recreation, He would have been found "in the company;" but He was the Son of God and the Son of man, existing not for Himself, but for His Father and for mankind. In the Temple services He found His Father's business, and He could not lightly turn from them to the unnecessary conversation of friends and cousins, who, meeting at this time from many places, were full of all their own small concerns. His Father's business was perhaps to waken up the theologians of the day to a real grasp of the subjects which they treated, and it may be the ingenious questions and answers of the child Jesus sowed in many hearts a sleepless inquiry, "Are all these things realities to me?"

Beloved reader, as God sent His Son into the world, so has our dear Lord sent you and me into the world (John 17: 18), to do not our own, but our Father's business. It is our privilege and our high vocation to do our Father's business from morning till night, and from night till morning, at home, abroad, in our inmost souls, and in our outer life, in thought, word, and deed, ever His and never ours. When we are doubtful about anything which lies before us, it is enough to ask, "Is it my Father's business?" and if not, then it is no business of mine. Whatever is God's business we may do by God's authority and in God's power, and much of the futility of that which we do is occasioned by its being our doing and not His.

But His Father's business for Jesus as a child consisted, for the most part, in His subjection to His parents. "He went down with them and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them." This teaches us the necessity of subjection. Thirty years of His life were lived by the Lord Jesus in retirement and subjection, and only three and a half in teaching. Instead of rebelling against the yoke which in our family, church, or national life claims subjection from us, let us welcome every opportunity of yielding up our own wills; the more we know of Christ, the more precious do such opportunities appear. The mother of the Lord Jesus, although distracted, like her husband, in the company, yet felt a power in the words of Jesus which Joseph does not appear to have noticed. Mary "kept all these sayings in her heart." Oh, that they may dwell in our hearts too!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Fall of Lima, the Capital of Peru, is announced in a telegram from Buenos Ayres. The Chileans were victorious in a severe engagement at Chorillos, near Lima, in which the Peruvians lost 7000 killed and 2000 prisoners. A second battle took place at Miraflores, in which the Peruvian forces were again defeated, and after that no attempt seems to have been made to defend the capital, which was occupied by the Chilean army on January 17th. The President of Peru sought safety in flight, and the diplomatic corps have interceded with the victors on his behalf. The war, which has continued nearly two years, is practically closed by the fall of the city, and it only remains to settle the terms of peace, which, it is feared, will press heavily on Peru and Bolivia. Tarapaca will probably be held by Chili, and a pecuniary penalty exacted.

After a Protracted Debate in Which the Irish members of the British Parliament employed all the resources at their command to obstruct business, the address in reply to the Queen's speech has been voted. The House of Commons can now proceed to transact the business of the session. It is reported that the Government have decided to introduce a rule of debate by which obstruction may be prevented whenever two thirds of the members present concur in a resolution to that effect. Remedial measures, as well as the Coercive Bill, have been postponed by the tactics of the Irish party, assisted by a few Radical members. In the course of the debate the Marquis of Hartington, Secretary for India, warned the obstructionists that the Ministry would be unable to calm the feelings of irritation which have arisen in the House and in the country.

A prominent English journalist writes: "The Government are fully aware of existing dangerous conspiracies among Irishmen in several large towns of England. In the House of Commons recently Right Hon. Hugh C. Childers, Secretary of War, replying to a question in regard to the recent explosion at Salford, said the Government were well aware of the circumstances in which they were placed, and were taking all due precautions."

The Attack of the Boers on the British forces in South Africa was brought under the consideration of the Parliament on January 21st by one of the Liberal members, who moved a resolution to the effect that the annexation of the Transvaal was impolitic and unjustifiable. Mr. Gladstone said it was the resolute intention of the Government to establish the British authority in the Transvaal in the first instance. Another member of the Government said the administration desired to give the people of the Transvaal, to the greatest possible extent, the management of their own affairs as soon as they acknowledged the Queen's Government. At a meeting held near Antwerp it was resolved to circulate for signature an address to Queen Victoria praying that her Majesty will exercise her prerogative for the purpose of averting bloodshed in the Transvaal.

The Severest Snow-Storm Experienced for many years visited England on January 18th, accompanied by a fierce easterly gale. Reports from all parts of the country testify to the damage of property, wrecked shipping, loss of fishing smacks and lives, and blocked locomotion. A cable report says: "The gale caused an immense flood in the Thames. The south of London was flooded. The Woolwich pier, erected recently at the cost of some thousands of pounds, was washed away. Twelve inches of snow stopped all traffic in the London streets. Trains and omnibuses ceased running. Business was practically suspended. Londoners do not remember such a total stoppage of busy life. The underground railroad was the only means of communication open. Travellers arriving had to stay at the nearest hotels.

War Between Turkey and Greece has not yet been declared, but the London correspondent of the New York World cables that the British ministry regard its ultimate outbreak as inevitable, and fear that it will sooner or later involve all Europe. The Porte, it is announced, has communicated to the ambassadors a fresh note regretting the warlike preparations of Greece, which are bringing trouble and uncertainty upon the peace of Europe. In order to terminate such a state of affairs, which the Porte says is disastrous to both Turkey and Greece, the Powers are invited to send instructions to their ambassadors at Constantinople for a European conference. The Porte hopes a pacific solution will thus be obtained. The Greek Government meanwhile is negotiating for the purchase of swift, unarmored cruisers. It is generally believed that should the war break out, it will issue in the complete collapse of the Turkish Empire by the intervention of other nations.

The Nihilists are Still Plotting Against the Russian Government. A dispatch from St. Petersburg reports that two men and two women have been arrested at Kieff on suspicion of belonging to a secret society. The police discovered at their house a programme of an extreme terrorist faction of Nihilists, which recommends murder and incendiarism. A quantity of revolvers, daggers, axes, machinery for the manufacture of forged passports, a portion of a secret printing press, and a large number of revolutionary proclamations were also found. Copies of a proclamation relating to the intended murder of a military official in Kieff were also found. An English clock-maker recently sent information to the Russian minister in London that he had been requested to construct dynamite clocks for use against the Imperial family of Russia.

There are Signs that the Pope's Opposition to the Italian Government is subsiding. When the king was starting on his recent tour the Pope gave instructions to all bishops in Sicily and the Neapolitan provinces to compliment his Majesty as their legitimate sovereign as he passed through their districts. The king and his father both displayed remarkable forbearance toward the Pope, in spite of papal curses and denunciations, and it is possible that Leo has at length been mollified by the soft answers which proverbially turn away wrath.

The Progress of Missions in India is Described by the missionaries as encouraging. At the annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions in Boston the Rev. Charles Harding, of the Mahratta Mission, who went to India in 1856, said that he had witnessed a remarkable change since that time. The beginnings, he said, are difficult and slow, the obstacles are great; yet the truth is making its way in India. The missionary there has often had a hard time, but he has never been discouraged. Twelve years ago in one region in India the name of Christ had never been heard. But in the last six or eight years many conversions have followed the preaching of the Gospel.

The Remarkable Revival of Interest in the Holy Land, which prophetic expositors recognize as one of the signs of the near approach of the end of this dispensation, is seen in a new project entertained by the Palestine Exploration Committee. Those gentlemen have decided upon undertaking a survey of the country east of the Jordan. The associations of the country are extremely interesting. It contains the places connected with the stories of Balaam and Balak, Gideon, Jephthah, the wars of Moab, the siege of Rabbath Ammon, and many other spots. Travellers inform us that they have seen there many ancient ruins in a remarkable state of preservation, and it has not been subjected to the spoliation carried on through many centuries in and about Jerusalem.

Dr. Barnardo, the Friend of the Destitute boys of London, gave a supper on January 5th to upward of 1100 juvenile waifs and strays gathered out of low lodging-houses, the casual wards, the market-places, the waterside, and in other haunts of the homeless poor. After these little ragged guests were seated, and grace had been sung, there remained outside some 2000 children, equally ragged and woebegone, surging up to the entrance-door, and taxing to the utmost the united resistance of the several policemen. After tea Dr. Barnardo, in the course of his address to the children, said, "I wish you all a happy New Year." "The same to you, sir," responded they in a loud chorus of many keys of voice. He then asked the question, "How many of you have been locked up? All who have, rise." Half the audience rose, all laughing, some outright. "Well," added the doctor good-humoredly, "there is another question I won't ask now, How many of you deserve to be locked up?" Amid the laughter that ensued was heard the voice of one smart urchin exclaiming, "All the lot of us, sir." Dr. Barnardo then told them some kind friends had subscribed money to give them a treat, but they were invited there for the further reason of showing them that somebody cared for them, and that He who most cared for them was their Saviour.

Temperance in the British Army is Making rapid progress, and the support given to the movement by the leaders most popular in the army is a source of encouragement to the men. The National Temperance League held a meeting in London on January 4th to consider the best means of promoting temperance in both army and navy. The Lord Mayor presided, and he was accompanied by a grand array of generals and admirals. It was stated that there are 20,000 teetotal members in the army, being one sixth of the entire force. Of these, about 8000 belong to regiments stationed in India, where the proportion of abstainers is higher than at home. Of the 60,000 men in the navy, upward of 7000 are registered abstainers, and the officers' branch consists of 158 members. Much attention has been given to the 4000 boys on board the Queen's training ships, of whom more than one half are abstainers.

An Edinburgh Clergyman's Son Rescued Two boys from death recently. The young man, who is the son of the Rev. C. E. Bowden, incumbent of St. Columba's, while skating on the frozen canal saw two boys fall through the ice. Mr. Bowden at once divested himself of his hat, gloves, and overcoat, skated up to the hole, wrenched off his skates, and plunged in. He succeeded in seizing both the boys—one of whom was sinking for the third time—and, by a desperate effort, managed to throw them on the ice and then scramble up himself. He was in the water six or eight minutes, but suffered no ill effects from his act of daring except a severe cold. The parents of the rescued boys did not even thank him. The sight of human life in danger often impels brave men to venture even their own lives in an effort to save those in danger. If we fully realized the horror of eternal death we should make still greater efforts to rescue perishing souls.

The Disclosure of a Secret in the Home of an English Jew was dreaded by husband and wife. It appears that the Jew, unknown to his wife, had during twelve months been visiting a Christian missionary for instruction; and the wife, unknown to her husband, was at the same time reading the New Testament given her by a district visitor. Each was afraid of being discovered by the other. Quite recently, however, the truth came out, and instead of betrayal there was mutual rejoicing. Both husband and wife have made a confession of Christ. Had either husband or wife possessed the moral courage true faith in Jesus gives, an earlier disclosure would have been made, and both would have been spared much misery.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE.

His Philanthropic and Christian Work—Related to the Poet Cowper—Connection with Lord Palmerston—Official Positions—The Education Bill—The Conference of 1880.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE is one of the most prominent Evangelical Christian noblemen in Great Britain. Like the Earl of Shaftesbury, he devotes his chief attention to works of Christian usefulness and to enterprises which have for their object the spiritual and temporal benefit of society. He is a cousin of the celebrated poet, William Cowper, after whom he was named. He is the second son of the late Earl Cowper, who married the eldest daughter of the first Viscount Melbourne. Lady Cowper, after the death of her husband, was married to the eminent British statesman, Viscount Palmerston, who, having no children of his own, adopted his wife's second son, and made him his sole heir on condition that he assumed Lord Palmerston's family name of Temple in addition to that of Cowper. Hence, in November, 1872, Queen Victoria's license was obtained, constituting the Hon. William Cowper William Cowper-Temple; and then, in 1880, Her Majesty bestowed upon him the title of Lord Mount-Temple.

Lord Mount-Temple was born in 1811. At the age of sixteen he entered the army and served five years. In 1835 he entered the House of Commons as Member for Hertford, and began his official life as private secretary to his uncle, Viscount Melbourne. He formed part of the Queen's household on her accession, and remained as one of her gentlemen-in-waiting for several years.

He has filled successively the offices of Lord of the Admiralty, President of the Board of Health, and Vice-President of the Board of Trade. He was the first of the Vice-Presidents of the Education Department; and subsequently was the Commissioner of Public Works. His name will always be memorable as having commenced the cultivation of flowers in Hyde Park and all the parks in London. He transformed them from mere expanses of unadorned grass into scenes of beauty and delight for all classes. His exertions conferred upon the poorest Londoners the enjoyment of flower-gardens equal to those in the royal gardens; and among other metropolitan improvements he planned and put into execution the Thames Embankment.

In his dealings with national education he was a constant supporter of religious teaching, both in and out of office. When the British Government took up the subject of education, and Mr. Forster, the present Secretary for Irish Affairs, introduced his measure into Parliament, Mr. Cowper-Temple took a prominent part in the debates, and urged the necessity for including religious teaching in the list of subjects covered by elementary education. The clause of the bill which aroused the chief opposition was known as the Cowper-Temple clause, because he proposed it and supported it with all his energies. It enacted that the Bible should be read in the common schools, and it was mainly by his exertions that it was eventually incorporated in the statute.

The Christian Conference which in the fall of last year excited so deep an interest throughout the British Isles was held at Lord Mount-Temple's seat of Broadlands near Southampton, an estate he inherited from his stepfather, Lord Palmerston. The conference was an effort in a direction Lord Mount-Temple has very much at heart, that of promoting union among earnest Christians of different denominations. He succeeded in gathering on the platform at Southampton men pre-eminent in force and piety, who sincerely coalesced as to the teaching of the Word of God, and the power of the Holy Spirit in deepening the spiritual life, but who differ widely about ritual and church government. It is rumored that the marked success of this conference may lead to the renewal of it this year.

On being created a peer under the title of Lord Mount-Temple last year, he vacated his seat in the House of Commons for South Hampshire, and took his seat in the House of Lords. In politics he is a moderate Liberal or Whig. We should not omit to add that Lady Mount-Temple heartily cooperates with Lord Mount-Temple in his social, philanthropic, and religious undertakings, and with highly cultivated intellectual powers and genial and sympathetic demeanor in every respect sustains the dignity of her position in society.

LORD PALMERSTON.

His Birth and Education—Harrow School and Edinburgh University—Enters Parliament in 1807—Memorable Times—Don Pacifico—Trouble in the Palace—Downfall and Revenge—His Premiership—His Death in 1865.

No English statesman of modern days has left on European affairs a mark so broad and deep as was impressed by Henry John, Viscount Palmerston. All that Bismarck represents in Germany to the eyes of other nations Palmerston represented in his day in England. Foreign statesmen, while Palmerston held the seals of office, would say, "What will Lord Palmerston do about this?" not "What will England do?" Fifty years of official life, spent chiefly in the Foreign Office, gave him a knowledge of European affairs such as no other English statesman possessed; and he, being of a strong and vigorous character, was inclined to make an energetic use of his knowledge and the power of his country. To him the doctrines of the statesmen known as the "Manchester school" were abhorrent. He was accustomed to say of them that "they would not care if the country were occupied by a foreign potentate, providing that potentate allowed them to keep their mills running."

It is certain that the Manchester school have persistently advocated the policy of England minding her own business, and devoting her attention to the development of commerce, and the resources of the country, and a careful avoidance of foreign disputes and meddling in the quarrels of other nations. England had been accustomed to interfere rather freely in European affairs. She had fought in the Peninsula against Napoleon, and had thrust herself into the front of the European struggle at other times, expending blood and treasure and getting nothing in return but glory and often the ingratitude of the people whose battle she had fought. Against this policy entered their protest, insisting that the nations of Europe should be allowed to settle their affairs in their own way, and that if a small and weak nation suffered injustice, or was in danger of annexation, it must look elsewhere for aid, for England had had enough of glory and battling for the benefit of others.

Lord Palmerston would hold office under no such principles. To him the policy of the Manchester school appeared selfish and narrow-minded, and he more than once endangered the peace of Europe by the vigor and energy with which he shouldered his way into disputes in which English honor and English interests were not concerned. He loved his country with a love which overmastered every element of his nature, and even his sense of right and justice suffered where they were in conflict with his notion of what would be to the advantage of England.

He was never willing to admit that England was in the wrong and had been justly rebuked. The rebuke in his eyes was an insult which must be promptly revenged, and the few words which might elicit explanation and a pacific settlement Palmerston was ever unwilling to say. Always ready to tell any nation what it ought to do, and how it ought to act, he appeared to consider the English Government and policy perfect, and to regard the points in which other governments differed from the English model as evidences of their stupidity and ignorance. It was this conviction that made Palmerston's intervention oftentimes offensive to European statesmen, and the tone of superiority with which he lectured the ambassadors of other nations, irritating and humiliating. As God in His watchful care balances and compensates in the forces of nature, so He, in His Providence, raised up men of the Manchester school, men of piety and eloquence, who were able to exercise a restraining influence on a man who, though honest, frank, and patriotic, was liable to err through the very nobility and patriotic devotion of his nature.

ANCESTRY.

Lord Palmerston was born October 20th, 178[illegible]. He was the son of the second Viscount Palmerston, who was the grandson of Henry Templ[illegible] whom King George I. ennobled under the title Baron Temple and Viscount Palmerston. Th[illegible] family was an ancient one of Saxon origin, and i[illegible] representatives at the time of the Conquest ha[illegible] fought in the Saxon army against William th[illegible] Conqueror. They had subsequently settled in Ir[illegible] land, and the title King George gave to its chief [illegible] his day was an Irish title, which did not entitle i[illegible] holder to a seat in the British House of Lord[illegible] Among Lord Palmerston's ancestors was th[illegible] great and good Sir William Temple, the friend [illegible] Swift and the trusted and honored councillor of th[illegible] grand Protestant King who rescued England fro[illegible] one of her most deadly perils, William III.

The early education of the future statesman wa[illegible] conducted by his father, a man of artistic taste[illegible] and brilliant literary abilities. When he wa[illegible] eleven years of age he was fit to enter and Harrow was the one selected for him. Th[illegible] following extract of a letter from one of Henr[illegible] Temple's contemporaries shows that the brav[illegible] and noble nature manifested throughout a lon[illegible] career was traceable from early life. It was writ[illegible] ten by Admiral Sir Augustus Clifford, in Septem[illegible] ber, 1870. "When I went to Harrow, in 1797 the late Lord Palmerston was reckoned the best tempered and most plucky boy in the school, a[illegible] well as a young man of great promise. I can re[illegible] member well Temple fighting 'behind school' [illegible] great boy called Salisbury, twice his size, and h[illegible] would not give in, but was brought home wit[illegible] black eyes and a bloody nose.

ENTERS EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY.

The young Harrovian did not, on quitting, at th[illegible] age of sixteen, the school so celebrated for produc[illegible] ing statesmen, move on directly to an English uni[illegible] versity. It was the custom of the time for youn[illegible] men to take the University of Edinburgh as an in[illegible] termediate preparation for that of Cambridge o[illegible] Oxford; for Scotland had acquired a reputatio[illegible] which was unprecedented.

The lectures that principally attracted attentio[illegible] at Edinburgh University when Henry Temple en[illegible] tered it in 1800 were Dugald Stewart's on Politica[illegible] Economy and Moral Philosophy; and to these studies, than which none are better calculated to b[illegible] the foundation of a statesman's education, it would seem that the new alumnus especially applied himself. The notes which he made form indeed the principal part of the text which is now given as "Dugald Stewart's Lectures on Economical Science," for it appears that the lectures in question were extempore, and when Sir W. Hamilton undertook to publish them, he was obliged to consult the memoranda of the pupils by whom they had been attended, and he found none so complete as those taken originally in short-hand and subsequently copied out by Henry Temple, who, speaking of this time, says: "I lived with Dugald Stewart, and attended his lectures at the University. In these three years I laid the foundation of whatever useful knowledge and habits of mind I possess."

INHERITS HIS FATHER'S TITLE.

His father died in 1802, and the year following the student from Edinburgh went to St. John's, Cambridge, where he is said to have worked with more than the average diligence of a young nobleman.

His abilities were recognized and appreciated at Cambridge, for he was selected by the Tory members of the University to succeed the great William Pitt as Member of Parliament; but at that time the Whig voters were in the majority, and Lord Palmerston was defeated. In 1807, however, Lord Palmerston obtained a seat in the House of Commons as member for Newport, and in 1811 he again contested for the honor of representing the University of Cambridge in Parliament, and this time with success. Thenceforth he sat for Cambridge for twenty years.

A MEMORABLE TWENTY YEARS.

In those twenty years a series of events of unprecedented magnitude occurred, which had a mighty influence both on England and Europe.

They included the terrible struggle with France and the culminating conflict in which the power of Napoleon was finally shattered at Waterloo. Although comparatively a young man, Lord Palmerston's powers of work and his abilities were appreciated by the ministers of the day, and for nineteen years he held in successive administrations the responsible post of Secretary at War.

In 1828 Lord Palmerston disagreed with the Duke of Wellington, who was then Prime Minister, and retired from office. There is no doubt that Lord Palmerston was right in the question at issue between the two statesmen, and the country indorsed his view, for at the next election the Duke of Wellington's supporters were defeated in the constituencies. Earl Grey succeeded the Duke of Wellington in 1830, and he offered the post of Foreign Secretary to Lord Palmerston, who accepted it as a congenial position. At that time Europe was convulsed with warlike projects, and an eminent authority said, when the Government was formed, that "even if Lord Grey could put an angel from heaven in office as Foreign Secretary, he could not maintain peace for three months." Lord Palmerston falsified the prediction. Setting at defiance national traditions, he acted in concert with France, and the impending conflagration was averted.

The seat in Parliament for Cambridge had been lost during this period, owing to Lord Palmerston's growing affinities with Whig principles, and finally, when he could no longer, even by his most active partisans, be considered a Tory, he severed his connection with the University, and represented in succession Bletchingley, South Hampshire, and Tiverton, the last a small borough which until his death had the honor of being represented by the most popular and distinguished British statesman of the day. From 1830 to 1841 Lord Palmerston held the office of Foreign Secretary, and during that period the independence of Belgium, the constitutional settlement of Spain and Portugal, and other burning questions, were peaceably arranged, mainly by his exertions.

A question of internal policy arose in 1841 which agitated Great Britain throughout all its borders. It was that of Free Trade in Corn. Palmerston took an intelligent interest in home questions, but he never regarded them as so thoroughly his own as were foreign affairs; but when his colleagues resigned on this question, Lord Palmerston went out of office with them, and for five years sat in Parliament as a private member. When in 1846 the Whigs again took office, Lord Palmerston once more became Foreign Secretary. He had not been in office many months before a trouble arose which attained international dimensions, and which is known in history as

THE DON PACIFICO CASE.

This case is worth dwelling upon, not so much on account of its intrinsic importance as because it illustrates the features of Lord Palmerston's character, which we have already described.

Don Pacifico was a Jew residing in the Grecian capital, but a native of Gibraltar, and therefore an English citizen. His house in Athens was ravaged and his goods burned by a Greek mob excited by religious fanaticism. Don Pacifico appealed to the English Government, and Lord Palmerston immediately made a demand on the Greek Government for compensation. In doing so he took Don Pacifico's absurdly exaggerated estimate of his losses, in which every article set down was valued at fabulous prices, such as $150 for a pair of sheets, $50 for a pillow-case, etc. There were other outstanding claims against Greece—for the arrest of a British sailor, and for land of which another British subject had been despoiled—and Palmerston made a total of the whole, and sent a peremptory demand to Greece for settlement.

A delay then occurred; Greece was poor, and besides, desired to investigate the claims and reduce them to fair proportions; but Palmerston conceived the idea that the French and Russian ministers at the Greek court were inciting Greece to resist the British claims, and resolved to show Greece England would not be trifled with. He promptly sent a fleet to the Piræus and seized every ship in the harbor, including those of private merchants, as well as those belonging to the Greek Government. This high-handed proceeding excited general reprehension among foreign powers, and Russia made strong protestation against it. For a few days war loomed on the horizon, but eventually, through the friendly intervention of France, the affair was amicably adjusted.

There were many people in England who blamed Palmerston for risking war over the unjust claims of a Gibraltar Jew, and a motion was passed in the House of Lords condemning the proceedings. Lord Palmerston did not care for the disapproval of the Lords; he looked for his vindication to the House of Commons, and when the question arose there, he delivered the great speech of his life.

He was assailed by Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Cobden, and others. When Lord Palmerston arose to make his defence, after the attack made upon him by able and eloquent men on both sides the House, a scene occurred which has rarely been equalled within the walls of Parliament. He spoke for five hours without a single note, dealing not only with the Greek case, but with the whole policy of his adminstration of the Foreign Office. In earnest, vigorous tones he stated his principles, winning applause even from his foes, and when at last he said, that in all he had done he had been actuated by the resolve that the poorest claimant who bore the name of an English citizen should be protected by the whole strength of England against the oppression of a foreign government, the tide in the House set fully in his favor. He concluded by asking the verdict of the House to decide "whether as the Roman in days of old could hold himself free from indignity when he could say, 'I am a Roman citizen,' so also a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong." It was a marvellous effort of oratory, and the House of Commons triumphantly reversed the verdict of the Lords.

DIFFICULTIES IN THE PALACE.

It will be readily comprehended that although Lord Palmerston succeeded in gaining the love of the English people and the confidence of their representatives, his disposition and conduct would not render him popular at foreign courts. His unpopularity, too, was increased by the fact that in all disputes between sovereigns and peoples abroad, Lord Palmerston's sympathies were with the people, and those sympathies he took no pains to conceal. The frankness and vigor of his language on many occasions provoked the condemnation of his colleagues who, even if they shared Lord Palmerston's opinions, thought it imprudent and sometimes discourteous to express them so bluntly as he did. His course at length drew down an expostulation from Queen Victoria, who complained that she occasionally found herself committed to a policy to which she had never given her consent, and which sometimes she did not approve.

The Queen was guided by Prince Albert, who was in all things the exact opposite of Lord Palmerston. The Prince was cold, intellectual, phlegmatic, prone to consider conclusions carefully, and to reconsider and weigh them after they were made, and was slow at arriving at a decision. Lord Palmerston, confident of his knowledge of a subject, impulsive and prompt to act, was irritated by the delay occasioned by submitting to the Queen and Prince his dispatches before they were sent off. He considered that, the national policy being settled, the details of communication might be intrusted to him, and he found, moreover, that the alterations and modifications which emanated from Prince Albert were not in accord with his own views. Lord Palmerston thought the Prince, as a foreigner, an unfit person by instinct and association to control the foreign policy of England, and the Prince considered Lord Palmerston too hasty and uncourtier-like to have charge of the diplomatic affairs of the country.

Remonstrances in the Queen's writing, but clearly inspired by the Prince, were sent to the Prime Minister for communication to Lord Palmerston, and for a time the Foreign Minister showed more deference to the court. The time was short, for the Queen was offended by sympathy shown by Lord Palmerston to the followers of Kossuth, and before that matter was settled Lord Palmerst a conversation with the French ambassador pressed his gratification at the revival of the e pire under Napoleon III. The ambassador regarded the expression as an official utterance, while Lord Palmerston probably considered it a mere personal remark. The Queen wrote to Lord John Russell, who was then Premier, as soon as she heard of Lord Palmerston's act, expressing her disapproval, and the Premier dismissed him from office, if not at the suggestion of the Queen, certainly with her approval distinctly expressed in a letter from Prince Albert. This occurred in December, 1851.

The dismissal was a humiliation, and in the talk at the clubs it was said, "Lord Palmerston is smashed;" but it was not so, for early in the following year Lord Palmerston opposed his late colleagues on an important question and carried the majority of the House of Commons with him. When the issue was announced the Premier resigned, and Lord Palmerston wrote to a friend, "I have had my tit for tat with John Russell." A short interval followed in which the Conservatives administered affairs; then came a coalition cabinet, in which many able men were included in the administration, and in which Lord Palmerston held office as Secretary for Home Affairs. The outbreak of hostilities with Russia followed by blunders of a diplomatic and administrative character worked the downfall of the coalition ministry, and the country raised a cry in the hour of national peril for the minister it could trust to carry on the war with energy and vigor. Lord Palmerston was appointed Prime Minister in February, 1855, and under his administration the Russian war was brought to a successful termination.

In 1858 the opposition of Parliament was aroused against the bill for surrendering conspirators, which Palmerston thought due to the Government of France in consequence of a plot against the Emperor's life having been planned by Italians resident in England, and the Palmerston cabinet fell. Again the Conservatives were intrusted with power, and held office for upward of a year; but they were defeated on an important question, and having dissolved the Parliament, and being left again in a minority, they resigned. Another Palmerston administration was formed, and it endured until the 18th of October, 1865, when the veteran who had so long and so nobly served his country succumbed to illness and age, and expired within two days of completing his eighty-first year.

In a life so active and so full of important events as Lord Palmerston's was, much has, from lack of space, been left unmentioned. It would require volumes to adequately narrate the history of his life. His attitude on the Chinese question, his conduct in the case of Mason and Slidell, and many other striking incidents in his history are omitted. We have sought to convey an idea of Lord Palmerston's character and the prominent features of his life, and for further and fuller details must refer our readers to the pages of English history.

OUR FRONTISPIECE PICTURES OF SOUTHAMPTON.

BETWEEN the portraits of Lord Palmerston and Lord Mount-Temple, on our front page, is a picture of a monument, in Sicilian marble, of Dr. Isaac Watts, who was born at Southampton in the year 1674. His is a name honored for his sacred hymns wherever the English language is spoken. He was especially the friend of children and youth, for whose best welfare he labored well and wisely, without thought of fame or gain. He died in 1748, at the age of seventy-four.

At the lower left-hand corner of our frontispiece is a representation of a portion of the High Street, Southampton, with the Old Bar Gate in the distance. It is supposed that this structure was erected in the time of the Saxons or Normans.

At the lower right-hand corner is an engraving of what is termed The Platform, which is in close proximity to the Castle. Upon it are several guns, and among them a large and curious bronze cannon, presented to the town by Henry VIII., bearing his imperial crown and the arms of England and France quartered.

"THE SPECTACULAR."

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, January 30, 1881.

"They that use this world as not abusing it."—1 CORINTHIANS, 7:31.

The Fight Between Church and Theatre—The Battle Still in Progress—A New Institution—Not a Compromise—Characteristics of "the Spectacular"—Early Closing—Purified Dramas—Moral Performers—The Plan not Chimerical—The Capitalist Needed—Certain Success—The World waiting for it—Danger of Contamination—Amusement not to be Made a Business—A Lost Diamond and a Precipice—A Dead Mother's Voice—Your Parents Thinking of You.

THAT God has implanted a dramatic element in most of our natures, recognized and cultured it in the Scriptures, and that this element may be employed in positive religious work, I proved last Sabbath to the satisfaction, I hope, of all who heard or read me. This morning I want to show you that the dramatic element may lawfully be taken into our recreations.

The old fight between the church and the theatre still goes on. The guns of neither fort have been spiked, nor have the flags struck. The ministers on the one side, and the play-actors on the other seem all unhurt. Neither has gained the complete victory over the other, yet, according to what I read in all the religious newspapers of the day, about the falling off of the churches, and what I read in the secular newspapers of the large attendance and financial receipts of the theatres, the latter seem, so far, to have lost no ground. Into that contest of centuries I do not enter to-day, because I have something better to do and better to offer. I have to present which, I believe, will commend itself to all the good and respectable. It is not a compromise, but a most radical proposition.

All the men of church and theatre agree that the amusements of this country need reformation, that if you take all the places of entertainment of whatever name in any city, and place them side by side, you would find that the majority of them are depraving. That through the gates of many of these places a multitude of young men go out to make desperate and final plunge into dissoluteness. All thinking people, Christian and un-Christian, admit this. I could give you the names of many dramatists who, on the belief that the dramatic entertainments of the day are not what they ought to be, are toiling for the elevation of the theatre.

Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, many years ago, in a very brilliant but much criticized sermon, took the position that the theatre might be renovated and made auxiliary to the church. Many Christian people are of the same opinion. I do not agree with them. I have no idea that success is in that direction. What I have said heretofore on this subject, as far as I remember, is my sentiment now. But to-day I take a step in advance of my former theory. Christianity is going to take full possession of this world and control its maxims, its laws, its literature, its science, and its amusements. Shut out from the realm of Christianity anything, you give it up to sin and death.

If Christianity is mighty enough to manage everything but the amusements of the world, then it is a very defective Christianity. Is it capable of keeping account of the tears of the world, and incompetent to make record of its smiles? Is it good to follow the funeral but dumb at the world's play? Can it control all the other elements of our nature but the dramatic element? My idea of Christianity is that it can and will conquer everything. In the good time coming, which the world calls the golden age, and the poet the Elysian age, and the Christian the Millennium, we have positive announcement that the amusements of the world are to be under Christian sway. "Holiness shall be upon the bells of the horses," says one prophet. So, you see, it will control even the sleigh rides. "The city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof," says another prophet. So you see it is to control the hoop rolling and the kite flying and the ball playing. Now what we want is to hasten that time. How will it be done? By the church going over to the theatre? It will not go. By the theatre coming to the church? It will not come. What we want is in every city and town of the United States. Once announced and explained and illustrated, the Christian and philanthropic capitalist will come forward to establish it, and as last week one of our citizens gave $50,000 to the Historical Library of our city, there will be public-spirited men everywhere who will do this work for the dramatic element of our natures. We need a new institution to meet and recognize and develop and defend the dramatic element of our nature.

It needs to be distinct from everything that is or has been. In an age which has projected a telephone and an electric pen and the bicycle and the telegraph, surely we are not afraid of a new institution. It would be derided at the start, as all great movements are derided at the start, but it would revolutionize society for good. Wiser men than we are would baptize it with a name, only for the purposes of this sermon I will call it "The Spectacular." I would have its board of trustees made up of the most intelligent and most unimpeachable men and women of each community. One half of them I would have professed and most pronounced Christians, connected with the churches.

I would have this Reformed Amusement Association having in charge this new institution "the Spectacular," take possession of some hall or academy. It might take a smaller building at the start, but it would soon need the largest hall, and even that would not hold the people; for he who opens before the dramatic element in human nature an opportunity of gratification without compromise and without danger, does the mightiest thing of this century, and the tides of such an institution would rise as the Atlantic rises at Liverpool docks.

There are tens of thousands of Christian homes where the sons and daughters are held back from dramatic entertainment for reasons which some of you would say are good reasons and others would say are poor reasons, but still held back. But on the establishment of such an institution they would feel the arrest of their anxieties, and would say on the establishment of this new institution, which I have called the Spectacular, they would say, "Thank God, this is what we have all been waiting for."

Now, as I believe that I this morning make suggestion of an institution which wiser men will develop, I want to give some characteristics of this new institution, this Spectacular if it is to be a grand social and moral success. In the first place, its entertainments must be compressed within an hour and three quarters.

WHAT KILLS SERMONS

prayers and lectures and entertainments of all sorts is prolixity. At a quarter to ten o'clock, if not by half past nine every night, every curtain of public entertainment ought to drop, every church service ought to cease, the instruments of orchestras ought to be unstrung. What comes more than this comes too late.

There are thousands of people now asleep in Greenwood who would have been alive and well, but they would not go to bed at ten o'clock at night. You have your choice, sleep in your beds or sleep in your graves. The reason there are intoxicating bars connected with nearly all places of public entertainment, is because people get exhausted with their amusements, and they have to stimulate in order to stand it. How shall you the next day sell your goods, build your walls, physician your sick, preach your sermons, if the night before at half past ten or eleven o'clock, or half past eleven some public entertainment shall turn you out, you getting home at twelve o'clock?

The sublimest thing outside of heaven is the oratorio of the Messiah and the oratorio of the Creation; but I never heard one of those performances but I saw, before it was over, the people were overcome with satiety. The first hour we were enchanted, the next half hour we liked it pretty well, the rest of the time we were looking at our watches and wondering when we could go home. It is prolixity that kills all amusements, or injures all amusements. Now, in this Spectacular, this new institution, the curtain must drop at half past nine, or at a quarter to ten. So you will escape one style of dissipation.

THE CENSORS.

On the platform of this new institution there will be a drama which, before rendering, has been read, expurgated, abbreviated, and passed upon by a board of trustees connected with this reform amusement association. If there be in a drama a sentence suggesting evil, it will be stricken out. If there be in a Shakespearean play a word with two meanings—a good meaning and a bad meaning—another word will be substituted, an honest word looking only one way. The caterers to public taste will have to learn that Shakespearean nastiness is no better than Congrevean nastiness.

You say, "Who will dare to change by expurgation or abbreviation a Shakespearean play?" I dare. The board of trustees of this Reform Amusement Association will dare. It is no depreciation of a drama, the abbreviation of it. I would like to hear thirty or forty lines of Milton's Paradise Lost read at one time, but I should be very sorry to hear the whole book read at one sitting. Abbreviation is not depreciation.

On the platform of this new institution this "Spectacular," under the care of the very best men and women in the community there shall be nothing witnessed that would be unfit for a parlor. Any attitude, any look, any word that would offend you seated at your own fireside, in your family circle, will be prohibited from that platform. By what law of common-sense or of morality does that which is not fit to be seen or heard by five people become fit to be seen or heard by fifteen hundred people? On the platform of that Spectacular all the scenes of the drama will be as chaste as was ever a lecture by Edward Everett, or a sermon by F. W. Robertson. On the platform shall come only such men and women as you would welcome to your homes. I do not make the requisition that they be professors of religion. There are professors of religion that I would not want in my parlor, or kitchen, or coal cellar! It is not what we profess, but what we are. All who come on that platform of the Spectacular will be gentlemen and ladies in the ordinary acceptation of those terms—persons whom you would invite to sit at your table, and whom you would introduce to your children, and with whom you would not be compromised if you were seen passing down Broadway with them.

On that platform there shall come no carouser, no inebriate, no Cyprian, no foe of good morals, masculine or feminine. It is often said we have no right to criticize the private morals of public entertainers. Well, do as you please with other institutions; on the platform of this new institution we shall have only good men and good women, in the ordinary social sense of goodness. Just as soon as the platform of the Spectacular is fully and fairly established, many a genius who hitherto has suppressed the dramatic element in his nature because he could not find the realm in which to move it, will step over on the platform, and giants of the drama, their name known the world over, who have been toiling for the elevation of the drama, will step over on that platform—such women as Charlotte Cushman of the past, such men as Joseph Jefferson of the present.

The platform of that new institution, of that expurgated drama, occupied only by these purest of men and women, will draw to itself millions of people who have never been to see the drama more than once or twice in their lives, or never saw it at all. That institution will combine the best music, the best architecture, the best genius six nights the week on the side of intelligence and good morals.

Do you tell me this plan is chimerical? I answer, it only requires one man somewhere between here and San Francisco, or between Bangor and Galveston to see it and appreciate it—one man of large individual means and great heart, and with fifty thousand dollars, or a hundred thousand dollars he could do more good than all the Lenoxes, and the Lawrences, and the Peabodys ever accomplished. He would settle for all nations and for all times the stupendous question of amusement which for centuries has been under angry and vituperative discussion, and which is no nearer being settled to-day, by all appearances, than it was at the start. Such an institution would have to be supported at the start by a donation of capital; but very soon, in a year or two, it would become self-supporting, and the board of trustees of the Reformed Amusement Association would find that the idea paid not only in morals and the elevation of the people, but in dividends and hard cash.

I would go to such an institution, such a Spectacular, I should go once a week the rest of my life, and take my family with me, and the majority of the families of the earth would go to such an institution. I expect the time will come when I can without bringing upon myself criticism, without beng an inconsistent Christian—when I, a minister of the good old Presbyterian Church, will be able to go to some new institution like this, the Spectacular, and see Hamlet, and King Lear, and the Merchant of Venice, and the Hunchback, and Joshua Whitcomb. Meanwhile, many of us will have this dramatic element unmet and unregaled.

For my love of pictures I can go to the art gallery; for my love of music I can go to the concert; for my love of literature I can go to the lyceum lecture; but for this dramatic element in my nature, as strong as any other passion of the soul, there is nothing but injunction and prohibition. Until, sirs, you can establish a Spectacular, or a similar institution, with as much purity and with as much entertainment as this one of which I speak—until you can establish some such institution, you may thunder away against evil amusements until the last minute of the last hour of the last day of the world's existence and without any avail.

This dramatic element will break out, and it will climb over and it will trample under foot every effort at suppression. If you cannot guide it in the right direction, it will plunge in the wrong direction. It will either be

ANGEL OR SATYR.

We want this institution independent of the Church and independent of the theatre.

The Church tries to compromise this matter, and in many churches there are dramatic exhibitions. Sometimes they call them charades, sometimes they call them magic-lantern exhibitions—entertainments for which you pay fifty cents—the fifty cents to go for the support of some charitable institution. An extemporized stage is put up in the church or in the lecture-room, and there you go and see David and the giant, and Joseph sold into Egypt, and little Samuel woke, the chief difference between the exhibition in the church and the exhibition in the theatre being that the exhibition in the theatre is more skilful. The exhibition in the church generally has amateurs; the exhibition in the theatre performers who have given their whole life to the study of particular parts. But because the dramatic exhibition in the church is not as good as the dramatic exhibition in the theatre, it is considered to be more pious! The old elders do not say anything against it because they do not want to make trouble in the church, and the minister, to atone for the dramatic exhibition the week before in the house of the Lord, the next Sabbath anathematizes in style more vitriolic and brimstony the playhouse! And so all are cheated except God.

Now let us have a new institution, with expurgated drama and with the surroundings I have spoken of—an institution which we can, without sophistry and without self-deception, support and patronize — an institution so uncompromisingly good that we can attend it without any shock to our religious sensibilities, though the Sabbath before, we sat at the holy sacrament.

Because the drama is good it need not be dull. There is more than in sin. The best way to scatter darkness is by the clear light; the best way to wash off filth is by clean water; the best way to drown discord is by the drum beat and the flute warble, and the trumpet blast of grand harmony, and the best way to overcome the polluting and besotting and soul-destroying amusements of the day is by a model Spectacular with expurgated drama, under the control of the purest and the best men and women in the world and Church. That man who shall have money enough and brain enough and enterprise enough and heart enough to establish, illustrate, demonstrate the institution that I speak of, will bring the Church of God and all the human race under everlasting obligations. The world waits for it.

Meanwhile, until the Spectacular, this new institution, or something like it, shall be established, I counsel you to beware lest you allow the dramatic element in human nature to lead you into

CONTAMINATION.

To gratify that one taste you cannot afford to sacrifice your purity, your influence, your usefulness, your soul, as many have done. The amusements of life are merely the interstices, the parentheses, the interregnums of hard work, in preparation for other hard work. He who hunts for amusement and makes that his business, is like a man who hunts for a lost diamond among rocks, not regarding a precipice near by, and in the joy of finding the diamond stumbles five hundred feet off and down, the cormorants and the sea-gulls only knowing where he perished.

The amusements of life are beautiful and they are valuable; but they cannot pay you for the loss of your soul. I could not tell your character, I could not tell your prospects for this world or the next by the particular church you attend; but if you will tell me where you were last night, and where you were the night before, and where you have been the nights of the last month, I think I could guess where you will spend eternity.

As I look into the eyes of this multitude of young men, I cannot but think of the immense parental anxieties which hover over you. "Oh!" says a young man in the audience, "my father and mother are dead." That is no reason why you should think they are not watching you. Do you think that when your mother with white and dying lips kissed you good-by and went up to God, that she left all interest for her boy behind? Oh, no! I suppose she has as much interest in you now as she ever had. I do not believe you have offered a prayer since that sad day that she has not stood somewhere near, saying, "That is right," or that you have been disposed to go to some place where you ought not to go, that she has not stood by and said, "Don't go there, my dear boy; that is wrong." You thought it was the sighing of the wind. No. It was your mother.

But many of you have parents living, and they are thinking about you this morning. Perhaps they are away off in the country church, or kept by the storm indoors; but I warrant you they are thinking of you, planning for you, wanting to hear from you, expecting great things of you. They may not say much, but every good or bad thing they hear about you thrills them from the white hair on the wrinkled brow to the foot that will soon stop in the journey. As perhaps no one else will tell you how much your parents think of you, I will tell you.

You need not go clear back to see how much David thought of Absalom, or how much Hannah did for Samuel, or how Rizpah stood driving the jackals of the wilderness away from the rock on which her dead sons lay. I am talking about what your parents think of you. Oh, disappoint not their expectations! Do not forget the advice they gave you that last morning; do not go anywhere that would displease them if they heard it. And if they are real good, perhaps you had better try their religion.

Our readers will understand that Dr. Talmage is aware of the dangerous risks which would attend the best advised attempt to put this plan into practical effect.—ED.

A Touching Incident Related by Mr. Moody at one of the San Francisco meetings contains a suggestive lesson for parents. He said: "A father in New York had to say to his little boy in the sick-room, 'You will have to die very soon,' and the child replied, with a sweet smile, 'Well, I'll be with Jesus to-night, and I'll tell Him how kind you were in teaching me to love Him.'"

LORD PALMERSTON AND HIS TENANTS.

LORD PALMERSTON, besides owning some 8000 acres in and around Dublin, where the tenantry did not require any fostering care (the most of the property being building ground), held two large estates in the county of Sligo—one near Ballymore, let to large farmers and graziers, and the other at Cliffoney, tenanted by small holders. This estate, when it came into his possession, was found covered with a numerous population paying exorbitant rents. There were several vested interests to consider, but the estate was "squared" without one eviction, all wishing to go to America getting free passages, with permission to sell their cattle and grain, their arrears of rent forgiven, and a sum of money, according to the number of the family, on landing.

A story is told that when his agents, Messrs. Stewarts and Kincaid, had arranged for the rate of passages, his lordship wrote to the shipowner that if the rates agreed upon would not allow the best treatment and food on shipboard to "his people," the contract should be cancelled, and one made to treat them well. On being informed that the merchant was content with the price, he arranged that "a tumbler of hot rum punch every Sunday, after dinner, should be given to his people," which was carried out in three or four ships; but on being remonstrated with by the clergy that this was a bad example, he ordered the shipowner to give coffee and biscuit daily after dinner.

Though having no residence in Ireland, he could not be ranked as an absentee, as he spent from one half to two thirds of the Cliffoney rental in building the harbor at Mullaghmore, and improving the estate by drainage and roads.

His lordship's interest in the laborers upon and around his estates at Broadlands is well known. He was incessant in his attention to their happiness and prosperity, and was as ready to encourage virtue as to condemn vice. He considered that the possession of a good house is at the foundation of domestic morality and thrift. In the erection of new cottages he was ever careful to build roomy, substantial dwellings, affording sufficient and decent accommodation to the tenant, at a moderate rent; but he showed more interest in improving and enlarging existing cottages, on the ground that the money thus expended would go farther in securing the comfort of the inhabitants than could be derived from new buildings.

So much importance did he attach to the cottage accommodation that he visited every cottage on his estate, and gave personal instruction for carrying out the enlargements. Bed-room accommodation, good drainage, and good ventilation were his primary objects; but such simple things as the convenient placing of pegs for the clothes and the shelves for the housewife did not escape his attention. By his kindly and genial consideration of their wants and comforts he won his way to the hearts of his peasantry.

LORD PALMERSTON'S DEATH-BED CONFESSION OF CHRIST.

ON one occasion the Rev. Dr. Cumming, of Crown Court, Covent Garden, was preaching on the congenial subject of God's love in Christ Jesus. At the conclusion of his discourse Lord Palmerston thanked Dr. Cumming cordially for his exceedingly able presentation of the truth, and also expressed his sincere and heartfelt concurrence with the sentiments so eloquently set forth. Lord Palmerston was usually very reticent of speech on Christian themes, but there are grounds for apprehending that ultimately he was a willing captive of their imperishable beauty and worth.

During his last hours his physician, Dr. Protheroe Smith, a humble and sincere follower of Christ, said to his noble patient in the course of conversation, "I hope you are relying for eternal salvation on the precious blood of Jesus Christ." With faltering lips, but with the accent of conviction in his speech, he replied to this effect: "Oh, yes, doctor, I am resting only on the blood of Christ for acceptance with God, and entrance into heavenly rest." And in this spirit the illustrious statesman passed away from this world.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Etta's Visit—Face to Face with Poverty—The Mother's Woe—The Jelly Appreciated—The Ice Broken—The Ravine between Classes—Visits Wanted—Old Michael's Appeal.

ETTA told the man what family she wished to find. The old man was a willing guide, and finding the young lady unalterably silent, he was silent too. They stopped at the door of a house we have visited already. It was the house of the young men who did not admire the young ladies, and whose father liked the fiddle-playing down at the saloon.

The wearied mother, whom we left in bitter sorrow at our first visit, was now overwhelmed with the multiplied burden of sickness and watching, in addition to the constant poverty—result of sin—that had hitherto weighed her down, and made her life wretched to her. She opened her door at the old man's vigorous tap, and admitted Etta. "One of the young ladies from the Hall," said her guide as he thus introduced her to this new scene.

Had her own heart not been humbled by sorrow before unknown, Etta might have winced at thus finding herself face to face with poverty in its most evident form, and amidst circumstances hitherto so unrecognized. But low down as she was now beneath the smart of her sore bereavement, and her heart-pulse already quickened by the expressed sympathy of her strange guide, her only feeling was bewilderment.

Then, soothed by the poor woman's respectful addresses, and evident delight at seeing her, her first sensations melted into a consciousness of intense relief at this sudden plunge into circumstances even sadder, even more distressing, than her own. Till this moment, in brooding over the unutterable loss she had experienced, and the grief of her home, it had never occurred to her that there might be sorrow even greater than hers.

"Was ever grief like mine?" was a question that worldlessly had actually dwelt within her during the past few weeks. Answer there seemed to be none, except from the throbbing of her own wounds. However, now an answer, intangible yet, but none the less real, seemed to be creeping into her life. Already the pain of her thoughts was assuaged by a diversion into a fresh and very healing channel. Her receptive mind was quietly taking in each fresh item of that mother's woes, as they revealed themselves to her eye and ear.

"He's very bad!" the woman was saying; "he don't get no sleep o' nights. Just 'tossin',' 'tossin'.' And his poor mouth do burn so. He's always just moanin' like, and callin' out, of his pain. It was so sudden—a kind of a chill, they say, when he'd done his work. The doctor said it was in*formation* on he's chest—poor dear!"

The mother's heart had buried in its strangely fathomless depths each rough word, every unkind act. A life of thoughtlessness, too, and cruel neglect only mitigated by an occasional relentful moment, look, or word, which was indelibly fixed on that memory of wonderful mother's love—were all buried in the same abyss. The gleams of a better feeling, passing kindnesses, few and far between, were treasured up, and now afforded the only slender comfort she could grasp. These she would share with her lady visitor. The rest were "out of sight and out of mind," drifted into the forgotten past.

"He was a good boy sometimes," she was saying. "Poor fellow! One day, not so long ago, he saw me a-liftin' that 'ere can o' water to fill the kettle up; an' so he says, 'Mother,' he says, 'I'll do it for ye;' an' so he did. Bless him, poor chap! His father's takin' on about him terrible. But, oh! dear me!" . . . and then a groan, deeper in its intensity than those of the poor sufferer in the bed close by, broke from her.

To turn the subject, and perhaps arrested by the tearful eyes and grieved look of her guest, who sat in the arm-chair before her, dressed in those sable garments, unrelieved by one gleam whiter than her own sad face, the mother said;

"I heard of your trouble up at the big house, miss. We was all very sorry. Did seem a pity!" holding up her hands, "that fine young gentleman! and all so strong like. And dear me! he was a rider. I have seen him go by here on his horse." . . .

This comment was all too much for poor Etta's feelings. It was more than she could stand. Rising from her chair, with her gentle, grave dignity, she said, "I brought some jelly for your son. Here it is—cool and strengthening too. Do you think he would like it?"

"Well, I never!" exclaimed the recipient. "That is beautiful. He do keep on askin' for somethin' cool for his poor throat. And it is not many things that he can eat. Look here, Bill!" she said, going to a bed which stood half concealed by an extemporized curtain, "there's a lady here; and she has brought you this. 'Tis good; taste it!"

"'Tis good!" exclaimed a hoarse voice as the mother gently applied one spoonful after another to his lips.

"The lady's here. Wouldn't you like to see her?"

"All right!" said the voice, and the next moment Etta was beside the bed.

"Take a seat," the young man continued as he pointed to a chair near him.

Etta sat down. But what next? She did not well know how to proceed. What was the correct thing to say?—(and between you and me, my reader, if you will suffer a parenthesis, it was well she did not! for how much blessing is lost on such occasions by the cut-and-dried phrase, the hackneyed expression too often of mere cant, empty, yes! positively empty, of that true, earnest reality which alone can stand us in good stead when we are face to face with either life or death!)

Bill broke the ice. He said, "Is it the young lady from the big house, mother?"

"Yes," answered Etta for herself. "I heard you were so ill; and I thought I would come and see you, just to ask you how you were. Does it make you worse to see me?"

"Worse! Oh, no!" and a smile broke over the rough, unattractive face as he pushed the dishevelled hair off his forehead. And then a grave, meditative look passed into his restless eye as he said,

"Oh! yes. That were a pity about the gentleman." The sentence was no sooner out of his mouth than he saw he was treading on forbidden ground. "She could not stand it," he said to his mother afterward. "It was bad and stoopid of me to say anything about him, poor feller!"

But at the time he only changed his topic to one nearer home, and said, "I just caught a kind of a cold; and then I went to work, and didn't think nothing of it, not at first. But I got such a dreadful bad cough, and can't get no rest."

"I am very sorry!" Etta said softly. "I am very sorry. Were you quite well before?"

"Oh! yes. I never had nothing much the matter with me, 'cept one time when I had my hand bad; and then mother, she poulticed it, and it got on wonderful. This time I am real bad. Bless you! I can't stand, not for a minute."

"Does your mother nurse you?" asked Etta.

"Oh! yes! She do. She's a good un for that. She's up most nights. Last night she slept that hearty in her chair I could not wake her—could I, mother?" he inquired, appealing to her to indorse the statement.

"Yes," said the mother, "I do get that sleepy sometimes from sitting up. It's all I can do to keep my eyes open."

"I wish I could help you!" said Etta, her sympathies thoroughly roused. "Do you think I could?" she added earnestly, and looking first at mother and then at son.

The woman dropped an immediate courtesy; "Lor'! bless you, miss. You are kind." Wiping away an involuntary tear, she added, "We are poor folks, and we just does everything for ourselves. Rich folks is different."

Things were different certainly. No one felt this to-day more than Etta herself. She saw plainly enough the deep ravine that lay between the entire circumstances of the two houses. At the same time she was almost unconsciously longing that a connecting structure might be thrown across the gulf, a bridge erected, in fact, to unite the hearts and homes so widely separated. For Etta felt, to-day in her first visit, that by this life-habit of separation both were losers.

"I could come sometimes and sit here for an hour, while you got a rest?" she said inquiringly. And then she left the cottage, and an empty blank where her presence had been; but a strong, sweet fragrance was left behind. Yes! the fragrance of sympathy was there, and the touch of love; perhaps the sympathy more grateful, because it flowed from a still open wound, and the love none the less precious because the bright bud had scarcely yet blossomed. All the effort of this afternoon was new to Etta, but its novelty was Divine—refreshing.

"Delicious!" she said to herself—though grave and sad as was now their wont, her looks seemed to belie her words; yet her enjoyment of this half-hour's giving out of feeling to hearts that wanted it, was more real than all the pleasure she had ever known in her past life. Her heart had met other hearts, and, without putting the feeling into words, there was a very sweet rest, an indescribable relief, to her own unsatisfied longings.

She would have liked to be alone, but at the corner of the street she was met by her former guide—Old Michael they called him.

"Found 'em all right?" he began, as with his brisk trot, rather than walk, he kept her company along the bit of road shaded with trees that led back to the gate of her home.

"There's many a-wantin' you," he continued; "lots on 'em. They don't have nobody to talk to 'em, only just the bad uns that drags them the wrong way. And they all foller, just like sheep. Beg pardon, miss! I'm an old feller—only just an old feller—nothin' like what your people is—and may be I seems rough and unbehaved to such as you. But I do say this, miss—if only you'd let me take ye now and then to see some as wants ye, I'd take it kind, I would."

Etta faced round upon the old man. Her crape hat and veil shadowed over her quiet face, pale cheeks, and trembling lips, as she asked him, "What is your name?"

"My name! Oh! 'taint nothing much. Only a poor old sinner saved by grace," he answered, solemnly bowing his head over the two wrinkled hands he had tightly folded together. "But," he added, looking up into her face again, "I do want to see 'em all getting a blessing—a very great blessing, I DO!"

His listener's lips quivered, but she did not speak. She did not want to talk with a stranger in the streets, and yet the old man's words were melting her heart. Contrary to all the prejudices of the past, she felt new sensations to-day, a sort of fascination drawing her to this little outer world, that she had just discovered, and each fresh phase in it interested her in spite of herself. New ideas, new mazes of thought, were opening up before her, and she hesitated before putting her hand on the latch of the gate, which they had now reached, and which, in a moment, might have formed a final separation between herself and the old man.

But, apparently nothing daunted, he took advantage once more of her silence, this time to make his closing remark—

"Yes, miss, I haven't got much of a name to tell ye—not of myself. But I can tell ye of HIM! Blessed! blessed! He's beautiful, He is. I know Him well. He came to me some eight years ago, and He made me a new man, and now I'm happy; and I know Him, and I love Him, and I want all the world to do the same. Oh, dear! I do. My name's up there, miss! in the Lamb's Book of Life it is. Perhaps, he'll see it! that poor dear," he added very softly "of yours what's gone before. Young lady, do you put your name along side of us. Same page," he continued very earnestly, putting his face close to hers, "now do 'ee!"

Tears, that had been gathering, and yet frequently suppressed, all the afternoon, now overflowed and fell in a rapid stream over poor Etta's cheeks.

"Oh, don't 'ee take on! don't ye cry!" the old man was beginning, when Etta suddenly opened the gate and disappeared. She had no sooner done so, however, than by a sudden impulse she opened it again, and said to the retreating figure,

"Come in, if you like."

"Oh, no! I thank you, miss; I'd rather not. We'll meet again. Forgive an old man. I'll pray for ye!" she heard him say as he turned away.

It was a long time before Etta appeared in the drawing-room again.

THEN COMETH THE END.

By the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., D.D.

A CORRESPONDENT having asked what the Scriptures teach regarding the post-millennial period, we present the following short chapter from Dr. Tyng's admirable treatise, "He Will Come," published by Mucklow & Simon, New York:

Prophecy is a Divine picture of events that must be hereafter. For its intelligent apprehension it is needful that careful attention should be given to the law of perspective. The facts figured in the foreground are so fully discriminated that they may be readily understood in their reality and relations. Beyond these are portrayed other predictions, which present conceptions of the Divine foreknowledge that amaze more than they instruct. The outline of this light and shadow is in relief upon bold masses of cloud-land, which make the background of the designer's work.

But for this far removed region, in which curiosity and conjecture have their pastime, the truths that we have traced in these pages could not have attained their clearly determined manifestation. The uncertainty of the events, which shall come with the end, foreshortens the facts ready to be revealed. The effect of the whole revelation is dependent upon the mystery and majesty of that which is reserved. Our knowledge at the best is comparative. When in the study of the Divine Word we reach the closing portions of the sacred volume, we can only bow in reverence before the Lord, who half conceals while He half makes plain His purposes. When we shall have been glorified in the Kingdom of Christ then will we be capable to comprehend the substance, which now we study in symbol. Truth enough has been taught us about the events that are nigh at hand. For the details of the dispensation, which shall succeed the millennium, we must wait until God shall speak again.

And yet in these distant prophecies there are not deficient clearly determined features and figures of excellent glory. To these, in the words of the Spirit, we invite prayerful attention. They represent events which will wed the thousand years of reign to the eternity. The end will be the beginning.

After the thousand years the devil must be loosed out of his prison a little season.*

Satan "shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented for ever and ever."†

"And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it."‡ "The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished."§ They "shall come forth" . . . "they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation."‖ They "shall awake . . . to shame and everlasting contempt."¶ "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works . . . and whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."* "the fire that never shall be quenched; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."† "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire."‡ "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."§

"The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and all the works that are therein shall be burned up."‖ "The heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment."¶ "As a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed." From the face of Him that sat on the throne, "the earth and the heaven fled away: and there was found no place for them."††

"And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new."‡‡ "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth."§§ "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea."‖‖ "New heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."¶¶

"Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. . . . And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."

What an earth will this be on that Festival Day! Purified by fire, fruitful as Eden, beautiful in the sunshine from unknown skies, and crowned with the Divine presence—glorified bodies could ask no better home than such a world will be. If it be true that, in company with the whole solar system, our earth is transported through one hundred and fifty-four millions of miles of space in each year, then physically we are entering into the inconceivable glories of new heavens. The Word of God is echoed by the discovery of man. What wonders may dawn upon our planet when the end of the mediatorial reign, shall have come! Fancy frets at its impotence to conceive all that may be. Faith is content with the certainty of that which will be.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

THE loftiest aspirations, desires, and hopes of humanity are met in the coming of Christ. This is true as to His first coming; it is true also as to His second coming. The first implies the second; the first is fulfilled in the second. As human expectation was awakened to the first, so is it also to the second. Christ is the "Alpha and Omega," the "beginning and the end."

We celebrate with cheerfulness the coming of the Lord as the world's Redeemer. In this the promises of God are realized. The prophecies of olden times are fulfilled. The types and shadows are made realities. We know that the Bible is the word of God and sure. While His coming was in poverty, meek and lowly, persecuted and slain, angels and men, heaven and earth, bore testimony that He was the Messiah, and gave glory to God for His redeeming love.

We look for the Lord's coming again to reign over all the world. As the Lamb of God, the sacrifice for sin, he was rejected of men, "crucified, dead, and buried." But the stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner on which the temple of human redemption and God's glory is built. As in triumph He ascended, so will He come again, and His holy angels with Him. As He opened the gates of salvation, so will He open the gates of the celestial city, where the righteous shall enter. Then will He take to Himself of His great power and reign supreme among the nations of the earth. His coming again is the hope and joy of all believers.

To us individually His coming is virtually near. It is not long till we go hence, and time for us will be no more. Eternity begins, Christ, the Judge, deciding our state for happiness or misery. Therefore we need not put His coming far away in the future. It is profitable for us to contemplate it and realize its awful significance. Yet we are graciously permitted to await it, and opportunities are inviting us to prepare for it so that it may be to us an event of joy and not of terror.

The Lord's coming will be

A JOY TO BELIEVERS.

They have accepted Him in His mission of redeeming love in His first advent. His incarnation is to them a "great joy," bringing present deliverance from sin, and safety from its penalty in the future. By faith they live in Him and He in them. At His coming to judge the world He will receive His own to Himself. Such a revelation to Him carries with it a desire for His appearing, when they shall appear with Him in glory, wearing crowns of everlasting joy upon their heads. "They rest from their labors, and ther works do follow them" (Rev. 14 : 13).

To unbelievers His coming will be an indescribable terror. They rejected Him, meek and lowly, having come to deliver them from sin and its everlasting sting. Now they must behold Him as their righteous Judge, coming to pronounce upon them the everlasting condemnation of their own choosing. In such a relation to Him, who may abide His coming? All their sins culminating in unbelief, they will realize that this is their condemnation—that they believed not on Him who was sent unto them. Mercies slighted will make justice self-approved.

The second coming of Christ is for the completion of His redeeming work. Through His mediation, having established His Jerusalem, His Church, on earth, He ascended to heaven, the Jerusalem above, to prepare a place for His people. This spiritual temple, built of lively stones, must rise. The material is being gathered from all quarters and fitted into its heavenly proportions. Everywhere they who believe on the name of the Lord Jesus shall be gathered to himself and dwell in His holy city—the city with golden streets and pearly gates.

The coming of the Lord

for His messengers, sent before, have appeared. Messengers in the wilderness of sin, ever since the days of John the Baptist, are crying aloud, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord." The expectation of Christ's second appearing is no less grounded upon truth because it is indefinite as to time. The eternity of His being removes time. It couples His second withHis first appearing as the world's Messiah. Whether sooner or later, as regards creatures of time, His coming to judge the world is the consummation of His coming to redeem the world. The glory and joy of His coming as the Messiah will be increased by His coming again to subdue the last enemy, and receive His own unto Himself.

It becomes us to rejoice in His coming as the Son of Mary—the beginning of His personal manifestation on earth. More than seven centuries before the prophet so graphically described the forerunner of Christ. But its fulfilment was complete. "The voice of one crying in the wilderness" was heard. Its burden was, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord." His birth had been announced by angels, and his infant form witnessed by humble shepherds and eastern sages. Nature and providences confirmed their testimony in the early life of the Saviour.

Now, fully entering upon His redeeming work, it is needful that His way be prepared by the mission of John the Baptist—His preaching and baptism unto repentance. Only thus, in the wilderness of human thought and barrenness of human life, can there be made straight a "highway for our God." The consciousness of sin and the willingness for deliverance on the part of men must open the way for the true Teacher and almighty Saviour. The voice of the forerunner, sent to prepare the way in our hearts for the coming of the Lord by repentance for sin, should be heard and heeded. Then we may joyfully receive Him, for He comes not to condemn, but to save us.—Pastor and People.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Committee on Finance Consulted with Secretary Sherman on the refunding question on January 25th. The recommendations Mr. Sherman offered were substantially those contained in his report at the commencement of the session. He advised that the bill should be amended so as to make the funding bonds redeemable after five years, and payable in twenty years from the date of issue, and to bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent, the rate to be fixed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. As to the Treasury notes proposed by the bill, under the name of Treasury Funding Certificates, Mr. Sherman thinks they may be floated at 3 per cent interest, without change in the House provision for their redemption at any time after one year from their respective dates of issue. The amendments, with the one exception of that leaving the rate of interest to the discretion of the Secretary with the limit of 3½ per cent, are so slight in principle that it is hoped by members of both parties, that the House will concur in the bill as it may be amended in the Senate.

The Senatorial Elections held in the Respective States render the effect of a strictly party vote in that chamber somewhat doubtful. It would appear, from what is known of the new members, that the decision of any question in which party interests are affected would rest with two Senators. It is stated that there will be 37 Republicans, 36 Democrats, and 3 Independents in the Senate. Another classification—that of the New York Tribune—fixes the number as follows: Fifteen of the States, all Northern, are represented by two Republicans each. Fourteen, all Southern, are represented by two Democrats each. Nine States are divided in their representation, and of these five now have Republican Legislatures and one Republican Senator each.

Duplicity and Iniquity are the Charges made against the department over which Mr. Schurz presides, by the commission the President sent to investigate the case of the Poncas. The explicit and unequivocal character of the report the commissioners have made, after a searching investigation, evinces their fearlessness, and confirms the strong suspicions aroused by the protests of the men it has been the fashion in Washington to sneer at as "Boston philanthropists." The commissioners selected by the President were men of character, and were not under the influence of the Boston party. They were: Brigadier-Generals George Crook and Nelson A. Miles, United States Army; William Stickney, of Washington, and Walter Allen, of Newton, Mass.

The conclusions arrived at by the commissioners are: that the removal of the Poncas to the Indian Territory was "most unfortunate, resulting in great hardships and serious loss of life, injudicious and without sufficient cause;" that the removal took place in defiance of a solemn treaty which ceded to them the lands from which they were driven by the United States cavalry, and guaranteed them protection of life and property; that the violation of the treaty was without excuse, inasmuch as the Poncas had scrupulously observed all its conditions. That those members of the tribe who have made their way back are living in peace with white and red men alike; are peacefully cultivating their lands; and their only request is that they may not again be disturbed, and that a teacher may be sent to aid and instruct them in the arts of industry, and a missionary to teach them the principles of morality and religion.

The commissioners having stated the facts as they find them, also make a recommendation. They advise that the wronged people shall be released from the arrangement recently made at Washington, which their representatives accepted only because they despaired of obtaining better terms; and that an allotment of 160 acres be made to each man, woman, and child of the Poncas, to be selected by them as they may prefer, either on the old reservation in Dakota, or on the new one in the Indian Territory.

The request for a missionary to teach morality and religion is believed to have been made in sincerity, and not ironically, as the Poncas have sufficient penetration to discriminate between the character of the white men and of the government. Many Christian citizens, however, would gladly mark their sense of the outrage perpetrated on the Indians, and repudiate as far as is possible all responsibility for it if an opportunity occurred.

A Constitutional Amendment which would, if passed, effect a radical change in Presidential elections, has been introduced by Senator Wallace of Pennsylvania. By its provisions the electoral colleges are abolished. The people are to vote directly for the candidates, and by districts, each State having as many districts as it has Congressmen and Senators, and each district to have one vote. Congress is to count the votes in joint convention, and a plurality is to elect. It will be readily seen how important are the changes contemplated by the proposed amendment. The alteration will probably be supported or opposed by politicians, according as it may be found that it benefits or injures the respective parties; the change should not, however, be regarded by the people in that light. It is worthy of consideration, and though it ought not to be adopted hastily, is calculated to remove abuses which have of late been somewhat conspicuous.

The President's Nominations for District Attorney for the Southern Division of New York and for the vacancy on the Bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, have evoked acrimonious criticism, both in political circles and in the columns of the press of both parties. The New York nomination is obviously aimed at the Conkling wing of the Republican party, which President Hayes has no cause to love; but the nomination of Mr. Stanley Matthews to succeed Judge Swayne is not so easily explained. That tribunal ought to be beyond the reach of calumny, and should be so constituted as to command the respect and confidence of the people. It is therefore a matter for regret that the nomination is one which even Republican journals are not unanimous in supporting. The New York Times, whose advocacy of extreme Republican principles is notorious, animadverts severely on the subject. It says of the nominee: "He is by nature an advocate, one-sided as to the cause which he espouses, superficial in his study and his thought, and carried to his conclusions by the intensity of his zeal rather than by the depth and accuracy of his reasoning." Mr. Stanley Matthews is the brother-in-law of President Hayes.

A Fatal Railroad Disaster Occurred Early on the morning of Sunday, January 23d, at Tioga station, near Owego, N. Y. The catastrophe was caused by the breaking of the axle of a driving-wheel on the locomotive engine, while the train was going at the rate of about thirty-five miles an hour. Several of the forward cars were thrown from the track and broken up; and they immediately took fire. Five men, four in the United States Postal Service, and one in the employ of the United States Express Company, were burned to death. They were in the postal car, which was turned over by the shock, and it is supposed that the lamps must have ignited the mail matter in the car. No cries were heard from the suffering men, and it is thought they may have been rendered unconscious by suffocation. The train was the Atlantic Express from the West, and carried many passengers. Besides the loss of life fifteen persons were slightly injured.

The Floating Church of Our Saviour in Connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society for Seamen in New York, was the scene, some time ago, of one of those transformations of life which encourage Christians to persevere in their efforts to reach all classes of society. At a recent meeting in the church a weather-beaten sailor, in response to a question, said, "What do I owe to this mission? I owe everything to it! It has made me a sober man, and it has made me a Christian." He went on to relate that during six years of seafaring life he had been a hard drinker, never neglecting an opportunity of being ashore to plunge into vice and debauchery, and during that time never once communicated with his friends. One night in New York he was coaxed with great difficulty into visiting the mission, and there, by the blessing of God, underwent a change of heart which made him a sober man and a humble Christian.

The Death of the Eminent Philanthropist, Mr. Apollos R. Wetmore, occurred suddenly on January 20th. He appeared to be in his usual health when he retired to rest that night, but on being called next morning he was found to have passed away. It is supposed he must have died in his sleep, as his features bore no trace of pain. He was over eighty-four years of age, and his long life had been devoted to philanthropic work. He commenced business in New York in partnership with his brother in 1818. Six years later he formed a partnership with Mr. William Green. Mr. Wetmore finally retired from active business work in 1875. The evangelical and charitable associations of the city have by his death lost a valued friend, for he not only devoted his personal energies to their advantage, and gave freely of his means to their funds, but he was successful in inducing others to do likewise. Eight years ago Mr. Wetmore celebrated his golden wedding, and three years afterward he was bereaved of his wife. He was a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church.

A Savage Dog Infuriated Almost to Madness was at large in the streets of New York from eleven o'clock on the night of January 26th to noon the next day. All through the night and in the early morning hours he roamed through the streets, attacking all who came in his way—men, women, and children. He was a big ugly brown dog of powerful build, and he sprang at his victims so suddenly and with so much ferocity that they were unprepared for the attack, and many were severely bitten. After being fired at with revolvers, and receiving several severe blows from men who had struggled with him, he was finally killed by a policeman. The affair caused considerable agitation and alarm for a time, and there was much uneasiness until it was known that the beast had really been caught and killed; but society has a more dangerous enemy in the shape of the liquor traffic, which is breaking hearts and desolating homes every day, and yet it is allowed to devour its victims continually without molestation!

A Portrait of the late Mr. T. De Witt Talmage, the eldest son of Dr. Talmage, will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It will be accompanied by a biographical sketch, which will include interesting information concerning the life and character of the lamented young man, which has not yet appeared in print, together with some verses he composed shortly before his illness, and a full report of the addresses delivered by Dr. Spears, Dr. Suydam, and others, at the funeral services.

A Death from an Extraordinary Cause Occurred at St. Louis, Mo., on January 26th. It was that of a young man, the son of a prominent lawyer of that city. He was Second Lieutenant of the Seventh United States Cavalry, and had returned to his home on sick leave. The cause of his death was inflammation of the brain, believed to be the result of circumstances which occurred while he was at West Point. One day, while on parade, an insect got into one of his ears. By the rules he was not allowed to raise his hand, and stood in the ranks more than an hour, while the insect worked its way into the ear. When dismissed his ear was full of blood, and the insect could not be removed for two days. This caused a corrosion of the bone next to the brain, and gave him a great deal of trouble. He went to his regiment in Northern Dakota, and, after performing some service, and suffering from a severe attack of sickness, he came home expecting to resign, but, as it proved, only to die. The young man's sad death is all the more lamentable from the circumstances which brought it about, and from the insignificance of the cause. It reminds us of the many cases of spiritual death in which what are called "little sins" play a conspicuous part.

The President and President-elect were both rejected as lovers in their younger days, in a little village near Cleveland. Some thirty years ago, according to the Cleveland Herald, two young ladies received offers of marriage from Mr. Hayes and Mr. Garfield. They were then poor, and the parents in both cases deemed it imprudent to confide their daughter's welfare to men who had so little property, and whose future prospects seemed so uncertain. The most remarkable coincidence of the courtship was that both young ladies lived in a village of not more than five hundred inhabitants and both refused two future Presidents of the United States because of their poverty. It proves that men in their anxiety to provide for their children's future are liable to make mistakes. In spiritual matters, too, the same mistake is very common. People hesitate to join themselves to the Lord's people lest they lose position in society, not realizing the glory which Christ at His coming will confer on His bride, the Church.

A Mayor's Start in Life was Described in a House of Refuge a few weeks ago. The speaker, addressing the little criminals, said: "I have something to tell you, boys. There's a little fellow down there who looks just about the way I looked when I was ten years old. I had just about as much money in my pocket as he has, and I don't believe he has a cent. My father died, and my mother and sister and I hadn't a roof to cover us. I started out and got work, and when I was fifteen I earned a dollar a week and slept under a counter.

"But I stuck to work and learned a trade. When I was twenty-one I fell in love with a nice girl, and made up my mind to marry her. I had six dollars a week, and she earned three, by her needle; so we put the six and the three together, and were married, and after that set up a little shop. She cooked the oysters that we sold, and I made the ice-cream, and so we worked along. If I have had any success in life, then or since, it has been through doing honest work and sticking at it all the time." The speaker was then Mayor of the great city of Philadelphia.

An Artist's Rescue from the Power of Drink was graphically described by Mr. Murphy in the course of a recent lecture in Pittsburg, Pa. While the lecturer was engaged at Troy, an artist crept into the room where the meetings were held. He was dressed in clothes so old that he was ashamed to be seen. He had been in good circumstances, but his passion for intoxicating liquor had brought him to poverty, and he and his wife were living in one room. Mr. Murphy induced him to sign the pledge, and after the meeting persuaded him to come to his hotel.

"What I wanted with this man," said Mr. Murphy, "was to give him a suit of clothes. My son had offered him some money in the hotel, but he would not take it, saying he didn't sign to get money or to be insulted. I got him into my room, and I got near the door, for he was a bigger man than I am, and I told him I wanted to give him a suit of clothes. He stormed, but I argued the case with him, and I finally got him to accept the clothing. He broke down when I was putting on his collar, and said he couldn't stand it. He asked me if I had ever been in need, and I told him I had, and he became more reconciled. Well, he kept from drink until he had got his home back for his wife, and had money in the savings bank besides, and the poor fellow fell again. The enemy never left him. As he walked the street the invisible spirit of wine ever haunted him. He fell, and he was about to leave the city, to run away to hide his shame. He walked the streets at night, he came to me, he struggled and fought against the terrible demon. Think of this battle, ye men who know nothing of it; have charity; think of the struggling out of the ashes of broken resolutions. He brought his broken heart and fearful trial to God, and he was saved."

The Settlement of Misery is the Name given to a town on the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which is the abode of a colony of lepers. The Youth's Companion says: "Americans are apt to think of the disease as belonging to the under side of the world: to China, India, Egypt. Very few of our readers, we suspect, know that a colony of lepers exists in this continent. The leper hospital in the colony has just been taken charge of by the Dominion of Canada. Its upper story, it is stated, is filled with the lepers who can yet see; the lower with the blind and dying." A physician says the disease at its first stages is almost imperceptible, a mere flake on the flesh, but it spreads with frightful rapidity, and is absolutely incurable. This description shows how appropriate is the comparison of the disease to sin, which, like it, corrupts the whole man (Isa. 1:6). Like it, too, sin is taken away both in its power and penalty by Jesus to whom alone leprosy yielded.

An Obstruction in the Pocket held a Man back from Christ at a Salvation Army meeting at Germantown, Pa., recently. The leader of the meeting says: "When prayer-meeting began a man came forward and knelt at the penitent form, but for a while seemed to be holding on to something which he could not give up. At last special prayer was offered in that direction for him, and at the close he pulled several dime songs and novels of a theatrical character out of his pocket and said: 'Burn these; I had better have had a Bible in my pocket.' Immediately upon his surrendering here he found peace."

A Funeral Without a Prayer Occurred at Sea recently. The fact came to light through the request for a prayer-book made by a poor sailor to an officer of the Missionary Society for Seamen. He said that one of the crew of his ship had died during the last voyage, and when his body was consigned to the deep, there was no one on board who could offer a prayer, and no book out of which one could be read. The event powerfully affected the seaman's mind, and he desired the gift of a book, that he might never again witness such a spectacle. Since then, on a recent Sunday afternoon, the sailors of the ships then in the port of New York received presents of New Testaments and tracts in their native languages. A large variety was needed, for the recipients were natives of Finland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, France, Italy, and Portugal, to each of whom a New Testament and a religious book in his own language was presented.

A marked peculiarity of this sphere of work, which distinguishes it from other fields of labor, is that among seamen there is said to be found no hypocrisy. A sailor is never ashamed to acknowledge his spiritual state, and never attempts to pass himself off as other than he is, and after his conversion he is equally ready to let it be known that he is a follower of the Lord Jesus.

The Text of the Last Sermon Preached by the Rev. Wm. Bedell, pastor of a Methodist Episcopal Church in Troy, was: "I have fought a good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith" (2 Tim. 4:7). In the evening while entering the church to preach at the second service, he fell on the steps in a sudden attack of epilepsy, his right side being completely paralyzed and his ministerial usefulness ended.

THE THRONE OF GOD AND OF THE LAMB.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

'The throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it."—REVELATION 22: 3.

The Throne of the Millennial City—A Cathedral Visible only on Sundays—I. Behold the Lamb—A Lamb-like Man—A Lamb of Sacrifice—II. Behold the Throne—Jesus in Front of the Throne—The Throne of God—III. The Throne in Heaven—The Land of Rest—Of Service—Of Communion—The Preparation of the Mansions—The Marriage Celebration—The Home-Bringing of the Bride.

WE shall take these words as referring to heaven. Certainly it is most true of the celestial city, as well as of the millennial city, that the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it. This theme of surpassing interest intimately concerns all of us who are believers; for to the rest eternal at the foot of the throne we are constantly looking. Were it otherwise, I fear there would be little prospect of our ever passing the heavenly portals. We do not suppose that a man is shooting at a target if he does not look that way; nor can we imagine that a man's ambition is fixed on heaven if he has no heavenward thoughts or aspirations.

The pilgrim turns his steps toward the place he is desirous to reach. What though he cannot catch a glimpse of the distant spot, which is the goal of his hope, yet his eyes are in that direction. Let him climb a hill on a clear day, and you will see how he strains his eyeballs to catch a glimpse of tower or spire, minaret or battlement, of the city he is seeking. When he descends the valley, and the outlook is dreary, he solaces his soul with songs in the night that tell of "a day's march nearer home." The anticipated greetings of friends gladden his heart.

After a noble fashion the prospect of heaven lights up our sad days with gleams of glory, while our happy Sabbaths here below have often made us long for the sanctuary on high. In the crowded courts of this Tabernacle our fancy has pictured the Temple above of living stones and countless worshippers. Bunyan speaks of Mount Clear, from which with aid of telescope the celestial city might be descried in the distance. We have enjoyed intervals when no clouds or mists have obstructed our outlook, and these have usually come to us on the Lord's days.

A friend of mine when he went to reside in Newcastle-on-Tyne was looking over a newly-built house that was to let; and as he looked out of the window in the top room the landlord said to him, "You can see Durham Cathedral from here on a Sunday." My friend, failing at first to catch his meaning, said, "Why on Sunday more than any other day?" "Well," said he, "the furnaces are not going, and the smoke is not rising to darken the atmosphere." I was not surprised to hear that the passing incident supplied my friend with a parable the next time that he preached. On special Sabbaths we peer into the city of which our text says, "The throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it." God grant that our meditations may stir your upward longings, and that our discourse may excite your desires toward heaven.

Come, then, let us think upon the throne of God, and of the Lamb and of the place where it is. But stop a moment; I want you to look round and take of the scene. Do you notice that this throne is the "throne of God and of the Lamb?" Doubtless you know where John got that phrase, that title for Christ—"the Lamb." It is almost peculiar to himself. You catch the note in Isaiah; Jesus is celebrated as a Lamb in his prophecies. You hear the name in an epistle of Peter, and in the Acts of the Apostles as a quotation from the evangelical prophet. But with John it is a most familiar term. John, the best beloved of all the disciples of Jesus, loves this sweet symbol, and delights to speak of his Lord as "the Lamb."

This John had been a disciple of that other John, the Baptist, whose chief and choicest sermon, which lingered most in his mind and memory, was couched in words like these, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." John the Baptist struck a note which vibrated throughout the whole life of John the Divine. In Patmos John recalls his early impressions, for old men delight in the scenes and sayings of their youth.

When John began his gospel he was absorbed in "the Word;" now that he unfolds the wondrous scroll of vision he portrays "the Lamb." As the key-note of Redemption the name recurs frequently in his writings, and in his closing book the name comes back to him with all its music, and he dwells upon it with evident delight. The word "arnion," as used in the book of Revelation, might be translated "a little lamb."

It is a diminutive in the Greek text, expressive, as Dean Woodhouse observes, of tenderness and love; and in such sense our Saviour Himself used it in addressing Peter, after His resurrection—"Lovest thou me? feed my lambkins." I refer to the idiom without any wish to see the common rendering altered; but it seems to show a marvellous degree of familiarity in John's mind with his blessed Master, when he looks upon Him as the little lamb to be loved, for you know how wont we are to express affection in diminutive terms. "My little dear," or "my little darling," are expressions that trip sweetly from our tongues.

I. The sublime adoration of the heavenly host is offered to the Lamb that was slain and hath redeemed us to God by His blood out of every kindred and tongue, and people, and nation. In order to behold the throne of God, and of the Lamb, you must first of all get a sight of the Lamb. I invite you, therefore, in the words of John the Baptist, to of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Look at Him in the dawn of His ministry, when first He comes within the range of mortal vision—a man, a lowly man, one chosen out of the people. About Him there is neither form nor comeliness to make him at all remarkable; He is one who did not strive or cry, or cause His voice to be heard in the streets; not a pretentious nor an ambitious man, but one who could say of Himself, and nobody could gainsay it, "I am meek and lowly in heart."

His character, too, is so purely natural that the example of excellence He sets needs no explanation. The gentle disposition that drew little children around Him, the kindly temper that bore reviling without anger, the love He showed to the poor and destitute, the respect He paid to the outcasts of society, and above all His kindly notice of publicans and harlots, as sheep gone astray who were capable of being restored, claim our gratitude, and cause us to regard Him as the model of goodness for all generations. Such is the man whom all the kindreds of this earth must ultimately acknowledge as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

HOW LAMB-LIKE HE IS!

Thus you see the Lamb of God among men; will you track His footsteps still farther on till He becomes the Lamb of sacrifice, and actually takes the sin of man upon Himself, that He may bear its penalty? What an extraordinary night that was when He rose up from the supper table and said to His disciples, "Let us go hence." He went to a certain garden where He had been accustomed to spend nights in meditation; He went there to pray. And oh, what a prayer it was! such surely as heaven never heard before nor since. In an agony He prayed more earnestly, and yet more earnestly, till "He sweat, as it were, great drops of blood, falling to the ground." He cried to the Father, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." Then did the heavy cloud of human sins overshadow His soul, and the ghastly terrors of all His people's guilt brood over His spirit. He proved the hour of dread and the power of darkness.

Arrested by one who had eaten bread with Him, He was betrayed into the hands of conspirators. By an apostle who turned apostate He was sold for a few paltry pieces of silver. From the place of private retreat, and of secret prayer, He was hurried off to prison and to judgment. Before Herod and Caiaphas, and then before Pontius Pilate, was He arraigned. All through the night He was falsely accused and foully mocked, scourged, spit upon, and treated with the utmost contempt. So was His heart broken within Him because of the reproaches of them that reproached God which fell upon Him. Deserted by His disciples, denounced by the priests, despised by the populace, He was at length delivered up to the malice of His foes, and, sentenced by Pilate, He was led away to be crucified; still His patience was conspicuous, and when He was led as a lamb to the slaughter He opened not His mouth.

Him they took, silent, passive, submissive, and nailed Him to a cross. There He hung in the glare of the sun till the torture of tender nerves in His hands and feet produced such fever in His flesh that He said, "My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws, and thou hast brought me into the dust of death." Such was the dissolution of His entire frame it seemed as if He had no longer a solid body; it was melted with bitter pain. There He hung, men jeering Him, till at last the sun could bear the sight no longer, and veiled His face; the earth could no more endure to be the stage for such a tragedy, and began to rock and reel; the very dead were stirred as though they could not slumber in their graves while such a deed was done, so tombs were opened and many arose. Oh, it was a wondrous spectacle! Those that saw it smote upon their breasts, and went upon their way.

Say, then, beloved, have you ever seen this sight? Have you so seen it as to sing with our poet,

"My soul looks back to see
The burdens thou didst bear,
When hanging on the cursed tree,
And hopes her guilt was there"?

Do you trust him? Are you believing him? His cry from the cross is "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." Have you so looked? If so, then you have had the preliminary sight; and I pray God so to strengthen the eyes of your understanding that you may gaze more intently on this vision of the Apocalypse—"The throne of God and of the Lamb."

II. BEHOLD THE THRONE.

Let us see it first from the Lamb's side of it. Of course there is only one throne; God and the Lamb are not divided. The Lamb is God, and the interests of God and the Lamb are one. The one kingdom of God, even the Father, is identical with the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Acknowledging the oneness of the throne, we proceed to inspect it from the point of view in which the Lamb chiefly challenges our notice.

You will remember that He is portrayed to us as "the Lamb in the midst of the throne." So John beheld Him, as you read in the fifth chapter of the Revelation and sixth verse. But I would not have you make any mistake about the meaning of that phrase. Dr. Watts constructed a poor paraphrase of the passage when he said,

"Our Jesus fills the middle seat
Of the celestial throne."

There is no such idea in Holy Scripture. The midst of the throne means the front of the throne, according to the Greek. The Lamb was not on the throne in that vision, but standing immediately before it. That is a position in which our Lord Jesus Christ would have us see Him. I will show you presently that He is on the throne according to our text, but not according to the passage which I have just now quoted.

In the previous narrative of the fifth chapter, where the Lamb is said to be in the midst of the throne, means in the front of it, in the centre, standing there, that we might draw near and approach the throne through Him. To the awful throne of God there could be no access except through a Mediator; He stands, therefore, in between us and the invisible, sovereign God, an interposer and interpreter, one of a thousand, the daysman who can lay his hand upon both. This is a beautiful thought. Jesus, according to the former vision of this revelation, is in the front of the throne where God always sees him before He sees us.

I have drawn your attention to this previous vision as a preliminary to that of our text, in which the position of Jesus Christ is upon the throne reigning there, clothed bodily with all the power of the Godhead. Do not forget that it is even so. The Lamb is on the throne.

The power thus conferred upon him the Lamb not only possesses by right and title, but he exercises it in deed and in truth. "All power," said our risen Redeemer, "is given unto me in heaven and in earth." He ruleth now with unlimited sway; and the sceptre of His kingdom is a right sceptre. As Joseph was exalted in Egypt, and Pharaoh said, "See, I have set thee over all the land; and the people cried before him, Bow the knee; and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt," even so we read of Jesus, "God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord in the glory of God the Father."

The rebellious are not exempted from His rule. What though they conspire against Him, they shall be utterly confounded. One might fancy that there was a slight strain of language in Pharaoh's fiat, that "without Joseph no man shall lift his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt;" but there is no exaggeration if we apply the words to Christ, for it is a fact that every man living is responsible to Jesus for the thoughts and imaginations of his heart.

HE IS KING FOREVER.

The throne of heaven is the throne of God and of the Lamb.

Thy royal prerogative, O Lamb of God, extends over all the realms of grace. Thou, O Lord Jesus, dost dispense mercy as seemeth good in Thy sight. As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickens whom He will, even so He has given to the Son to have life in Himself, and to quicken whomsoever He pleases. As Head of the church, His benign control is absolute among the members of His body. In the bestowment of spiritual gifts, and in the appointment to sacred offices, He rules and regulates, and nothing is too minute to escape His notice.

How pleasant to my poor heart to think that He who bowed His head to shame is now exalted, as God over all, to such a seat of honor! I feel that no odium I could incur, no injury I could sustain in preaching His name and publishing His fame, could be of any account in comparison with my joy in seeing Him exalted. Let me starve in a garret or die in a ditch if only Christ be glorified. The old soldiers of Napoleon, rank and file, revelled in the triumphs of their general. When they fell on the battle-field, with shouts of victory ringing in the air, they seemed to think light of death so long as the emperor had won renown, and the eagles of France were in the ascendant.

Live forever, royal Lamb! Reign forever, victorious Lord! As for us, who or what are we? Brethren, let us follow Him in the tribulation of the hour while the fight is fierce, so shall we find ourselves in His train when His triumph is trumpeted forth before the assembled universe. "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

What lowly reverence we owe to Him who occupies such a throne of boundless empire! Approach Him then with profound humility; but mingle therewith the most childlike confidence. Beloved, we see before us the grandeur of God and the gentleness of a Lamb. The Infinite Creator and the innocent creature are linked together in lovely union. He who is God over all, blessed forever, has resources amply sufficient to meet your utmost wants. You do not come to a finite helper when you draw near to Christ. In trusting to the merit of His blood, you have an all-prevalent plea and full security for pardon, peace, and acceptance.

I do not know what hope and expectations the Socinian can cherish with a Man-Christ, or an Angel-Christ, or a semi-divine Christ, as a guide to immortality. They may honor Jesus of Nazareth for the purity of the life He lived on earth, but I want God in human flesh to save my soul, the death of the Son of God to wash away my sin. I find the fight of life so fierce that no right hand but that which made the heavens can ever give me the victory. I stay myself on the incarnate God who bled and died, and is gone into the excellent glory, and sits down there upon the throne, Lord over all; I trust His saving strength to bear me through.

Well, that is the aspect of the throne from the side of the Lamb. Let us now take another look and behold

THE THRONE OF GOD.

The throne of God is the throne of the Lamb. The throne of God, if we view it as sinners, with a sense of guilt upon our conscience, is an object of terror, a place to fly from. Our poet was right when he said:

"Once 'twas a seat of burning wrath,
And shot devouring flame;
Our God appeared, consuming fire
And vengeance was His name."

I recollect when I had such terrible apprehensions of God, and I know that they were founded upon truth, for the Lord is terrible to unforgiven men. Now I do not disdain, as some do, to sing, "Though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me." Not that there has been a change in God. It is the view of God which the sinner is able to take which has been changed, and that change has been effected by Christ. From everlasting to everlasting Jehovah is the same; in Him there is no variableness.

There, on the throne of the Almighty, mercy reigns. According to the merit of the sacrifice and the virtue of the atonement all the statutes and decrees of the kingdom of heaven are issued. The altar and the throne have become identical. From that throne no fiery bolt can ever again be hurled against the believer, for it is the throne of the Lamb as well as the throne of God. Oh, what comfort there is for suffering saints in this conjunction of majesty and mercy on the throne of the Highest!

The sovereignty that is signified by this throne must certainly be unlimited. The throne of God is the throne of an absolute monarch who doeth as He wills among the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of this lower world. From that throne the proclamation comes like a peal of thunder, "The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble." God's throne of sovereignty is not a throne of arbitrary power, for the Lord is perfect and holy, and His will is just and right. In acting according to the purpose of His own will He abounds toward us in all wisdom and goodness. The sternness of law is linked with the sweetness of love; because while the throne of heaven is the throne of God, it is still the throne of the Lamb.

I fear that I fail to find the words that will express my thoughts; but this empire of God and the Lamb endears itself to our hearts. There is about it a kingly kindliness, and a majestic mercy most charming to the mind. Do any ask, What throne is that? To whom does it belong? We answer, It is the throne of the great and glorious God, and it is the throne of the lowly, lovely Lamb. The glorious Lord is gentle as a child; the lamb is lordly as a lion. Referring to the Book sealed with seven seals, described in the fifth chapter, St. Bernard said, "John heard of a lion and saw a lamb; the lamb opened the book and appeared a lion." But, behold, here it is, "the throne of God and of the Lamb."

Does not a rich blend of splendor and tenderness dawn on your apprehension? Are you not sensible of some present effect on your souls? Do you not feel the charming sweetness and the overpowering light? John tells us in the first chapter what his own sensations were when the Son of man appeared to him in the midst of the seven candlesticks, vested with the insignia of Priest and King. First, he says, "When I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead." Then he adds, "And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am—" Ah! when you recognize who He is, fear gives place to faith, and trust succeeds to trembling.

I am painfully conscious, as I proceed, that the subject is too much beyond my grasp to mould it into a sermon. This is not preaching. I have been merely holding up the text, and trying to suggest thought after thought, as the glory of my Lord's kingdom occurred to my mind. But what can any of us say in the presence of God and of the Lamb? Our proper position is to fall down upon our faces and worship.

III. One fact remains to be noticed; it is this: the throne of God and of the Lamb is in heaven.

BEHOLD THE THRONE IN HEAVEN.

We must pass beyond this earthly region, and join the company of those who people the celestial realm before we can see the throne of God, so as to obtain a complete view of it. Is not this among the chief joys of heaven?

"I'd part with all the joys of sense,
To gaze upon thy throne.
Pleasures spring fresh forever thence,
Unspeakable, unknown."

There are many ideas of heaven, and I suppose, according to each man's character, will be the prospects he cherishes, and the answer he gives when the question is asked, "What must it be to be there?" There is ample scope for imagination, so abundant are the joys which the Lord hath prepared for them that love Him. There is the great wall, with its twelve glittering foundations, and there are the twelve gates, and the twelve several pearls; there, too, is the tree of life, with its twelve manners of fruits. Who shall ever tell forth all the meaning of the symbols used by holy men to set forth the Paradise of God?

Nor are the Scriptures our only source of information, for our sighs below are prophecies of the blessings laid up for us. The toil-worn laborer thinks of heaven as a land of rest, and he shall find it so. On the other hand, the relish that we have for religious worship, and the delight we take in Christian work, leads us to think of heaven as a sanctuary where the servants of God can serve Him day and night; we shall find it so.

For my part, I sympathize with both expectations; for though they sound contrary, they need not clash. The rest of glorified spirits, so far from being a sort of suspended animation, will rather consist of a joyous refreshment in enthusiastic service; and the ministry of ransomed hosts, instead of wearying them, will arouse them to fly more swiftly, to sing more loudly, and to serve God more diligently, as they see His face. Are there not tempted ones among you who smile as they think that there shall be no sin in heaven? To Paul, when in prison, knowing that the hour of his departure was at hand, after a life of preaching the Word and enduring persecution, the crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge should give him was just then the most welcome anticipation.

As the warriors look for a crown, so on the other hand friends look for communion. To loving hearts great is the bliss of heaven's unbroken fellowship of saints: it will indeed be a great joy in heaven to see all who loved the Lord below. How happy we shall be when these blessed reunions take place! Still, I think that all of you will agree with me that the heaven of heaven is that we shall be "with Christ, which is far better"—that we shall behold His face and partake of His glory. The throne of God and of the Lamb will be the centre of our delights. To have reached home in the heavenly Father's house, to have seen our Elder-brother, and to be sure that we shall abide with Him and go no more out—oh, that is what we pant for!

What hallowed communion with Him we shall there enjoy! In His church below He has given us some pleasant foretaste of His sweet converse; but there the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall always feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of water. There is a text that I have been turning over in my mind for many years. I want to preach from it, but I cannot understand it clearly enough at present. I hope to preach from it one day before I go to heaven. If not, I will preach from it up there when I shall have realized its full significance. Ah! do not smile. Some opportunities we shall have in heaven to testify of Christ; for we shall make known unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places the manifold wisdom of God.

It is difficult to imagine that we ever can be able to explore the whole of the unsearchable riches of Christ. The passage I am referring to is that in which Jesus says, "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." Like Thomas, I am prone to ask questions. What is there to be prepared, and in what respect does heaven as a place need to be made ready? I do not like to think of heaven as a half-built habitation, or as fully built, yet only partly furnished. What means this preparing of a place for us?

Perhaps our Lord's going there made heaven ready, and its mansions meet for the occupation of His disciples. Heaven would hardly be a home for saints in the absence of the Saviour. As I do not know the angels, and never was acquainted with any one of them, I doubt very much whether I should feel at home in their company if Jesus were not there too. There are a few saints up yonder whom I once knew and dearly loved. But one wants to be introduced to the whole of the residents, to the general assembly and church of the first-born in heaven. How can this happy familiarity be brought about? Now that Jesus is there we have a friend on high whom we have known, and who has known us, who can introduce us to all its inhabitants and acquaint us with all its joys.

Listen ye now; lend me your ears, and hearken to this concluding word that I have to say to you. Heavenward now we are hastening our steps. We long to reach the happy plains, because there is not only a rest to be enjoyed but a festival to be celebrated. The marriage-supper of the Lamb draweth nigh. His church shall be prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. We that are with Him, following in His train, called, chosen, and faithful, are only espoused to Him as yet, but we are going to that place where the voice shall be heard, "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His bride hath made herself ready."

I HALT.

I dare not advance a step farther. I bring you to the margin of this blessed ocean of infinite delight. Oh! for a plunge into it—into the Godhead's deepest sea of love. Is there a more intimate relation into which our Lord Jesus Christ shall hereafter take his beloved people whereby we shall be forever united to him? Shall we know the fulness of His love in a communion of which it were not lawful for a man to speak? Was this one of the unspeakable words which Paul heard when he was caught up into Paradise? Can it be that this marriage scene is the last act of the new creation, as it was of the old creation, when the Lord God found and formed a helpmeet for Adam? "This is a great mystery. I speak concerning Christ and the church."

Till the day break and the shadows flee away, let us wait for the Bridegroom's appearing, and the home-bringing of the bride. As virgins that look forward to the marriage day let us keep our lamps trimmed, and see to it that there is oil in our vessels, lest when the cry is heard, "The Bridegroom cometh," any of us should need to nurse the dimly-burning spark, or despairingly cry, "Our lamps are gone out." Let us all be ready that we may go in through the gates into the city.

Some of you, alas! are not able to feel the joy which this subject excites in our breasts. You cannot take delight in the throne of God and of the Lamb. God grant you may. Come, now, to the throne of grace with open confession and secret contrition. It is the throne of God, who knows the nature of your sin: it is the throne of the Lamb, who bore the penalty of sin, and can put it away. Come to the throne of the Lamb that was slain. I entreat you to come now. So shall you find peace and reconciliation, and you shall be made meet to enter into the joy of your Lord. I pray God to bless this whole congregation, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

By a London Clergyman.

PRIVATE SHORT.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

THE first time Charlie Short donned his soldier's red coat was a red-letter day in his history. Though he had always prided himself on being a man every inch of him, he could not help secretly feeling, as he smoothed out the creases and tightened his belt, that he was now more of a man than ever. He would not have been surprised had he discovered that former measurements of his height were below the present mark by a clear inch.

For the first five minutes indeed he seemed to feel himself growing. Not that he was a short man by any means, except in name. He could boast of six feet all but two inches, and was as well-made a young fellow as you would meet in a long day's march.

Ah! that was a proud moment when his friends turned him round and round, viewed him from top to toe, and finally decided that he was born for a soldier if ever man was.

When he had accepted the Queen's shilling it was with many misgivings of heart. What would his old mother say? Would Jenny, his sweetheart, take it much to heart? Wouldn't the village folks call him a fool?

If such thoughts had crowded into his mind when the recruiting sergeant was "talking him over," judge how they must have redoubled their violence after the Queen's shilling had passed. Indeed he was near tossing it back, and running away at the top of his speed. He stood his ground, however, wretched and miserable though he was.

How they did weep, both of them! They clung around his knees; they pleaded with him; they grew angry; they tried to laugh him out of it. Indeed, all the arts and stratagems that Charlie's mother and sweetheart lavished on him it would be hard to recount. But he stood firm, and having made up his mind, stuck to it with great determination.

How triumphant he must have afterward felt when, among a little group who inspected every strap, buckle, and button of his soldier's coat, none were more interested, and none more admiring, than the two who stormed so much at first. Charlie's mother and sweetheart could not deny that he looked well in his soldier's uniform, and that it set him off splendidly; and, indeed, were obliged to confess that it mightily improved him.

Of course after a time Charlie Short got accustomed to his new toggery, and thought no more of it than he did of the old clothes in which he used to follow the plough. Standing in the midst of an admiring crowd of village friends, and mingling among men who could boast of as red a coat and of as bright buttons as his own, were two very different things. But none the less, at first, did the hearts of both Charlie and his friends proudly swell and flutter.

When Charlie Short left his native village to join his regiment, great and general were the regrets of his neighbors, young and old. No one was such a favorite as Charlie.

Whatever it was which made Charlie Short such a favorite in his village, worked also in his favor in the regiment. He was a general favorite there too. Perhaps it was his good nature—his readiness to do anybody a good turn—his bright and laughing disposition. I know not. I do not think it would occur to any one to ask the reason, unless they were going to put a little bit of his life in print; so I suppose I must leave the matter unexplained, and be content with merely relating the fact. But sure it was that Charlie Short was more sought after than any man in the regiment.

The pints of beer he might have drunk every day without the payment of a single copper of his own were almost past counting. There was not a public house in the town in which they were stationed that he did not know the inside of—more's the pity—though he was no drinker from choice. As a matter of fact, when in his own native village he kept well out of the public house, and had the character for being a steady man; but, somehow or other, now, try as he might, he could not escape it. He was so good-natured, and so fearful of hurting the feelings of his comrades, that it seemed ungrateful to refuse to drink with them. The consequence of all this was, that before he was fully aware of it he had become a pretty hard drinker.

The way he awoke to the fact was this. Before he had been very long in the service he was rewarded with a stripe for good conduct, and had kept it, until one day, being in rather a stupid condition, he committed some breach of discipline, and so had it taken from him. It was the disgrace attendant on this that first showed him what a fool he was.

For some time after this he kept steady. He set his face firmly against the well-meant, but really cruel, invitations of his comrades, only accepting one or two now and then. And so long as the sting of his disgrace was fresh, he found it comparatively easy to shake off his tempters. But after a bit it faded away, and was well-nigh forgotten. Then the real struggle commenced, and then it was he discovered that whatever form temptation assumes, it is terribly difficult to meet and overcome.

One great snare of Charlie's was his possession of a good voice, and more than one publican in the town had actually offered him money to sit in his parlor and sing a certain number of songs in the evening. Now a good voice being a comparatively rare gift, we cannot wonder that Charlie was ever eager to display it.

A man must be made of much sterner stuff than Charlie Short not to feel considerably elated at the rapt attention with which he was listened to, and the thundering applause which followed each and all of his songs. I believe his comrades would have listened all night to him if he could have lasted out for that time.

Of course beer-drinking in no wise tended to improve Charlie's voice, and it is only fair to say that by the time the men had to turn into barracks his voice was as shaky and unsteady as its owner's legs. But what mattered that to ears which had also become so affected that at length the most discordant noise would be as musical as the notes of the best singer that ever opened his lips? It mattered not a bit.

The result of all this dissipation can well be understood. How can a man with an affected brain keep himself out of mischief? It is difficult enough to keep the tongue quiet when he is steady; and how a man can hope to keep his actions in order when the drink has got him under and mastered him, I never could and never shall understand. Indeed, from what is continually going on under one's very eyes, we may well say it is more easily talked about than done. And so Charlie Short found; for now he was continually getting into disgrace from this very source, and was daily sinking lower and lower.

One winter evening, while Charlie Short was, as usual, in one of the public-house parlors, a sergeant of his company might have been seen reading a letter, and after having read it through once, reading it as carefully through again. Let us steal a glance over his shoulder and read it with him:

"DEAR SERGEANT WILMOT:

"I am informed by Mrs. Short, one of my parishioners, that her son is in your company, and that you have both the will and the power, if asked, to look after him. Mrs. Short has heard that her son is giving way to bad habits, and has asked me to intercede with you, as she cannot write herself. The poor mother is well-nigh broken-hearted, and can scarcely lift her head from shame. Short is engaged to a most respectable young woman in the village, who joins with the mother in entreating your help. May I ask you, as a fellow-servant of our Master in heaven, that you will kindly do what you can to rescue the poor lad?

"I remain,

"Yours very truly,

"JOHN TENNINGTON, Rector."

When Sergeant Wilmot had finished reading this letter he carefully folded it up and laid it down, with a look of great thoughtfulness in his face. His mind was carrying him back to his younger days and his old mother.

"Ah!" he said to himself with a deep sigh, "I was one of those precious fools once, and quite broke my mother's heart. God forgive me. I never thought she'd have took on like that, because I was a bit fast. I thought what I used to hear about her was all put on. But when I got that letter with its black border and strange handwriting, and found that my mother was dead, and that she died of fretting about me, I found out then that it wasn't put on at all. God forgive me.

"And she died praying for me, they told me. 'God save my boy; God save his soul,' were her last words. I wasn't out of her thoughts a minute, they said. Ah! how that did go home to my wicked heart! I tried to picture my dead mother in her coffin; and as I looked in imagination on her poor white face, didn't I pray? didn't I resolve? Thank the Lord for it. I never went into a public house after that. I've been very near though; but just as one of these feet was nigh inside I seemed to hear my mother's voice saying, 'God save my boy; God save his soul.' Could I go in with that prayer ringing in my ears? Thank God, He has saved my soul. I know He has. He gave His blessed Son for me, and I put my whole trust in Him. He don't want anything more than that.

"Save the boy! I'll do what I can. But I'm precious sure of this, if his soul ain't saved his body won't be. What strength will he have if he don't know the Lord? And if anybody wants strength it's Him as fights with the drink, I know. If I try, I try for his soul, that's what I try for."

Getting out some writing paper, Sergeant Wilmot wrote a short letter to the rector of the parish, promising to do all that he could for the young man Short.

An Unmistakable Answer to Prayer is Described by Dr. R. L. Stanton in a letter to a contemporary in response to a challenge to produce one well-authenticated case of a disease healed through faith and prayer. Dr. Stanton from among many cases within his knowledge selects one which is beyond the possibility of cavil. A lady whose acquaintance he made during his recent visit to London was suffering from a tumor beyond the reach of surgical skill, and also from cancer in the breast, which had eaten into her lung. It was a matter of certainty that either affliction would soon kill her.

"The lady's attention had been called to certain cases of 'healing by prayer.' She read, examined, and prayed for light. At length light came. One night, after retiring to bed, a violent discharge of blood caused by the cancer led her to think that death was at hand. Believing that death would come at any moment, and impressed with God's power and willingness to heal in answer to the prayer of faith, she offered prayer for herself substantially as follows: that if it were God's will that she should then die, she could say, 'Thy will, O God, be done;' but if it were for His glory that she should be restored to health and spared a few years longer to aid her husband still further in his work (which she greatly preferred), then she prayed God to restore her immediately and relieve her sufferings, if that were His will, and to manifest His power in such a way as to show her that the healing was directly from God.

"Immediately upon the utterance of this prayer the profusely running hemorrhage ceased, and the pain from both tumor and cancer at once ceased; she felt entirely healed, and she slept quietly during the remainder of the night. In the morning she arose, dressed herself, went down stairs, her strength returned, she felt she was well, and has remained so ever since, neither the cancer nor tumor giving her any more trouble. Both have entirely disappeared. It is now some three years since this cure was effected, and no means were used for it but the lady's prayer for herself, and prayers of sympathizing friends."

The lady is the wife of an eminent author whose works are well known on both sides the Atlantic, and the facts of her illness and cure are authenticated by a wide circle of friends.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK,

January 28, 1881.

The Weather—The Claims of the Blanketless—Mr. Seney's Gift—Ante-Mortem Monument of Books—The use of Books—Not Superseded by the Newspaper—Senator Making — Quality of the Timber Deteriorating—Events Regulating Themselves—A Drunken Wife—"I Can't Help It"—God Helps to Help—Perpendicular and Horizontal Help.

THE weather, a topic of conversation all the year round, more especially when people must say something, and have nothing else to say, this week has proved itself a worthy theme. Did you ever hear winds whistle louder or feel the cold more benumbing? The world seems frozen over to-night. The car-driver and drayman thresh their arms around them to keep their fingers warm, the pedestrian puts into the first harbor of a warm store, new inventions to keep ears and hands and feet in living temperature are called for, and coming to church to-night is an Arctic expedition that suggests the sufferings of Schwatka and John Franklin.

It was a pertinent question which David the psalmist asked: "Who can stand before His cold?" Thankful for shelter and wardrobe and fuel, let us not forget the blanketless and unsheltered poor. If you have a surplus of apparel out of fashion, now is the time to send it on mission of mercy. He who apparels the poor apparels Him who said: "I was naked and ye clothed me; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

Although there is less suffering this winter than for many winters, because the most of those who are disposed to earn wages receive them; still there is a stupendous suffering all up and down the world. The groan of destitution steals out on the sharp night toward God. Mystery of mysteries, and mystery for ages unexplained: why the world with its burden of anguish should be permitted to go on.

People are horrified at the very suggestion of the end of the world; but if some day it should be run down, as the Loch Earn ran down the Ville de Havre, and the inhabitants were taken off on some other craft of a world, would it not be something for astronomical congratulation? For you and me it is a comfortable world; but for multitudes it is a sweltering in the heat, or a freezing in the cold, or a struggle against disadvantages. I think the world had better after a while be burned up and swept off to make room for improved stellar architecture. So much for the weather and the event of the week atmospheric.

EVENT LITERARY:

Fifty thousand dollars given by Mr. Seney toward the Historical Society Library of this city. I saw the check that night at a reception—a plain check, less ornate than many a draft for twenty dollars, but its signature marked an epoch in the history of Brooklyn.

How much more illustrious such a deed than the bequeathal of fifty thousand dollars in a last will and testament! Men sometimes give their money away because they have to give it up anyhow. They take it as far along with them as possible, and would take it clear through the eternal gates if they could, and sit down on it in heaven; but they find no conveniences for transportation of bullion across the Styx, and so in the last moment they throw it at a Bible society or a historical library, saying: "Catch this and put me down as one of your almoners." But here is a man in health and prosperity who hands over a magnificent donation, not because he is compelled to leave it, but because he wants to help a grand institution. Post-mortem beneficence is well, but ante-mortem beneficence is better.

What a monument a man builds to himself when he builds it in books, builds it in the intellectual and moral improvement of his city, builds it while he lives, so he can read its inscription not "Here is entombed a man born at such a time and died at another time; peace to his ashes;" but, "Here lives a man who loved his city and loved humankind and loved his God, and here he will live as long as the world lives; peace to his great living soul."

A contribution to a public library is especially gracious at this time. Book-reading needs to be fostered. Everything in this day goes to newspapers. There are men who read three or four newspapers a day who do not read one book in two years. By all means, read the daily and weekly newspapers. Without neswpaper-reading you cannot be intelligent and you cannot be useful; but you also need consecutive reading of books—books of history, books of science, books of travel, books of art, books of essay, books of poetry. You ought to have one book all the time occupying your spare hours. It ought to be on the stand, or on the counting-desk, or on your dressing-case, and every day you ought to dip into it. You want consecutive knowledge, elaborated information, wide sweeping views such as you can get only from books.

He who, like the benefactor of this week, blesses a public library, blesses all classes of people and blesses them for both worlds. No man can tell what the Mercantile Library has done for Brooklyn. Its work has been silent, but all-pervasive, tremendous; and now it is to be augmented, not rivalled, in this other library. The more such institutions you build, the more those already built will be prospered. The more people read, the more they will want to read. Make the appetite of a city voracious for literature, and all the books of all your libraries will not be able to satiate it. Solomon said in lamentation what we quote in gratitude: "Of making many books there is no end." So much for the event of the week literary.

EVENTS POLITICAL:

Almost all the legislatures this week have been busy making Senators. In many cases we are surprised as to how little and poor timber is necessary to make a Senator. The nation used to make Senators out of stout, tall oaks. Now many of them are made out of willow, and others out of crooked sticks. In most cases the strong men defeat each other and a substitute with no especial record is put in.

Politics is getting more and more a trade, and candidates are exchanged for other candidates as easily as in the village grocery a basket of eggs is exchanged for a bar of soap. The next Senate and House of Representatives will have in them more commonplace men than any Congress ever assembled. Many of the strongest men will be left at home, and their places will be occupied by accidents.

Still we are sure we are now sailing in smooth waters, and all the sections are so sick of quarrelling that we do not need as much skilful pilotage as before. It will require an almost impossible blundering to get us into national trouble. We all remember within twenty years when we needed a man as wise as Washington in the Presidential chair, as financially acute as Hamilton in the Treasury Department, and as diplomatically wise as John Adams to represent us at the Court of St. James; but to do the work of this nation for the next twelve years we do not need anything very remarkable.

Events under God are regulating themselves. It needed an Alexander to mount a Bucephalus, but almost anybody can drive a tame roadster. Still, for any emergency that may possibly arise, we shall have mighty men in the Senate and House of Representatives, some from the North and some from the South.

Among the great leaders of the South, not so well known to you, is Senator Brown of Georgia, with whom I happen to have personal acquaintance. He has already, this winter, in Congress, spoken a potent word on national education, a subject on which he had a right to speak—only a few months ago having given out of his private purse forty thousand dollars to a Baptist college, and by his speeches and interviews showing that he is in favor of letting bygones be bygones, and his desire is for the complete obliteration of all sectional differences in one grand movement for the financial, educational, and moral welfare of the whole nation. I wish General Garfield would invite him into his cabinet, although I suppose he would decline the honor, for there is no better place on earth for a man to do great things for God and his country than the American Senate. Whoever the State legislatures may decide upon for the remaining vacancies in the United States Senate, we are sure already of having the ship of state well manned, keen eyes on the lookout, and strong arms at the helm. So much for the events of the week political.

EVENT REFORMATORY:

As powerful a temperance lecture as has made was delivered yesterday in a New Yo. room, when husband and wife and child caressing each other. The husband had ha wife arrested for habitual drunkenness. She sober after the night's imprisonment. When magistrate chided her for her habits, she plied: "Judge, I'll drink till I die; I can't l it." If more misery and horror and despair a domestic desolation were ever compressed into on sentence, I have not seen it.

I suppose the same thing, with greater or less intensity, is going on now in many a household; but this spectacle in the New York court-room ought to startle all domestic circles where intoxicating beverages are freely used. Drunkenness runs its ploughshare through the brightest home; turning under child's cradle and furrowing out the new-made grave. I suppose the woman told the literal truth when she said, "I can't help it;" but, thank God, what human resolution cannot achieve, divine grace again and again and again has accomplished. Some of the holiest men on earth and some of the brightest saints in heaven were once confirmed inebriates; but God took their cases in hand and they were extricated. God can save one kind of sinner as easily as another kind of sinner.

I do not know that drunkenness is any worse in God's sight than avarice, or pride, or a hundred other things which men are guilty of and yet preserve their respectability. Drunkenness is worse in the eyes of society than these other things; but God judgeth the heart, and He can sweep one sin out of the heart as easily as another sin. If, therefore, you have to say, in regard to any bad habit, as the arrested woman said yesterday, "I can't help it," remember that God can and will help you to help it.

When a man, struggling with evil habit, slips and slides and falls and gets up again, and slips and slides and falls and gets up the second time, and the tenth time, and the hundredth time, society and the Church lose their patience with him, and practically say, "He is incorrigible, and I can't bother with him any longer;" but God holds on to him, and will listen to the thousandth call of distress and sympathy with such alertness and sympathy as to the first call.

Let all the discouraged stop looking down and looking around, and begin to look up. Horizontal help will not come, but perpendicular help will come. God will absolve and quit and exculpate and pass over and forget and remit and reconcile and alleviate and throw behind His back, and cast into oblivion, and reprieve and atone and pity and sympathize and warn and console and commiserate and abundantly pardon, and what more do you want? All that for those who with rain of repentant tears cry unto God for relief, saying, "I can't help it!"

Three Harmonium Players were Among the miners who lost their lives in the colliery explosion at Seaham, England, on September 8th, 1880. One was a man of decided piety, an active member of the Wesleyan Church. Another had been a member, but had gone back to the world, though he was under deep concern just prior to the catastrophe. The other was a young man who had played the harmonium at the chapel on the last night of his life. After leaving the chapel he went home to get ready for the pit. His mother asked him what solo Mr. Cawood had sung. 'Almost Persuaded,' said he. Then sitting down he played it over for her; after this he sang a verse of 'Safe in the Arms of Jesus,' and said, 'Mother, I am now safe in the arms of Jesus.' These were nearly his last words before he left home, to come back no more."

A Disappearance.

WHILE I was writing my letter Mr. Stanley entered, carrying a bouquet of beautiful flowers, which he handed to me, as I supposed, for Evelyn's sick-room.

"They are very lovely!" I said; "Evelyn will charmed, she is so fond of flowers; I will put in water and take them up-stairs to her. She ter to-day, Mr. Stanley."

"I am glad of that," he said; "the fever soon sses away if care is taken. But I gathered these owers for you—if you will have them."

"Thank you, very much indeed," I said; "I did not know they were for me; it was very good of you."

"I am so glad you like them," he said; "I could see you were fond of flowers the other day on the Mount of Olives. I must be going now; will you tell Sir William I will meet you at the Jaffa Gate at four o'clock? There are several people I must see to-day about various things, so I am afraid I must leave you all to your own devices until evening. Good-by; take care of yourself; I don't want you to have fever."

He was half way to the door when he turned back again.

"There is a little piece of paper here, in the middle of the flowers," he said; "that is for you—for no one else, remember. The verses are only written in pencil; I don't know whether you will be able to make them out. They are only about the flowers," he added, smiling; "you will not be angry, will you?"

"Oh, no," I said; and he was gone.

I put the paper, which I found among the ferns, in my pocket, for a minute afterward Sir William entered the room. I gave him Mr. Stanley's message, and he admired the flowers, and rang the bell for water that I might arrange them before they withered. I did not tell him that they were for me.

After breakfast Sir William asked me to read aloud to him the leading articles in a copy of the Times which had arrived by the mail that morning, and so it was some time before I could find an opportunity to look at my paper.

I opened it at last, as soon as I was alone, and read it more than once:

THE FLOWER'S MESSAGE.

We grew upon the very hills
Where Jesus used to stand;
We blossomed on the lonely paths
Of God's once Holy Land.

Now, filled with misery and sin,
Defiled by guilt and shame,
And trampled under foot by those
Of every creed and name.

O pray, then, for Jerusalem,
The city of our birth;
O shed a tear for her who was
The joy of all the earth.

The ancient promise holdeth good,
It hath not been reversed—
"Blessed is he who blesseth thee,
And he who hates is cursed."

So we from the Judean hills,
This simple message bring—
"O pray for poor Jerusalem,
The city of the King."

For M. L., from her friend, Howard Stanley.

I looked forward very much to that evening ride, and four o'clock seemed as if it would never come.

At last the horses arrived, and Sir William, Evelyn, and I mounted and rode to the Jaffa Gate.

Mr. Stanley had not come, but Miss Schwarz was there, waiting for us. We had been introduced to her the day before, so she came at once and spoke to us, and we rode up and down together, looking from time to time at the gate to see if Mr. Stanley were coming.

"It is very extraordinary," said Sir William, "that he should be late! We have always found him such a very punctual man. Are you sure he said four o'clock, Miss Lindsay?"

"Oh, yes," I said, "quite sure; 'Four o'clock at the Jaffa Gate,' that was what he said."

"Yes, he told me to be here at four o'clock," said Miss Schwarz; "he will come in a few minutes, I should think; shall we ride toward 'the big tree,' as we always call it? It is not really a very large tree; but, you see, we have no trees that deserve the name in Jerusalem, so it looks very big to us. It is only a little way, and Mr. Stanley will see us there, and we shall get some shade."

"Very well," said Sir William; "you had better go there; I want you to keep out of the sun as much as possible, Evelyn, and I will wait at this corner and catch Mr. Stanley as he comes through the gate."

So we rode down to the big tree, and Miss Schwarz told us how she used to come and play there with her little friends when she was a child, and how beautiful and green she thought it till she had been to Germany, and had seen the trees in Europe.

We found Miss Schwarz a very pleasant companion, and the first few minutes passed away quite happily; but as time went on we began to wonder very much why Mr. Stanley did not appear.

After about half an hour Sir William came slowly down the road to meet us.

"I cannot see him," he said; "it is very strange! He must have forgotten it! I think I will go as far as the Latin Convent and inquire for him."

"I do not think he would forget it," I said.

"Oh, I don't know;" said Sir William; "young men often have short memories, and you said he was going to visit various friends this morning. I will just go and inquire for him. Will you ride up and down till I come back? I shall not be long."

It was, however, some time before Sir William reappeared at the Jaffa Gate, and then he was alone; Mr. Stanley was not with him.

"Well, papa," said Evelyn, "did you find our runaway dragoman?"

Sir William looked grave and perplexed. My heart beat very fast, for I felt sure that something was the matter.

"I can't make it out," he said; "he has gone to Jaffa!"

"Gone to Jaffa!" we all exclaimed together.

"Yes," he said, "the porter tells me he took a horse early this morning; it must have been soon after you saw him, Miss Lindsay, about ten o'clock the man said, and he went down to Jaffa. The porter thinks he was going back to England. I can't understand it; it is very strange."

"What can be the matter?" Evelyn said.

"I cannot imagine," said Sir William; "I think he might have let us know. The porter said he did not even take his luggage, but left it to be sent after him by the next steamer. It seems there is a steamer that leaves Jaffa for Alexandria to-night, and I suppose he wanted to catch that."

"Did not the man know why he left in such a hurry?" Evelyn asked.

"No, he did not seem to know. I asked him if a telegram had arrived for Mr. Stanley, and he said he did not think so: he had not taken one in; but the man talked such extraordinary French that I could not understand him very well. I wonder Stanley did not let us know he was going; it was very thoughtless of him."

"Perhaps he will write from Jaffa," Evelyn suggested.

"Well, I hope so," said Sir William; "but I think he might have let us known before this afternoon, and not have kept us waiting here in the sun. I gave him credit for more thoughtfulness. It is a very strange thing; I do not like it at all. Well, what are we to do? Miss Schwarz, we ought not to keep you standing here; will it be too late to go to the tomb?"

"Oh, no," she said, "not at all; it is quite a short ride; we shall be back long before sunset. Shall we go at once?"

"Yes, I think, perhaps, we had better go," said Sir William with some hesitation.

"You can talk Arabic, I suppose, Miss Schwarz, in case we need an interpreter."

"Oh, yes," she said, laughing, "as well as an Arab. I could talk Arabic before I could talk German."

So we set off for the tomb. But we were none of us in very good spirits. Sir William was complaining all the way of Mr. Stanley's bad behavior to us, and Evelyn was defending him to the best of her power, and assuring her father that there was certain to be a letter from Jaffa.

I am afraid that Miss Schwarz must have thought us very dull and uninteresting people. She was an exceedingly nice girl, just my own age, and, at any other time, I should so much have enjoyed my ride with her. But that afternoon I could not tell what was the matter with me, but it was an effort to talk.

I roused myself, once or twice, to take an interest in the places and the people that we were passing on the green Bethlehem plain; but I found it very difficult; my thoughts seemed to be far away. I was ashamed of myself, and struggled against it, and asked Miss Schwarz many questions about the place to which we were going, and she took great pains to explain everything to us, and to make our ride pleasant and interesting to us. I hope she did not think us ungrateful.

We went for some distance along the road to Bethlehem, and then we turned up among the mountains. It was a very wild, rough road, indeed after a time we had no road at all, but had to cross over ploughed fields and the shingle-covered hillsides. The view was splendid; a valley was beneath us, quite surrounded by hills, on the sides of which we could see the remains of many of the ancient terraces.

It must, indeed, have been a lovely place when it was planted with trees; but the bare, sandy heights were very tiring to the eye, and had it not been for a few patches of green, and the scarlet anemones and yellow Bethlehem stars which were peeping up between the stones, the hillsides would have been very uninteresting and monotonous. In the distance we could see the blue waters of the Dead Sea, and the white limestone mountains of Quarantania.

At last we reached a place where there were many ruins, the remains of an ancient village; there were several old wells, and stones with crosses carved upon them, which showed that they dated back to the times of the Crusaders. We passed through these ruins, and Miss Schwarz took us to the side of the hill, where the newly-discovered tomb was to be found.

It seems that the Arabs, living in a village near, were ploughing on the hillside, and one of them moved a large stone out of the way of his plough. To his astonishment he saw that the stone had covered a deep, dark hole; he went down into this hole and found himself in a stone chamber, the masonry of which was quite perfect. Another entrance had been afterward made into the tomb, and through this Miss Schwarz led us.

She told us that her father thinks it was a burying-place for Christians in the fifth or sixth century, so it is not very old compared with most of the places in Jerusalem, but it is most curious and interesting. There are five stone steps leading down to the door of the tomb, and the door itself is made of one block of stone, and is still on its hinges, and moves backward and forward most easily.

All round the chamber were places cut out of the stone for the coffins to lie in—there were twelve out of these in the principal room, but two other smaller chambers, leading out of the first one, contained more graves; these, however, had not been fully opened out when we were there. A large stone was at the mouth of each grave when it was discovered, and the Arabs had torn these away with the greatest haste, hoping to find some treasure buried with the dead. But though they opened every grave, they found inside nothing but dust.

We were just peeping into one of the farther chambers, and trying to count the number of graves in it, when we heard a great noise outside—shouting and yelling and jabbering, and, to our great alarm and dismay, a number of Arabs rushed into the tomb, shaking their fists at us, and screaming at the top of their voices. Sir William was very much agitated and frightened, for it was a wild and lonely place, far out of the reach of any European building or any public road.

We scrambled out as quickly as we could, followed closely by the Arabs. Miss Schwarz was haranguing them in Arabic, but as we could not understand either what they were saying to her or she was saying to them, we were very much alarmed indeed, and felt sure that they intended to rob us, or even to murder us.

When we came out of the tomb we were still more terrified, for we saw that some of the Arabs had seized our horses, which we had tied to a tree near, and were preparing to lead them away.

"Oh, dear, I wish we had never come!" said Sir William. "What shall we do? If I could only talk to these fellows! Don't be frightened, Evelyn, darling. What do they want, Miss Schwarz? What do you think had better be done?"

PREACHING OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

S. S. Lesson for February 13th, Luke 3:1-22. Golden Text, ver. 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHAT kind of preacher should he make who was filled with the Holy Ghost from his very birth? Who can fancy him sitting down to make a sermon? A man who was one of God's prophets! "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. 1:21). Accordingly, John the Baptist's theological training was conducted immediately by God Himself in the desert; he was the pupil of the Holy Ghost, and God, not man, called him to his office. "There was a man sent from God whose name was John" (John 1:6). "In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar . . . the Word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness." "Sent from God," speaking as moved by the Holy Ghost that Word of God which came to him divinely, no wonder that his preaching emptied Jerusalem to come and hear him, and that all Judea and the region about Jordan came out unto him.

No preaching can carry real lasting power unless the preacher knows in himself, and carries evidence to others, that he is "a man sent from God" unto them. There is much preaching in which the doctrine is sound, the preacher is a converted man, but there is a grievous lack of power, and one feels sadly that he did not bring that message straight out of the sanctuary of God, that he was not "a man sent of God" to preach it, that instead of speaking as he was "moved," lending himself as servant to his message, he has been attempting to master his subject, and has thus robbed it of its power. John had learned in the wilderness the relative position of his message and himself. When his incomparable popularity stirred up the wonder of the ecclesiastical authorities of his day, and the Jews sent priests and Levites to ask him, "Who art thou? . . . what sayest thou of thyself?" After disclaiming to be the Christ, Elijah, or the prophet who was to come, he said, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness." Only a voice, only the humble means of conveying the message of God. Let preachers learn to be "a voice," and only a voice, and the Holy Ghost will have room to move again.

John the Baptist knew well the mission which had been committed to him. He said, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias" (John 1:23). He was making ready for Another of whom he testified, "There standeth One among you, whom ye know not; He it is, who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose" (John 1:26, 27). All his efforts were made to bring men in contact with the coming Saviour, and his life said as much as his words, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30). The Lord Jesus testified of him, "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist" (Matt. 11:11); and yet perhaps there never was a man who more completely ignored himself for His sake whose way he came to prepare.

"And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for [or to] the remission of sins." Matthew and Mark say that he preached "in the wilderness of Judea," which was probably the same as "the country about Jordan." His preaching was authoritative, personal, and powerful; he made every hearer conscious that he must have to do with the message which he brought him whether he would or no. Here was "a man sent from God" who said to every man, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and every hearer must either consciously repent or as consciously refuse to repent. The effect was at once observable, multitudes from Jerusalem, some perhaps half awakened souls, sighing for something of reality in their experience, some superficial ones ready for every novelty, some eager to subject the new preacher to a criticism which they had levelled against all the scribes of their day—went out into the wilderness to hear him.

But they were unprepared for that which they met with; many of them had been accustomed worshippers in the temple and in the synagogues, and had the habit of sitting as people do now with listlessness, or with respectful endurance, or with a spirit of criticism, perhaps in rare cases with some thirst for truth, to the teachings which they heard. But here in the wilderness there was reality, hearts were broken, consciences aroused, and men seemed to forget any presence but that of God, as they poured forth their agonized confessions. As new arrivals came, some of these whose hearts were moved would come and acknowledge wrong done by them years before, and on their return to Jeruaslem would make restitution arousing the inquiry, "What power on earth could induce So-and-so to humble himself in this way?" And when men heard it was the influence of the preacher in the desert they would go out in their turn to hear a man who wrought such wonders; and they would return with another mind, for repentance means simply a change of mind, that a mind turned from God is now turned toward Him, that men have renounced their thoughts and their ways and adopted God's thoughts and His ways which are higher than theirs (Isa. 55:7, 9).

In most revivals of religion the first souls who come under the Spirit's influence are the best, for they come while the movement is unpopular; they have apparently everything to lose, nothing to gain by it, and only an honest, whole-hearted purpose to serve God can make them yield to God's demands and believe in Him against wind and tide. Those who wait to see which way the wind blows, and whether the movement is recognized by such as are highly thought of, these never make noble Christians. Probably many such were among the "multitude that came forth to be baptized of" John, and he met them with the stern solemn words, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."

Many among these multitudes had no other religion than that they were children of Abraham. Jews were they, circumcised, regular in attendance at the accustomed feasts, and they vainly imagined that more could not be expected of them. Just as in our own day, hundreds of thousands add on a religious profession to a life lived in the world and for the world, read the same Bible, and sing from the same hymn-books as God's own true children, attend the same church, often even frequent the Lord's table and satisfy themselves that they belong to an evangelical church, sit under a Gospel ministry, and what more can they want? But John was sent of God to fell to the earth all such pretensions, and he said, "Now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." Like a practised woodman who is commissioned to fell a tree at the roots, he dug away all the soil, all these pretensions, and the root of a living connection with God was wanting.

It may be that in his lonely communings with God in the desert the Lord had opened to him His heart concerning His people Israel, and that He had said, "What could have been done more to My vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? . . . For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah His pleasant plant: and He looked for judgment, but behold oppression righteousness, but behold a cry (Isa. 5:

And it may be that God had revealed to the man who knew nothing of the wo ways, what were the wild grapes whi brought forth, and which we read of misers of ver. 8, the pleasure-seekers o 12, the scoffers of vers. 18, 19, the false t ver. 20, the self-righteous of ver. 21, the dr of vers. 22, 23. And all these wild grapes be found in the vineyard of the house of among those who said, "We have Abraham our father."

John was sent to call men to decision and t reality, to a living union with God, or to a cutting off from Him altogether; he came with the axe of God to carry away dead branches for the fire of God, and he did real work; he was personal in his appeals, and his hearers begun to be personal in the questions which they put to him. "What shall we do then?" His directions were in accordance with his mission as the last teacher under the law, "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise." John's baptism was "for remission of sins," but it does not appear how far his converts obtained a clear sense of pardon. His preaching produced an expectation and suspense; men mused in their hearts whether he was the Christ or not. But John disclaimed most utterly any pretension to be Christ, and said, "I indeed baptize you with water; but One mightier than I cometh the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

The expectation which the Baptist had aroused was not left unsatisfied. "The next day (after bearing this testimony) John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The moment he saw Jesus, John spoke of the taking away of sin. By the power of the Holy Ghost he had been enabled beforehand to arouse and convince sinners; to render them uneasy; to make them see their lives in the light of God, and to drive away from them all false hopes. But then how could they who were sinners by nature cease to sin, and how could they escape the just judgment of God? John's former teaching did not solve these questions; now light broke in, "Behold," and the hearers must look away from themselves, "behold the Lamb of God." They were familiar with the sin offerings, with the laying of the offerer's sin upon the victim, but here was a Victim who should bear the world's sin, for "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

Here then was the expected Christ, and the first question which He dealt with must be sin; but He dealt with it in His own Person and not in ours, bearing our sin "in His own body on the tree") 1 Pet. 2:24). He "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself" (Heb. 9:26). We become partakers of Adam's sin by nature whether we will or no, and we inherit sin from him; "in Adam all die." But Jesus is the second Adam, who includes in Himself all who will by faith come out of themselves and see themselves in Him. As the scapegoat bore away the sins of the children of Israel which were put upon him into "a land not inhabited" (Lev. 16:21, 22), so the Lamb of God beareth away the sins of the world. He has delivered us from the iron grip of the law, "that being dead wherein we were held"—i. e. that "body of sin" (Rom. 6:6) which has been crucified with, or in the body of Christ, we are become dead to the law by the body of Christ (in His Person the body of sin has met with its just reward), "that ye should be married to another, even to Him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God." That which John the Baptist might ineffectually demand, Christ has made a glorious possibility. Let him bring his axe, and if he finds us rooted in Christ he will have no work to do upon us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Government have Introduced their Coercion Bill in the House of Commons. It is called a "Bill for Protecting Life and Property." It enables the Lord Lieutenant to issue a warrant for the arrest of anybody suspected of treasonable designs or of being connected with agrarian outrages. The persons so arrested may be detained persons accused of crime, and a list of all persons imprisoned, with a statement of the reason for arrest, is to be presented to Parliament every week. The powers conferred by the act are to continue in force until the 30th of September next. In other words, the personal liberty of all persons in Ireland is placed in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. It makes no reference to the Habeas Corpus Act, but is virtually a suspension of its operation.

Mr. Forster, the Irish Secretary, in introducing the bill, justified his procedure by a long and detailed description of the outrages which had been committed. He showed that the Land League had a complete system of constables in all the districts, who recorded every infringement of the rules of the League. The result is, he said, that "the Land League is supreme. There is a reign of terror. Those who break the law are safe, while honest men who keep it are in danger. The Land League strikes terror. We must, therefore, strike terror into them. We must arrest these criminals."

The Trial of Mr. Parnell and his Friends ended in the disagreement of the jury after a consultation lasting more than six hours. The presiding judge commenced his charge to the jury on Tuesday, January 25th. In the course of his remarks, he declared that the land laws of Ireland were more favorable to the occupiers and agriculturists than those of Great Britain, Belgium, or the United States. He repudiated both the theory of the defense, that the Land League was chiefly a charitable association, and the contrary theory, that it was a scheme of socialism devised in America. The Americans, he said, were as a nation noble and generous, and no scheme of socialism for the destruction of property in Ireland had been devised by them. At the same time he strongly censured the Irish-American idlers who had returned to Ireland to stir up dissension. The charge was concluded the next day at noon, and after being summoned into court on three separate occasions, the foreman of the jury said that the jurymen were "unanimously of the opinion that they could not agree." It is understood that ten were for acquittal, and two for conviction.

In ordinary cases the course adopted would be to try the defendants again with another jury, but it is thought probable that in this instance the Government will not make another attempt. The issue of the trial has furnished the advocates of coercion with an effective argument. They point to it as a proof that the ordinary powers of the law are insufficient to cope with the present condition of Ireland.

A Sensation of Uneasiness and Apprehension has been produced in England by the announcement that the Government have discovered plots of outrages on Government property. It has been found necessary to guard the great dockyards at Portsmouth and Plymouth and the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich with special care. All barracks are watched night and day, and wherever arms are stored great uneasiness exists. "This alarm is not imaginary," says the London correspondent of the New York World, "for I know that there has been positive information in the hands of the Government to prove that the recent explosion at Salford was only intended to open the campaign. An attack on the barracks at Windsor was undoubtedly planned for one night this week, but the scheme was discovered in time to be frustrated."

The Irish Members of the British House of Commons, aided by the extreme section of the Liberal party, have commenced a course of obstruction which is intended to embarrass the Government, and delay legislation. On Tuesday, January 25th, they made several consecutive motions to adjourn, involving the expenditure of much time in taking divisions. Mr. Biggar, a prominent Home Ruler, was suspended from legislative functions for disrespectful behavior to the speaker, and other members were reprimanded. Notwithstanding this vigorous treatment, continued obstruction was effected, and the House finally adjourned on Wednesday, at noon, having sat for twenty hours.

An interesting feature of the debates has been the attitude of Mr. John Bright, who has for many years been known as an earnest friend of Ireland, and a stout opponent of coercion. Much curiosity was felt about his opinion of the present crisis, and his words have carried more weight than those of any other speaker. He said he deeply regretted that coercion was necessary. If a land bill had not been promised after the Coercion Bill he would not now be in the Ministry. He had received letters from Ireland showing that during the last four months Ireland had been drifting from bad to worse. The Land League might boast of their power, but he doubted their wisdom or patriotism. The leaders of the League had to a large extent demoralized the people, whom they professed to defend. He said the bill was "for the coercion of the few and of mercy to the many."

A Serious Defeat was Inflicted by the Boers in South Africa, on the British forces under the command of Sir George Colley, on January 26th. That General, who was on his way to relieve beleaguered British garrisons, attacked the Boers who occupied a strong position in a pass of the Drankenburg mountains. The attack was successful at first, but the Boers being strongly reinforced, drove the British troops down the hill with severe loss. The Boers fought with determined courage. They captured the colors of the Fifty-eighth regiment, killing two officers in charge of them. The colors were recaptured at the point of the bayonet. About a thousand British soldiers were engaged, of whom nearly two hundred officers and men were killed, and a large number wounded. All the staff and mounted officers were shot down.

The cable report says Sir George Colley's defeat doubtless seals the fate of the beleaguered garrisons, as reinforcements cannot reach them for three weeks. His own position is considered dangerous.

Floods and Hurricanes in Spain are Reported by cable to have ravaged the entire peninsula for ten days. The inundations have destroyed half the crop of oranges and lemons, and an immense loss, estimated at over $40,000,000 to other crops. Towns like Seville, Cordova, and Bruges were flooded, but the loss of life was comparatively slight. The loss to shipping on the coast is supposed to exceed 100 vessels, and the damage done to vessels in the ports of Huelva, Bilbao, Cadiz, Barcelona, and Santander is estimated at several million dollars. The gales and floods have cut off telegraphs and interrupted the lines in the north and northwest of Spain, and have been followed by a snowfall of unprecedented magnitude, in the centre and even in the southern part of the peninsula. Madrid lies under one foot of snow.

The Conditions of Peace Proposed by Chili are now published. They are as follows: The cession of Antofagasta to Chili; the surrender of the allied fleet, and the payment of an indemnity of $30,000,000, whereof Peru shall assume $20,000,000 and Bolivia $10,000,000, Chili to occupy Callao and work the guano deposits and copper and saltpetre mines until full payment of the indemnity is made. It appears that Callao as well as Lima has surrendered to the Chileans.

The Baroness Burdett-Coutts has just Started another work of philanthropy in London. She has opened, in connection with the Flower Girl's Mission, an exhibition of natural and artificial flowers, the object of which is to try and wean the girls from the streets, with their consequent temptations, by employing them regularly, sending them to customers' houses with all kinds of cut flowers (the orders having been previously received), pay them a regular salary, finding them in clothes and teaching them to read and write, together with domestic duties and other important matters.

A Victory Gained by Russian Troops over the Tekkes in North-western Asia, may possibly lead to complications with Great Britain in the future. The Russian General Skobeleff captured the Turcoman fortress of Geok-Tepe on January 24th. The fortifications had been planned by an En general, and were thought to be almost impregn The conquest is regarded as affording Russia a venient basis of operations should she resolve at time to move against British India. Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Health has of occasioned uneasiness. His nervous system broken down, and his medical adviser recomm a visit to Australia, which is regarded as the effectual remedy in Mr. Spurgeon's present c tion. The complete cessation from work, the age, and a few months' residence in the b air of Australia, would, it is devoutly hoped the invalid up for many years of active la Mr. Spurgeon, however, will not hear of lea home, and cannot even be advised to avail self of change of air in his neighborhood.

A Courageous Young Seaman.—A Mission whose work is among British seamen, relates one night at the close of a prayer-meeting a y sailor, who had only a few nights before been verted, came up to him and asked him to wr few words on a card for him. "What sh write?" he asked. "Write this: 'I love Je do you?'" After writing the words, he inq what he was going to do with the card. "A man stopped me a door of the barrack-room, one day, and 'There, I have signed this pledge, and I ho will turn some of the white hairs of my f black, as I have before turned his black white.' I said, 'If that is to be the resul Heaven's sake keep it,' and he did keep it fo months. I met him in a hospital afterward, he said, 'I want you to write to my father an him I have been a teetotaller for five months cause here's his letter. IT is estimated that six thousand people on the Sabbath afternoon of January 9th filed past and looked down into the face of this young lawyer as he lay in the casket in his father's church, the Brooklyn Tabernacle. But few knew how young he was, not twenty-one till next 28th of July. The Mayor, the prominent officials of the city, the judges of courts, the gentlemen of the legal profession, the clergy, the people of all ages and conditions passed in the procession. The twelve officers of the church acted as pall-bearers, in very impressive manner discharging their sad duty.

Mrs. Florence Rice Knox, the celebrated singer, moved all hearts with her pathetic music, and the great audience which packed the church and overflowed into the streets, sang "Jesus lover of my Soul." Rev. Dr. Spear presided, and Rev. Professor Davison, Rev. Messrs. St. John, Wood, Easton, Suydam, and Vanderveer took part in the solemn obsequies. No young man in this country ever received such honors, whether is considered the vastness of the audience, or the sympathies excited.

As he lay with arms folded, he seemed in a pleasant sleep. He had not been wasted with long suffering. A rheumatic trouble had distressed him for some months, but he had been confined to his bed only two days in what was not considered a dangerous disease. At half past ten o'clock on the night of January 6th, the family had retired, except the person in attendance, and at a quarter to eleven, without a second of warning, he expired.

Although only five months licensed, after his graduation from Columbia Law College, he already had large law practice, and had won the wide attention of the public. Judges Neilson, McCue, and Moore, before whom he had appeared as attorney, speak in highest terms of his gentlemanliness, affability, and talent. He had magnetic qualities as a speaker which gave promise of great eminence. The tribute paid him at the funeral by Hon. A. W. Tenney, United States District Attorney, and himself one of the leading orators of the country, will deeply interest our readers.

Hon. Judge Neilson says of young Mr. Talmage: "When he appeared in court before me, his manner, style of speech, evident good taste and culture, gave, I thought, a rich promise of future fellowship." A gentleman high in literary circles says of the departed: "I was one who saw in De Witt greatness of faculty, of fidelity, and of force. His mind was strong, tenacious, true. His powers as a thinker were notable. His promise as an orator who would become a master of men was great."

Dr. Spear said: "There are, my friends, no words at my command, and scarcely any thoughts within the grasp of my understanding, seemingly sufficiently significant to meet the exigencies of this mournful and afflictive occasion. I almost regret, in the light of my own infirmities, that I have been selected to take charge of these funeral solemnities, and I shall not, at this moment, detain you with protracted remarks.

"I invoke from your heads and your hearts a kind, cordial, prayerful, tender sympathy with our beloved brother, Dr. Talmage and his family—from you as a people, from those who may be comparatively strangers here, from all the members of the clerical profession who may be here, and I have no doubt that I shall not invoke this sympathy in vain. Sympathy to him is valuable in this hour of sudden sorrow and appalling grief."

The hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee," was then read, and as the vast congregation, in subdued tones, and with manifest feeling, joined in the appropriate hymn, many silent prayers were offered that the cross the bereaved pastor and his family were bearing might be the means of raising them yet nearer to God.

After the hymn had been sung, the following address was delivered by

REV. DR. DAVISON:

I feel that this is not my proper place. I want to be among the mourners. When Job's friends came to sympathize with him, before they uttered a word, they sat for days with him in the dust, and I have often thought it would have been far better had they never opened their mouths than to say just what they did and when they did. But I cannot refuse the request of this afflicted family to say a word.

I remember the departed as my pupil—a youth of ready wit, bright intellect, cheerful disposition, obliging, always respectful, dutiful, winning the affections of his teacher and his companions. I was called on one occasion to preach for a beloved pastor in this city whose child was then lying at the point of death and was called away before the services were concluded. When we left the church I called to see the pastor, and after a few words of offered sympathy on my part, I was impressed with his reply: "One thing that comforts me is that my Saviour did it, my personal Saviour did it."

And here is our comfort to-day as we look upon the dead. It is not the work of chance. God did it, and not the absolute God, severe, stern, just, but God the Father, loving, kind, and tender. We have had fathers of our flesh who corrected us, and we gave them reverence. How much rather shall we be in subjection to the Father of Spirits and love! Nor is that all. It is God in Christ, God, our Saviour, our personal Saviour who has sent this terrible affliction. There is our comfort, for we hear the voice of Him who said: "I am he that lived and was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and death." Oh what a comfort! Christ holds the keys of the unseen world. Though Heaven's gates stand ajar, the door of death is locked. No man can pass those gates until He who alone holds the keys turns the key and lets him pass through. Christ, our Saviour, did it.

And then, again, I am reminded that this God is the God of the covenant—the God of the covenant, which covenant Christ meant for every penitent, believing sinner. That covenant includes not only believers, but with them their children, and were it not true, as it is, that our departed young friend had his name enrolled upon the church records, and were it not true, at I learn it is true, that by personal assurance he gave great comfort to his friends in the later hours, and although I know that the mere application of water in baptism can never have saved the soul, yet so firm is my faith in the everlasting covenant of God, or rather in the God of the covenant, that I should still expect, if so happy myself as to reach the blessed land, there to see De Witt—not as he used to appear in the class-room or in the family, or in the Law School, or among his clients, but all glorious within and glorious without, clad in the white raiment which is the righteousness of saints, and radiant with the righteousness which is brighter and purer than angel or man ever wrought.

One word more. The God in Christ who did this is a sympathizing Saviour. Though enthroned in glory, He has yet a fellow feeling with our infirmities, and He calls not one of us to endure that which He has not Himself passed through. Oh, how tender and kind, and how loving He was and is this very moment! And He comes very near to this family as He does to us all, so we can hear Him whisper in our ears, "Lean on Me! lean on Me!"

Allow me to read in the words of another what just expresses my own thoughts on this occasion. It is supposed to be Christ Himself whispering to those who are bearing heavy burdens:

> Child of my love, lean hard!
> And let me feel the pressure of thy care.
> I know thy burden, for I fashioned it—
> Poised it in my own hand, and made its weight
> Precisely that which I saw best for thee;
> And when I placed it on thy shrinking form,
> I said "I shall be near, and while she leans
> On me this burden shall be mine, not hers:
> So shall I keep within my circling arms
> The child of my own love." Here lay it down,
> Nor fear to weary Him who made, upholds,
> And guides the universe. Yet closer come:
> Thou art not near enough. Thy care, thyself,
> Lay both on me, that I may feel my child
> Reposing on my heart. Thou lovest me?
> I doubt it not; then, loving me, lean hard!

Prayer was then offered by Rev. Mr. Wood, and was followed by the hymn "Jesus, lover of my Soul," after which the following address was delivered by

REV. DR. SUYDAM:

In common with all of you, I come to bring my tribute of sympathy to this afflicted pastor and his family; but in a peculiar way I come to represent a certain number who may be called friends. And I cannot stand in this presence, and upon this platform where he is accustomed to stand, or look down into his face from this place, without having my mind go far back, a quarter of a century, when together we were students preparing for the Gospel ministry, when we exchanged almost daily visits in our little rooms, when we met together in our classes, and recited to those venerable men of God who taught us and who have now gone to their reward.

The most of the students still survive. They are peculiarly bound together, not only by ties of ordinary acquaintanceship or ordinary friendship, but strongest affection, and although our ways in life have been different, the grand purpose has with us all been one. In our own sphere, with our own peculiar talents, just where God has seen fit to cast our lot, there the light have we sought, and exerted an influence which will tell for good upon the world and for the glory of God who commanded us, and the Christ to whom we have consecrated our lives and all our service.

And we have watched each other with peculiar interest, and being closely united, when one of the members has suffered, all the members of the body have suffered with him. And this, not only in a grief and a trial like this which calls us together on this sad occasion, but in all trials, in all circumstances of affliction where each or any of us has been called upon to bear our peculiar cross.

I represent that coterie of students, now men past middle life, who count almost more of their friends on the other side than on this, and I bring to-day this tribute of friendship from them. Side by side for six years, he who is your pastor and I worked together in the city of Philadelphia, in churches of the same denomination, closely allied in our efforts there to do for our Master, seeing each other almost daily, the doors of my house open to him, and his hospitable home open to me and mine. There the friendship earlier begun was still further cemented, and, therefore, it is with no ordinary feeling that I stand here to-day to represent that large number of friends also in Philadelphia who send greeting with their tears and expressions of sympathy with this afflicted man and his family.

And I come with many of you to cast my handful of violets upon the coffin of the departed. I knew him only as a little child; but I remember his gentle, his simple ways, his sympathetic nature, and I may say, I think, without any assumption whatever, that there was in his early boyhood a peculiar attachment from him toward myself which was also reciprocated. Little De Witt was a favorite as a boy, and I can at this time only recall him as such, and the days and hours when we romped and played together, and it is difficult for me to conceive that he is now the man in professional life. Oh, how difficult it is to me to conceive that he is dead and gone!

Time flies. Great changes are wrought, and we are getting older, and new generations are rising up after us, and those that stood between us and others are being removed, and those that came after us are already stark in death. Hard it is for us to believe it, hard it is for us to realize it.

I come to sympathize with the father and mother over the loss of this first-born son, and the question comes which I cannot answer, "to what purpose is this waste?" Is it a waste, or is there a call coming from the coffin to make even this man who preaches to these thousands Sabbath by Sabbath, and whose words of fire circle the globe —to make him still more earnest, that the remnant of his days may be passed in greater consecration, and his influence may extend in greater ratio while yet God shall continue him to live. So mote it be!

We can come to-day to say what we cannot always do. Physician, take your own medicine. He who stands and gives consolation to so many hearts knows where the source is to which he can apply. He who could stand over the coffin of his gray-headed octogenarian sire, and there preach of the almond-tree in blossom, has strength in this hour of his trial while this staff is taken from him and his first-born is laid in the grave. He gets it from the same source where his sires derived it, which is to be transmitted to generations to come.

Aye, in that blessed Gospel, and there only, shall true strength, real sympathy be obtained. Away with all your cold philosophies, away with your scepticisms and your doubts in such an hour as this. We wish now to stand side by side with Him who stood at the grave of Lazarus, and groaned in spirit, and wept with those who wept, indicating His perfect humanity and His complete sympathy with suffering humanity—at the same time who could stand at the grave and command, "Lazarus, come forth," and the dead bursting the cerements of the grave, could stand forth living. The human in the Christ weeping. The divine in the Christ commanding the dead. Upon this we lean. This is our stay, this is our support, and to this we can condfidently commit this father, this mother, this sister, these brothers and sisters on even such an occasion as this. Aye, blessed Christ that He is, who feels for us in our infirmities. God sends His messenger, and we are disposed to shrink from it.

After all, it is but the messenger of mercy, and though what He does we know not now, we shall know hereafter.

"Who is the angel that cometh?
Death!
But do not shudder and do not fear:
Hold your breath,
For a kingly presence is drawing near,
Cold and bright
Is his flashy steel,
Cold and bright
The smile that comes like a starry light
To calm the terror and grief we feel:
He comes to help and to save and heal:
Then let us, baring our hearts and kneeling,
Sing while we wait this angel's sword.
'Blessed is he that cometh
In the name of the Lord.'"

The poet has only paraphrased the Scriptures. "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Rev. Mr. Easton then read the following

LETTER FROM HON. A. W. TENNEY, United States District Attorney:

BROOKLYN, January 9, 1881.

MY DEAR DR. SPEAR: A wish has been expressed by the near relatives of the deceased that I take some part in these funeral exercises, but my feelings are so intense that I dare not trust myself to speech. And yet I cannot allow my dearly beloved young friend to pass to the tomb without bearing testimony to his great worth and manly character.

Thomas De Witt Talmage, Jr., was my intimate and personal friend. For two years and more our relations have been of a most interesting character. While in the law college and since he entered actively upon his profession I have seen much of him. He was a frequent and always welcome visitor at my house and at my office. We had exchanged confidence, friendship, and love, and here, in this sacred presence, I mourn as one who has lost a son.

I knew his aspirations, his aims, and his desires in life. I knew with what zeal he sought to take an honorable place among his fellow-men. He chose the law for his profession, and his enthusiastic love for his chosen work in life secured for him almost unexampled success from the very start. I have never known a young man to enter my profession with a more lofty purpose than he entered his. I say this, not because we are gathered around his bier to-day, nor because kindly words should be said. I speak it because it is true, and being true it is right and proper that it should be said.

Scarcely six months in his profession, and yet hardly a day without a case in court, and one day, and that quite recently, having eight cases in court. By his ability, his frankness, and gentlemanly bearing he won for himself a place in his profession which will long be remembered by his associates at the bar and the judges upon the bench. He looked upon the law, not as a means of oppression to any one, but rather as a means for securing justice to all alike. He sought success, not by a trick nor by device, but by earning it, by deserving it. He asked not to have his profession elevate him, but he hoped by duties faithfully performed to elevate his profession.

Well do I remember how, in the early autumn of last year, he remarked to me with all the enthusiasm of his young nature, "I have one ambition, and that is to demonstrate to my father that I can not only be a successful lawyer, but an upright man as well, and I hope to live long enough so that father and mother and all my friends may be proud of me." Noble ambition of this noble young man! Providence was kind to him. His wish was granted; his desires all fulfilled. He nobly demonstrated the former. He richly secured the latter.

I desire further to add that in our intimacy, so unreserved as it was, I never heard him use a profane or unclean word. I never heard him speak chidingly or unkindly of any one. His nature was full of loving kindness to all. He carried in his heart charity, not malice. Every impulse of his nature was on the right side. He journeyed amid the flowers of life, and not among its thorns. He had a kind word and a loving smile for all. He was a royal-hearted, noble young man, and his great delight was in helping those who could not help themselves.

But now his voice is hushed, his merry laughter forever silenced, and yet while sadness and shadows fill the hour, it is a blessed thing to know that he is safe. He will appear no more at earthly tribunals. He has passed on to that grand Assize where justice supreme and impartial will reign for evermore. To a just and loving Father we commit his soul, to fond and lingering memory the sweet and fragrant story of his life.

A. W. TENNEY.

Rev. Samuel T. Spear, D.D.

DR. SPEAR said: I find my own name on the list of persons requested to say a word on this occasion, and I shall ask especial hearing of my beloved brother, Dr. Talmage, his wife and children in this sorrowful and mournful hour. I shall address my thoughts especially to their hearing. My dear brother, you are my friend. I am yours. I expect to remain such while I live. I hope to be such in the skies.

My heart, for a special reason, bleeds to-day. It has often bled as it now bleeds. The sorrows that burden your heart are the sorrows that have burdened my heart at times for seventeen long years, and I can speak to you from the experience of profound sympathy.

I had a son, my brother, who had just entered the legal profession. He was two years older than your son, with a bright, brilliant prospect before him. He was smitten with the hand of disease two thousand miles distant from myself, his father, and died in twelve hours, and was dead before I left my home to go to see him. When I got there he was dead. I buried him. I was a week in going and burying my son and in returning. It was the most awful week of my life.

I know how you feel. My comfort then, my comfort now, is not in looking into the coffin, or into the grave. When I saw my son deposited in the grave, I turned to my wife. Said I: "Samuel is not there; we do not bury him; he is up there" (pointing heavenward). Your son is up there. He has gone, not died. He lives! he is not extinct. Saved. Glorified. The grand exposition of life is not in life, but in its sequence. Take the comfort of hope. Lean on Jesus the friend.

Profit by the trials severe. Bear it as well you may, strengthened by the Saviour, and remember this sweet song of the psalmist: "Like as a father pitieth his children, even so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." Oh, how dear the memory of that dead son is to me! What would I not give for the privilege of doing him a favor? Affection—yes, seized upon by inspiration to illustrate God's pity in our behalf.

After the Benediction had been pronounced, the burial took place in Greenwood.

Since the obsequies we have obtained some in regard to the life of young Mr. Talmage. In 1873 he professed to have had a change of heart. Three days before his death, and when he had no idea of dying, he said at the tea-table that he was going to begin anew the Christian life. He felt that he had been worldly, and, in the presence of all the family, solemnly declared his purpose to reconsecrate himself to God.

He said to a prominent lawyer, not long ago, "I am going to spend my life in behalf of the poor and the oppressed." He was fond of discussing religious themes. A characteristic which all his associates noticed, was that he would not silently hear any one spoken against. As full of wit and merriment as any one could be, yet he was easily moved to tears of sympathy.

During revival services last spring young Mr. Talmage expressed to a Christian gentleman his love for Christ and trust in Him. Among some law memoranda, and in lead-pencil writing, with erasures and interlineations, showing the verses to be young Mr. Talmage's own composition, the following stanzas were found by his father while last week looking through his son's papers.

The verses were evidently written on a Sabbath morning, and show that the God to whom he had been solemnly consecrated by his parents in infancy, had wrought upon him by converting grace:

"Jesus! as this day we gather
In Thy holy place of prayer,
Help us each to know Thee better,
And to trust Thy watchful care.

Thou we know all kind and gentle,
Ever smoothing life's rough way,
Bore the cross to save Thy children,
And didst die our debts to pay:

So each Sabbath may it find us
At Thy holy footstool bent,
Till on earth our days are finished,
And to us Thy call is sent."

The Death of Rev. E. A. Washburn, the beloved incumbent of Calvary Church, New York, occurred on Wednesday, February 2d. Dr. Washburn had been suffering from the illness which has now terminated fatally for some months, and he has been incapacitated for ministerial labor since the middle of December. His eminent abilities and high spiritual character endeared him to a wide circle of friends, and his death will be mourned as a personal bereavement, not only by his congregation, but by ministers and Christian people throughout the land.

Dr. Washburn was a native of Boston, Mass. He was born in 1819, and after a course of education in the primary and Latin schools, entered Harvard at the age of sixteen. His early associations were with the Congregationalist denomination, but in 1843, owing to difficulties on the doctrines of Calvinism, he entered the Episcopal Church, laboring first at St. Paul's Church, Newburyport, Mass. After seven years' service there, he went on a tour to Europe and the Holy Land, returning in 1854. He subsequently resided at Hartford, Conn., and at Philadelphia, Pa. The death of the brilliant Dr. Hawks in 1865 caused a vacancy in the pulpit of Calvary Church, which Dr. Washburn was invited to fill. He accepted the invitation, and remained with that church until his death. He was one of the ministers selected on account of their learning to aid in the revision of the Bible, and took a prominent part in the affairs of the Evangelical Alliance. In 1870 he was a member of the American deputation which called upon the Russian Premier, Prince Gortschakoff, and to him, as the representative of the Emperor, presented the famous memorial on behalf of religious liberty.

CHANGES IN HEAVEN.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday, February 6, 1881.

"And I saw a new heaven."—REV. 21 : 1.

The Idea of Heaven in Modern Phrase—Its Atmosphere—Its Architecture—Its Literature—Its Society—Progress in Heaven—I. In Numbers—The Millions of Children There—II. In Knowledge—III. In Its Society—Heaven Gathering in the Good Men of the Ages—IV. In Good Cheer of Announced Victories—The Ships of Light—The Return Freight—The Final Victories—A Lesson of Patience—Of Activity—The Body the Sword's Sheath—Whom Would You See First?—A Message to the Skies—A Day of Emptiness in Heaven—Heaven's Jubilee.

THE stereotyped Heaven does not make adequate impression upon us. We need the old story told in new style in order to arouse our appreciation. I do not suppose that we are compelled to the old phraseology. King James's translators did not exhaust all the good and graphic words in the English dictionary.

I suppose if we should take the idea of Heaven and translate into modern phrase, we would find that its atmosphere is a combination of early June and of the Indian summer in October—a place combining the advantages of city and country; the streets standing for the one, and the twelve manner of fruits for the other—a place of musical entertainments: harpers, pipers, trumpeters, doxologies—a place of wonderful architecture: behold the temples—a place where there may be the higher forms of animal life: the beasts which were on earth beaten and lash-whipped and galled and unblanketed and worked to death, turned out among the white horses which the Book of Revelation describes as being in Heaven—a place of stupendous literature: the books open—a place of aristocratic and democratic attractiveness: the kings standing for the one, all nations for the other—all botanical, pomological, ornithological, arborescent, worshipful beauty and grandeur.

But my idea now is to speak chiefly of the improved Heaven. People sometimes talk of Heaven as though it were an old city finished centuries ago, when I have to tell you that no city on earth, during the last fifty years, has had such changes as Heaven. It is not the same place as when Job and David and Paul wrote of it. For hundreds and hundreds of years it has been going through peaceful revolution, and year by year, and month by month, and hour by hour, and moment by moment, it is changing, and changing for something better. Away back there was only one residence in the universe,

THE RESIDENCE OF THE ALMIGHTY.

Heaven had not yet been started. Immensity was the park all around about this great residence; but God's sympathetic heart after a while overflowed in other creations, and there came all through this vast country of immensity inhabited villages, which grew and enlarged until they joined each other and became one great central metropolis of the universe, streeted, gated, templed, watered, inhabited. One angel went forth with a reed, we are told, and he measured Heaven on one side, and then he went forth and measured Heaven on the other side, and then St. John tried to take the census of that city, and he became so bewildered he gave it up.

I. That brings me to the first thought of the sermon, that Heaven is vastly improved in numbers. Saying little under this head of my discourse, about the multitudes of adults who have gone into glory during the last hundred or five hundred or thousand years—I remember there are fourteen hundred millions of people in the world, and that the vast majority of people die in infancy. How many children must have gone into Heaven during the last five hundred or thousand years!

If New York should gather in one generation a million population, if London should gather in one generation four million population, what a vast increase! But what a mere nothing as compared with the five hundred million, the two thousand million, the "multitude that no man can number," that have gone into that city. Of course, all this takes for granted that every child that dies goes straight into Heaven as ever the light sped from a star, and that is one reason why Heaven will always be fresh and beautiful—the great multitude of children in it. Put five hundred million children in a country, it will be a blessed and lively country. But add to this, if you will, the great multitude of adults who have gone into glory, and how must run up! Many years ago a clergyman stood in a New England pulpit and said that he believed that the vast majority of the race would finally be destroyed, and that not more than one person out of two thousand persons would be finally saved. There happened to be about two thousand people in the village where he preached. Next Sabbath two persons were heard discussing the subject, and wondering which one of the two thousand people in the village would finally reach Heaven, and one thought it would be the minister, and the other thought it was the old deacon.

Well, my friends, I have not much admiration for a life-boat which will go out to a ship sinking with two thousand passengers, and get one off in safety, and let nineteen hundred and ninety-nine go to the bottom. Why Heaven must have been a village when Abel, the first soul from earth, entered it, as compared with the present population of that great city.

II. Again, I remark that Heaven has vastly improved in knowledge. Give a man forty or fifty years to study one science, or all sciences, with all the advantages of laboratories and observatories and philosophic apparatus, he will be a marvel of information. Now, into what intelligence must Heaven mount, angelhood and sainthood, not after studying for forty or fifty years, but for thousands of years—studying God, and the soul, and immortality, and the universe. How the intelligence of that world must sweep on and on, with eyesight farther reaching than telescope, with power of calculation mightier than all human mathematics, with powers of analysis surpassing all chemical laboratory, with speed swifter than telegraphy.

What must Heaven learn; with all these advantages, in a month, in a year, in a century, in a millennium? The difference between the highest university on earth and the smallest class in primary school cannot be a greater difference than Heaven as it is now and Heaven as it once was. Do you not suppose that when Doctor James Simpson went up from the hospitals of Edinburgh into Heaven he knew more than ever the science of health, and that Joseph Henry, graduating from the Smithsonian Institute into Heaven, he awoke into higher realms of philosophy, and that Sir William Hamilton lifted to loftier sphere, understood better the construction of the human intellect, and that John Milton took up higher poetry in the actual presence of things that on earth he had tried to describe. When the first saints entered Heaven they must have studied only the A B C of the full literature of wisdom with which they are now acquainted.

III. Again: Heaven is vastly improved in ITS SOCIETY.

During your memory how many exquisite spirits have gone into it! If you should try to make a list of all the genial, loving, gracious, blessed souls that you have known, it would be a very long list—souls that have gone into glory. Now, do you not suppose they have enriched the society? Have they not improved Heaven?

You tell of what Heaven did for them. Have they done nothing for Heaven? Take all the gracious souls that have gone out of your acquaintanceship, and add to them all the gracious and beautiful souls that for five hundred or a thousand years have gone out of all the cities, and all the villages, and all the countries of this earth into glory, and how the society of Heaven must have been improved! Suppose Paul the Apostle were introduced into your social circle on earth; but Heaven has added all the apostles. Suppose Hannah More and Charlotte Elizabeth were introduced into your social circle on earth; but Heaven has added all the blessed and the gracious and the holy women of the past ages. Suppose that Robert M'Cheyne and John Summerfield should be added to your earthly circle; but Heaven has gathered up all the faithful and earnest ministry of the past. There is not a town, or a city, or a village that has so improved in society in the last hundred years as Heaven has improved.

But you say, "Hasn't Heaven always been perfect?" O! yes; but not in the sense that it cannot be augmented. It has been rolling on in grandeur. Christ has been there, and He never changes, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, glorious then and glorious now, and glorious forever. But I speak now of attractions outside of this, and I have to tell you that no place on earth has improved in society as Heaven has within the last seventy years, for the most of you within forty years, within twenty years, within five years, within one year. In other words, by the accessions from your own household.

If Heaven were

an apostolic group, a patriarchal group, a prophetic group, group of martyrs, group of angels, and then a group of your own glorified kindred, which group would you choose? You might look around and make comparison, but it would not take you long to choose You would say, "Give me back those whom I loved on earth; let me enter into their society, my parents, my children, my brothers, my sisters. We lived together on earth, let us live together in Heaven." O! is it not a blessed thought that Heaven has been improved by its society—this colonization from earth to heaven.

IV. Again I remark, that Heaven has greatly improved in the good cheer of announced victories. Where Heaven rejoiced over one soul, it now rejoices over a hundred or a thousand. In the olden times when the events of human life were scattered over four or five centuries of longevity, and the world moved slowly, there were not so many stirring events to be reported in Heaven; but now, I suppose, all the great events of earth are reported in Heaven.

If there is any truth plainly taught in this Bible it is that Heaven is wrapped up in sympathy with human history, and we look at those inventions of the day—at telegraphy, at swift communication by steam, at all these modern improvements which seem to give one almost omnipresence, and we see only the secular relation; but spirits before the throne look out and see the vast and the eternal relation. While nations rise and fall, while the earth is shaking with revolution, do you not suppose there is arousing intelligence going up to the throne of God? and that the question is often asked before the throne, "What is the news from that world, that world that rebelled, but is coming back to its allegiance?"

If ministering spirits, according to the Bible, are sent forth to minister to those that shall be heirs of Heaven, when they come down to us to bless us, do they not take the news back? Do that come out of the celestial harbor into the earthly harbor laden with cargo of blessing, go back unfreighted? Ministering spirits not only, but our loved ones leaving us take up the tidings. Suppose you were in a far city, and had been there a good while, and you heard that some one had arrived from your native place, some one who had recently seen your family and friends, you would rush up to the man, and you would ask all about the old folks at home. And do you not suppose when your child went up to God, your glorified kindred in Heaven gathered around and asked about you to ascertain as to whether you were getting along well in the struggle of life, to find out whether you were in any especial peril that with swift and mighty wing they might come down to intercept your perils? Oh, yes! Heaven is a greater place for news than it used to be—news sounded through the streets, news ringing from the towers, news heralded from the palace gate. Glad news! Victorious news!

But the vivacity and sprightliness of Heaven will be beyond all conception when come in, when the Church shall be triumphant everywhere. Oh, what a day in Heaven it will be when the last throne of earthly oppression has fallen, when the last chain of serfdom is broken, when the last wound of earthly pain is healed, when the last sinner is pardoned, when the last nation is redeemed! What a time there will be in Heaven!

You and I will be in the procession; you and I will thrum a string in that great orchestra. That will be the greatest day in Heaven since the day when the first block of jaspar was put down for the foundation, and the first hinged pearl swung. If there is a difference between Heaven now and Heaven as it was, Oh, the difference between Heaven as it shall be and Heaven as it is now! Not a splendor stuck fast, but rolling on and rolling on, and rolling up and rolling up forever, forever.

Now, I preach this sermon about the changes in Heaven, about the new improvements in Heaven, for three stout reasons. First, because I find that some of you are impatient to be gone. You are tired of this world, and you want to get into that good land about which you have been thinking, praying, and talking so many years. Now be patient. I could see why you would want to go to an art gallery if some of the best pictures were to be taken away this week or next week; but if some one tells you that there are other beautiful pictures to come—other Kensetts, Raphaels, and Rubens; other masterpieces to be added to the gallery, you would say, "I can afford to wait. The place is improving all the time."

Now I want you to apply the same principle in this matter of reaching Heaven and leaving this world. Not one glory is to be subtracted, but many glories added. Not one angel will be gone, not one hierarch gone, not one of your glorified friends gone. By the long practising the music will be better, the procession will be longer, the rainbow brighter, the coronation grander. Heaven with magnificent addenda! Why will you complain when you are only waiting for something better?

Another reason why I preach in regard to the changes in Heaven, and the new improvements in Heaven, is because I think it will be a consolation to busy and enterprising good people. I see very well that you have not much taste for a Heaven that was all done and finished centuries ago. After you have been active forty or fifty or sixty years, it would be a shock to stop you suddenly and forever; but here is an ever accumulative Heaven, vast enterprise on foot there before the throne of God. Aggressive knowledge, aggressive goodness, aggressive power, aggressive grandeur. You will not have to come and sit down on the banks of the river of life in everlasting inoccupation. O! busy men, I tell you of a Heaven where there is something to do. That is the meaning of the passage, "they rest not day nor night," in the lazy sense of resting.

I preach this sermon on the changes in Heaven and the new improvements in Heaven, also because I want to cure some of you of the delusion that your departed Christian friends have gone into dullness and silence and unconsciousness. They are in a stirring, picturesque, radiant, ever accumulative scene. When they left their bodies, they only got rid of the last hindrance. They are no more in Greenwood, or Laurel Hill, or Mount Auburn than you, in holiday attire, having seated yourself at a banquet, can be said to be in a dark closet where you have left the old apparel that was not fit to wear to the banquet. A soldier cannot use a sword until he has unsheathed it, and the body of your departed was only the sheath of a bright and glittering spirit which God has lifted and is swaying in the Heavenly triumph.

According to what I am telling you at present, your departed Christian friends did not go so much into the company of the martyrs, and the apostles, and the prophets, and the potentates of Heaven as into the company of grandfather and grandmother, and the infant sister that tarried just long enough to absorb your tenderest affection, and all the home circle. When they landed, it was not as you land in Antwerp, or Hamburg, or Havre, wandering up a strange wharf, looking at strange faces, asking for a strange hotel. They landed amid your glorified relatives who were waiting to greet them.

Oh, does not this bring Heaven nearer? Instead of being far off it comes down to-night, and it puts its arms around our necks, and we feel its breath on our faces. It melts the frigid splendor of the conventional Heaven into a domestic scene. It comes very close to us. If we had whom would we first see? Rather than look at the great potentates of Heaven we would meet our loved ones. I want to see Moses and Paul and Joshua; but I would a great deal rather see my father who went away fifteen years ago. I want to see the great Bible heroines, Deborah and Hannah and Abigail; but I would rather see my mother, I would rather see my boy whom you carried out four weeks ago than to see the archangel.

I do not think it was superstitious when on Wednesday night I stood by a deathbed within a few blocks of this church, and on this street, and saw one of the aged Christians of this church going into glory. After I had prayed with her, I said to her: "We have all loved you very much, and will always cherish your memory in the Christian Church. You will see my son before I see him, and I wish you would give him our love." She said, "I will, I will;" and in twenty minutes she was in Heaven. The last words she ever spoke. It was

A SWIFT MESSAGE TO THE SKIES.

If you had your choice between riding in a heavenly chariot and occupying the grandest palace in Heaven, and sitting on the throne next highest to the throne of God, and not seeing your departed loved ones, and on the other hand, dwelling in the humblest place in Heaven, without crown or throne, and without garland, and without sceptre, yet having your loved ones around you, you would choose the latter.

I say these things because I want you to know it is a domestic Heaven, and consequently it is all the time improving. Every one that goes up makes it a brighter place, and the attractions are increasing month by month and day by day, and Heaven so vastly more of a Heaven, a thousand times more of a Heaven than it used to be, will be a better Heaven yet. Oh, I say this to intensify your anticipation!

I ENTER HEAVEN

one day. It is almost empty. I enter the temples of worship, and there are no worshippers. I walk down the street, and there are no passengers. I go into the orchestra, and I find the instruments are suspended in the baronial halls of Heaven, and the great organs of eternity, with multitudinous banks of keys, are closed. But I see a shining one at the gate as though he were standing on guard, and I say: "Sentinel, what does this mean? I thought Heaven was a populous city. Has there been some great plague sweeping off the population?" "Have you not heard the news?" says the sentinel. "There is a world burning, there is a great conflagration out yonder, and all Heaven has gone out to look at the conflagration and take the victims out of the ruins.

"This is the day for which all other days are made. This is the Judgment! This morning all the chariots and the cavalry, and the mounted infantry rumbled and galloped down the sky." After I had listened to the sentinel, I looked off over the battlements and I saw that the fields of air were bright with a blazing world. I said, "Yes, yes; this must be the Judgment;" and while I stood there I heard the rumbling of wheels and the clattering of hoofs, and the roaring of many voices, and then I saw the coronets and plumes and banners, and I saw that all Heaven was coming back again—coming to the wall, coming to the gate, and the multitude that went off in the morning was augmented by a vast multitude caught up alive from the earth, and a vast multitude of the resurrected bodies of the Christian dead, leaving the cemeteries and the abbeys and the mausoleums and the graveyards of the earth empty.

Procession moving in through the gates. And then I found out that what was fiery Judgment Day on earth was jubilee in Heaven, and I cried: "Doorkeepers of Heaven, shut the gates; all Heaven has come in. Doorkeepers, shut the twelve gates, lest the sorrows and the woes of earth, like bandits, should some day come up and try to plunder the city!"

ANECDOTES OF ROWLAND HILL.

A respectable female once called on him, expressing a wish to be united with the Church. He at first misunderstood her state of mind. Among other questions he put the following: "Have you a good heart?" She replied, "I hope I have, sir." Mr. Hill called the attention of a friend to the reply, and said, "Come, and see a wonderful woman, who has a good heart. I'm sure it's more than I can say." The worthy female was much affected, but most judiciously answered, "I trust, sir, I have a new heart; and I did not think it wrong to call the work of the Holy Ghost a good work." This remark touched Mr. Hill, who immediately apologized in the most Christian manner for having wounded her feelings.

A PRAYER FOR LATE COMERS.

Being very much grieved at the conduct of some of his congregation, who were frequently unpunctual, he once offered the following prayer: "Oh, Lord, bless those who are in their places, have mercy upon those who are on the road, and save those who are getting ready to come."

A SERPENT FANCIER.

When very early in life he was preaching at Devizes some fellow came to hear him with several snakes in his pocket; watching his opportunity, he threw three at once at Mr. Hill. One coiled on his arm, and another fastened on his neck. "Perceiving," said he, "that they were harmless, I merely took them off and threw them behind me, away from the crowd; some of the people immediately drove away the sinner, and the result was increased attention and several conversions to God. Soon afterward the rebel came again to hear me; and he that would have alarmed me by serpents was himself rescued from the old serpent.

THE EMPTY NAPKIN.

A lady once requested him to examine her son as a candidate for the ministry, remarking, "I am sure he has talent, but it is hid in a napkin." At the close of the interview with the young man Mr. Hill said, "Well, madam, I have shaken the napkin, and I cannot find the talent."

THE STORY OF THE HOGS.

Two friends once entered Surrey Chapel previous to going to India. One was a Christian, the other not. Mr. Hill preached from the text, "We are not ignorant of his devices," and told the following tale: "Many years since I met a drove of pigs in one of the narrow streets of a large town, and, to my surprise, they were not driven, but quietly followed their leader. This singular fact excited my curiosity, and I pursued the swine until they all quietly entered the butchery. I then asked the man how he succeeded in getting the poor, stupid, stubborn pigs so willingly to follow him, when he told me the secret. He had a basket of beans under his arm, and kept dropping them as he proceeded, and so secured his object. Ah, my dear hearers, the devil has got his basket of beans, and he knows how to suit his temptations to every sinner. He drops them by the way; the poor sinner is thus led captive by the devil at his will; and if grace prevent not, he will get him at last into his butchery, and there he will keep him forever. Oh, it is because 'we are not ignorant of his devices' that we are anxious this evening to guard you against them."

The Christian friend mourned over this tale about the pigs, and feared it would excite a smile but not produce conviction in the mind of his unbelieving companion. After the service they left the chapel, and all was silence for a season.

"What a singular statement we had to-night about the pigs, and yet how striking and convincing it was," remarked the young man. His mind was impressed—he could not forget the basket of beans, the butchery, and the final loss of the sinner's soul. He left the country, but soon after corresponded with his friend, and referred to this sermon as having produced an abiding impression on his mind.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Etta's Talk with her Mother—The Reproach of the Death-bed—The Conscience-stricken Matron—A Rector's Negligence—The Home at Ferncroft—The Little Room.

Etta spent the hour after her visit to the sick youth first on her knees in her own room, and then seated in the low chair by her fireside with her Bible in her hands—unread, it is true, but its presence comforted her.

"Mother," she said that evening, when she found a suitable moment before the family rendezvous for dinner, "thank you so much for letting me go into Shenstone this afternoon. My little walk refreshed me very much, and did me good. Thank you, darling," she added, kissing her mother tenderly. "I do want to do right, and I want to learn the way to do it. It comforts me, too, to think about it; but I can't quite explain what I mean. What do you think, mother?" she asked, as her mother's cheek reddened and paled alternately.

"I don't quite understand what you mean, my child," answered her mother. "What did you do this afternoon? and where did you go? You disappeared so suddenly after luncheon."

"A young lad, mother, ill with fever as—as—Arthur was, from a cold he caught at his work. You did not say 'No' about the jelly, so I took him some, and then had a talk." A sob involuntarily escaped her, and then she said, "I cannot speak of these things yet; but, dear mother, you would like me sometimes to be like you—kind and gentle, and think about others—would you not? You know you are always thinking of us all, and arranging for the happiness and comfort of everybody in the house. But I have no house, and I have nothing very particular or important to do, and I should like to help the people sometimes if I might."

"I only wish you to do right, my dear," said her mother; "that is all. This great trouble appears to have thrown a new light over everything, or a shadow. I am not quite sure which it is. Certainly to me at present all looks very, very dark. And yet it is a solemn gloom—a feeling of death and eternity everywhere. Indescribably depressing! I don't wonder the dear children are so quiet, but the younger ones will soon forget."

"Dear mother," said Etta, "perhaps God is going to speak to us. He took him from us, and there were last words, too, that were spoken that night; that I never can forget." Then the dinner-bell rang, and that important meal was announced. The gentle mother was beginning to feel, though she had not dared to breathe it yet, that something had been missed in the training of her children. The happy, luxurious home life was, after all, not all that was wanted. They had been taught their Catechism; they had attended the church. But still something seemed to have been left out.

Arthur's death-bed—agonizing thought!—had tacitly reproached her. Her precious son, her eldest, her well-beloved! All her opportunities with him now were past, and she was alone in her bewildered griefs, painfully alone. Her husband rarely, if ever, alluded to such subjects; they had never yet conversed upon them. The habit had not grown up between them.

Why this was who can tell? Was it that neither of them loved Him who "gave them life and breath and all things?" Or was it a strange reserve on that one theme, that they felt on no other? Surely not! A theme! Can we call Him so who is the Christian's very existence, his life, his being? "For in Him we live and move and have our being." There surely must have been something wrong somewhere! They talked ceaselessly together of their children, their relations, friends, house, garden, and other home interests of the present, as well as prospects for the future. But of Jesus they never spoke. Yet we read again, "Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh!"

At their table among guests, or in their most private family party, it would indeed have startled every one to hear that most blessed name mentioned. "Irreverent," it would have been called. Irreverent to talk of Him who is All in all! our King! But such was the family fashion. Perhaps they had never read, or perhaps forgotten, or, may be, objected to the manifold Scriptural injunction and example contained in both the Old and New Testaments of lip-devotion to the Saviour, hallowed speech, as a fruit of that heart consecration that is demanded from those who believe in the one Lord and accept His all-passing love. Motives and reasons it would be impossible to sift in a home such as this. But these were the facts. Arthur's last days, that might have been so radiantly bright, had been disturbed by the recollection of this iceberg chill.

By telegraph and rail one had to be sought who could mention the all-precious Name and utter His promises. Yet Bibles might have been found in almost any room; and among the large circle of friends who claimed acquaintance or kinship, the dwellers in the Hall were spoken of as an excellent family.

It was this strange mass of contradictory evidence that so troubled the grief-stricken mother during the sore time of her bitter bereavement. To none could she confide her thought. Etta she still considered but a child, though now in her twenty-fourth year. But from the force of habit, that had always controlled and never confided, in spite of all the motherly love that would well up, there was a heart solitude between them.

Both and all were to be pitied, for during all those years they had lost what might have been between them an intensity of happiness. That sweet agreement of soul, that union with Jesus, and through Him with one another, which, though joy here indeed! is only the beginning, the foretaste of glory there.

With their rector they had enjoyed pleasant conversations on various subjects and at many different times. He had ridden with them, dined with them, joined their lawn-tennis parties and evening gatherings, besides inviting them in return to his private as well as parochial festivities. But the GREAT subject that was so pressed home on their hearts, by the circumstances of trial that had overtaken so unexpectedly the happy routine of their family life, on this he had never discoursed. Strange! was it not? But none the less true; nor, had you asked the rector himself, would he have told you it was unusual.

On the contrary, he would have said with a surprised smile,

"These subjects are not meant to be forced or dragged into general use! I preach publicly from my pulpit every Sunday. Those who desire to hear me can do so."

Thus Etta and her mother knew not to whom they could turn for sympathy or help in the hour of their need. The rector had called daily to inquire after Arthur during his illness, and once or twice had been admitted to the sick-room. But his visits had not brought relief to the suffering or sorrowing ones; and when the dreaded funeral day was past, a greater gap than they had ever felt before seemed to divide them from their minister.

But this loss of Divine help through what we might call the expected channel was being overruled for good in a double sense—each in her solitude was getting closer to the Divine source of comfort. Minute rays of truth were beginning to shine about the darkness; each ray being an earnest that floods of brightness were but waiting to follow; when a full receptiveness could be found in the hearts that they had thus penetrated. It had also brought Etta into contact with other children of the great family in heaven and in earth. Both of these results were good, though as yet in their preliminary development they were somewhat painful.

When to her mother and her maid Etta suggested the idea of sitting up with the sick lad sometimes, that his mother might sleep, her proposal was received with horror. The maid opened her eyes, and held up her hands, with a faint scream of—

"Really! Miss Etta!"

Whereas her mother distinctly forbade it. So Etta's only resource was—and it was certainly the wisest measure!—to offer to pay another woman to come in daily, or at night, for a few hours, when required.

This she did, and the result was satisfactory in more ways than one. The lad was better nursed, the weary mother was rested, and the cottage friendship was won.

At the farther end of the town from the hall you might have seen a white house, Ferncroft, they called it. Not very large, nor was it very small. It stood close by the street, its garden and square courtyard inclosed by a wall. Some of its windows looked into the street, and some into the garden, which held a deserved repute for the gayety of its flower-beds; and this not only in midsummer, when the surrounding gardens were brilliant also, but during at least three seasons of the year, when its variety of blossom presented a constant succession of unfading beauty.

As the dark wintry days closed in, the conservatory that opened from the drawing-room was all the more beautiful, from its contrast to the darkness without. Laurels, ivy, and other evergreen shrubs clothed the lawn, giving it a picturesque look even at such times as these; while the little birds sang their sweetest, and hopped in amicable friendship round the low doorstep that afforded the common entrance to the sitting-rooms of the house.

Inside the pretty drawing-room there blazed a bright fire this evening. The conservatory had been closed for the night. The shutters had just been shut and the curtains drawn, while a lady, gentle in manner, gravely quiet in appearance, wearing a lavender-colored shawl wrapped about her shoulders, took her seat in a low chair beside the fire.

"Dear!" she said in the softest of voices, "are you going out to-night?"

This question was addressed to an elderly gentleman opposite her, who seemed deeply immersed in a column of the newspaper, to the reading of which evidently the arrival of lights was at that minute giving fresh zest.

He looked up, thought a moment, and then said, "Yes, by the bye! I have to go to that committee meeting about the new school."

"When will that be?" asked the lady.

"Immediately after tea," was the answer.

The different family tastes for tea, or late dinner, had been met by what was considered in the little white house a judicious combination of both. This anomalous meal had a variety of titles, and generally took place at so early an hour in the evening, that the migratory habits of the household could continue unfettered when necessary; while at other times it had the advantage of affording an hour or two of useful employment in the house.

At this moment the door-bell rang, and the servant came in, saying,

"Old Michael Bateman is here, ma'am. He says he wishes to speak to you, if you can come and talk to him for a minute."

"I will come," she answered; and Michael was thereupon ushered into a small room on the other side of the low wainscoted hall. This room had its floor covered with matting instead of carpet. A little iron stove held its place at one end, which kept up a pleasant heat on the chilly evenings. Two or three chairs, a table, and a substantial book-shelf filled with books, composed its furniture.

This room was devoted to stray arrivals of all descriptions, and was by no means an unimportant part of the establishment. A good deal of business had been done in it of different sorts and at different times. Indeed, there was generally something going on within it. Its ever-open door brought the knowledge of many a temporal as well as spiritual necessity into the house; so much was this the case, that the nieces and nephews, who were rather fond of haunting the quiet abode, always protesting that they "never found it dull," were often in the habit of saying, "Auntie could not possibly be extravagant as long as the 'little room' was there."

In this, perhaps, they were right. For a recollection of it was quite sufficient, as often to tie the purse-strings as to open them; and the sense of the "little room's" presence often made the burden of account-keeping heavier than otherwise it need have been. Yet the said "little room" was never allowed to lose its identity. Its territory was considered sacred ground; and there were hallowed associations, and interests composed of the usual mingling of joy and sorrow, which preserved it from encroachment, even had there been any temptation to its reannexation on the part of its owners.

FUTURE DESTINY OF THE JEWS, GENTILES, AND CHURCH OF GOD.

By the Hon. W. Wellesley

(Nephew of the celebrated Duke of Wellington).

1. The Jews—Not Absorbed in Other Nations—Their Assured Return—Their Alliance with Anti-Christ—The End of Indignation—Future Centre of Blessing—2. The Gentiles—Power Given to Them—Become Lovers of Pleasure—The End of the Gentiles—3. The Church—The Second Coming in two Acts—Thirty Years' Interval—Present Duty.

THERE are three parties with whom God has been dealing, and upon whom He has been acting dispensationally ever since the time of Abraham—the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Church of God, as mentioned in the passage in 1 Corinth. 10 : 32.

1. The promises made in the Old Testament to are at present in abeyance, and the Jews are comparatively wanderers upon the face of the earth. In Asia, in Africa, or in England, wherever you see them, you can recognize the countenance and detect the well-known profile of the Jew. And you may put them into the council-chamber or into Parliament, you may give them privileges and titles, but they still remain and will remain Jews. They are the great monument of the dealings of God in the judgment with a nation upon this earth. It is not so with other nations; they merge into the inhabitants of the countries in which they dwell.

Thus, we have had the migrations of the Huguenots from France; and we can discover, in the traces of their Anglicized names, certain families which were brought into this land by persecution in the time of Louis XIV.; but to all intents and purposes they are Englishmen; they have English ideas, they are in Parliament, and they are English in every way. But the Jew still remains a Jew; and "even unto this day, when Moses is read, the vail is upon their heart. Nevertheless, when it shall turn to the Lord, the vail shall be taken away" (2 Cor. 3 : 15, 16). There is, therefore, a distinct New Testament promise, that the nation shall one day turn to the Lord, and the vail shall be taken away.

The Jews will be nationally and politically raised, brought out of their forgotten state as a nation, and brought into their own land again" (Ezekiel 37, 38). And they will enjoy it as they never yet have done; viz., under the New Covenant (Jeremiah 31 : 31–40); that is, they will enjoy their land as converted Jews. But the nation, in the first instance, will return certainly in an unconverted state; for in that state it will make

A SEVEN YEARS' COVENANT WITH ANTICHRIST (DANIEL 9 : 27).

But after the seven years it will become a nation regenerated upon the earth.

In connection with this seven years' covenant they will fall into the hands of Antichrist. I will quote a passage to this effect from Matthew 12. "When the unclean spirit has gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out: and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation." Now this passage is generally allowed to be the condition of the Jewish nation in a day yet to come. Their house has been swept of idols (for they did not publicly worship idols in our Lord's time), yet restless and discontented they will return into their own land in unbelief; they will receive Antichrist, that great wicked one who is going to rise up upon this earth, and whom all nations will worship and be subject to, as foretold in Revelation 13.

The Jews for seven years (Daniel 9 : 27) will make a league with him. "I am come in my Father's name," says Christ, "and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive" (John 5 : 43). In the Book of Zechariah we find the history of the terrific trouble they come into, and the last interference of our Lord Jesus on their behalf, that is, on behalf of the faithful remnant in their midst, Zechariah 13, 14 give the very details of the dreadful destructions in the land, when the idolatrous nation is chastened by God. "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (Matthew 24 : 21). "Alas, for that day is great, so that none is like it; even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it."

There shall be an

for, after all these details in Zechariah, there comes at last this remarkable passage: "Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south . . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee." This is a distinct announcement of the personal interference of the Lord Jesus on behalf of His remnant, who will be the nucleus of the future millennial nation. It is the history of His interference at the end of this age, and thus the termination of Jewish trial, when they are in the latter day in their land.

At the end the Lord puts His own people again into Jerusalem, as the metropolis of the earth, and the centre of blessing to all nations. "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isaiah 27 : 6). They will again have the olive tree of earthly promise, into which the Gentiles have at present been grafted.

2. I will now touch upon

THE GENTILES.

When God took power away from the Jews He gave it to the Gentiles. Ever since Nebuchadnezzar's time the Gentiles have had rule over this earth. Solomon had it once. History does not go back so far as Solomon's time. Not one historian goes back, in the way of anything authentic, to a thousand years before Christ. Although, then, Solomon is scarcely mentioned in profane history, the Scripture testifies largely as to his dignity and dominion. His successors lost this position through their idolatry, and God took away the power from the Jews and gave it to the Gentiles, in the person of Nebuchadnezzar. This is referred to in the passage, "If the casting away of them (the Jews) be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles." God has broken off some of the olive branches from the Jewish tree, and has grafted the Gentiles into it. But they will ultimately be cut off for unbelief (Rom. 11), as the Jews formerly were.

The Gentile world at large are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Many have their Sunday religion, but it is a religion for the most part of ordinances. It often does them no more good than Elisha's staff did in the hands of Gehazi when laid upon the face of the dead child. They have not continued in the goodness of God, and their sentence is to be cut off; especially the ten nations prefigured by Daniel's prophetic image, and by the ten-horned wild beast (Dan. 2, 7), including England, France, Spain, Austria, Italy, etc.—Christendom at large; they will all receive the Antichrist, they will give their power to him, and they will perish (Rev. 13 : 1–10, 17). This will be the end of the Gentiles; it is in 2 Thess. 1 : 6: "Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; and to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Observe this last clause, because it assures us of a judgment upon professors, namely, those who have heard the Gospel and have not obeyed it: "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power; when He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

There is

THE END OF THE GENTILES.

They have this judgment hanging over them. London is entirely asleep, close to that volcano; she seems given up to pleasure. Her riches are enormous, and new modes of pleasure are almost daily invented to expend them. And all this just at the time when we, who do meditate a little on the prophetic Word, suppose that there is an awful judgment impending on this land.

Meanwhile, blessed be God for it, He is still lingering over us in love, and revealing Himself as the Saviour of sinners, expecting to find in them nothing but vileness, salvation by the blood of Christ being provided for them on the ground of their lost condition. Thus, while faith looks at the goodness of God (Rom. 2 : 4; 11 : 22), as displayed in Christ, unbelief supposes something good in the creature, and makes up for its failures by outward religious observances.

3. In regard to

of God, I would just notice that there may be incorrect views as to the extent of time included in the expression, the Coming of the Lord. I extract upon this point a few sentences from a little work by a godly clergyman, Mr. Richard Chester, of Ireland, (page 16): "The Lord's first coming consisted of two great acts or parts—His birth, when He took our nature upon Him; His death, when in that nature He made atonement for sin. Between these there was an interval of more than thirty years, although His first coming is foretold by the prophets as one event. Even so will His second coming, foretold in like manner as one event, consist, we believe, of two acts or parts—His coming for His Church to the air, and His subsequent coming with His Church to the earth." Again, "Between these two acts or parts of the Lord's second coming we hold that there will be (as already noticed with regard to His first advent) an interval. During this interval very many of the events predicted to occur before His advent with His Church to the earth will be accomplished."

If, as to the first coming of Christ, many facts are given besides His actual death, and yet all looked at as one great whole, we must not be surprised to find certain events or periods embraced within His second coming. For instance, there is a coming in which His feet touch the Mount of Olives in behalf of the Jews, and for the destruction of the Gentile nations.

As events draw to a close, is it not of vast interest to know our standing, character, and hope? In 1 Thess. 4 we have the coming of the Lord for the Church to take us up. He comes alone, but "with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God." It is a coming quite distinct from Zechariah 14, where the Church comes with Him. In the one He comes for us; in the other, we come with Him. The blessedness of our portion hereafter is indicated in Ephes. 2 : 7: "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus." The Church will have a specialty of glory forever.

Our citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 2). We are in the world, but not of it (John 17). We have our part in it with the rejected Christ. We shall have to do with the world when He comes down in judgment on those nations that are now hastening to the crisis; but He will come first to receive us to Himself, and we shall be caught up to be forever with the Lord.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message to Congress on the subject of the wrongs done to the Ponca Indians received February 2d, embodies the report of the commission we referred to last week. Mr. Hayes recommends legislation in accordance with the report, and with unusual earnestness urges prompt and thorough action in the matter. The following extract from the message indicates the President's consciousness of the injustice done, and his personal desire that all may be done which is now possible, to atone for the grievous sin committed by the Government. The President says:

"Nothing should be left undone to show to the Indians that the Government of the United States regards their rights as equally sacred with those of its citizens. The time has come when the policy should be to place the Indians, as rapidly as practicable, on the same footing with other permanent inhabitants of this country. I do not undertake to apportion the blame for the injustice done to the Poncas. Whether the Executive or Congress or the public is chiefly in fault is not now a question of practical importance. As the Chief Executive at the time when the wrong was consummated, I am deeply sensible that enough of the responsibility for that wrong justly attaches to me to make it my personal duty and earnest desire to do all I can to give to these Indian people that measure of redress which is required alike by justice and by humanity."

The Resolution Regulating the Electoral count was passed in the Senate on February 4th. Senator Hoar succeeded in adding an amendment to it which declares in effect that in the opinion of the Senate, the House concurring, it is the duty of Congress to pass a law at once providing for the orderly counting of the electoral vote. It will be remembered that soon after the inauguration of President Hayes the Senate took steps to frame a law upon the subject, and the measure known as the Edmunds bill passed the Senate, but was lost in the House. During the last two years no measure has been passed. The resolution as amended was accepted by the House.

The Senate Finance Committee Completed their work on the Funding Bill on February 4th. They propose to make the bonds redeemable in five years and payable in twenty years from their dates of issue, and to fix the rate of interest both for the bonds and the Treasury certificates at 3½ per cent. The committee propose as a further change to strike out the fifth section, known as the "Carlisle Amendments," which provided for the compulsory use of the new bonds as security for National Bank circulation, and substitute other enactments, the principal feature of which is a provision that hereafter the security given by National banks shall consist wholly of United States bonds. An impression now prevails that the Democrats in the House will oppose the bill if the Senate adopt the recommendations of the committee. Some of them object to the alteration in time, and some to that in the rate, and both sections of the party will therefore unite in opposing the bill in its amended form.

A Bill to Repeal Certain Items of Taxation was reported favorably by the Committee on Ways and Means on February 4th. The Treasury Department had recommended six items for relief, the tax on which, in 1880 produced $10,990,606. They were bank checks, friction matches, patent medicines, perfumery, etc., bank deposits, savings banks deposits, and bank capital. The committee approved of all except that of bank capital, and reported accordingly.

The Death Rate Statistics of the Chief Cities of the Union for the past year, as compiled by the National Board of Health, show in a conspicuous light how grievously the city of New York is mismanaged. The rate is higher in this city than in Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, London, or Glasgow. The fact will not surprise people familiar with the city, who are annoyed daily by the filthy condition of the streets. The crowded tenement-houses are alone sufficient, under the most favorable circumstances, to cause disease and death, and in addition the effluvia from the streets must be encountered, although $800,000 has been appropriated for the purpose of cleansing them.

Extensive Floods are Reported from San Francisco. Recent advices show that the late rainfall was the heaviest storm experienced since 1861. The Feather, Yuba, and Upper Sacramento rivers overflowed, and the creeks running into those streams went over their banks. The damage effected was very great. The Central Pacific Railroad had nearly a thousand yards of wall near Benicia washed away, and also a portion of the track on the Oregon branch near Bear River. Several miles of the Santa Cruz Railroad were washed away near Santa Cruz. The town of Napa was flooded, and a portion of Watsonville. The Sacramento valley from Cache Creek to Red Bluffs presented the appearance of a vast lake.

That Prohibition Causes a Loss to the Revenue is an objection frequently urged by the opponents of compulsory temperance legislation. Governor St. John of Kansas, in his annual message to the legislature, meets the argument by insisting that "every dollar of revenue derived from such license costs the people not less than ten dollars in loss of time and property, cost of courts, prisons and poor-houses, to say nothing of the destruction of the physical, mental and moral elements of mankind, which cannot be estimated." The Governor contends that the question is really one of principle, in which position it is unassailable, but even when lowered to the aspect of expediency it deserves the support of the people.

Gospel Temperance Among the Soldiers at Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, is going on with much blessing. Several months ago a gentleman inaugurated a series of temperance meetings, and afterward Sabbath afternoon services, in one of the rooms occupied by the soldiers of the fort as a school-room. The meetings have been well attended, and have been conducted frequently on the Sabbath by pastors of the neighboring villages. A large number of the soldiers have given up their drinking habits and several have expressed a hope that they have been converted to God.

The Anxiety Respecting the Fate of the brave explorers who, under the command of Captain De Long, sailed in the Jeanette in July, 1879, for the Arctic seas, has found expression in a letter from Judge Daly, President of the American Geographical Society, to President Hayes. Judge Daly argued that the present winter having been one of exceptional severity both in America and Europe, the accumulation of ice in Arctic waters will be increased, and that if Captain De Long should be unable to return next summer, and be compelled to pass a third winter there, both officers and men would be exposed to such physical prostration as to render an escape by a land journey in sledges and boats impossible. Judge Daly advised that a vessel should be immediately sent to search for the Jeanette and to render such relief and assistance to the party as they probably, by this time, urgently need. The President took prompt action in the matter, and a bill has passed the Senate appropriating $175,000 to equip a government ship or to purchase a whaling vessel for the purpose. It is expected that the bill will not be opposed in the House.

The New York Christian Home for Intemperate men is now in the fourth year of its work. From the report recently issued it appears that since the opening of the Home in June, 1877, it has cared for 569 men, not moderate drinkers, but drunkards, many of whom were needy, destitute, and friendless, and cared for them so well that it can now point to 371 who have become faithful members of churches, and to 411 who are supporting themselves and their families in positions obtained for them. From want of sufficient accommodations it has been compelled to turn away about as many as it has received. A site has now been purchased, on which as as soon as sufficient funds are secured, a new building capable of accommodating seventy-five inmates will be erected.

The Reminiscences of a City Missionary, as related at the annual meeting of the Church Extension and Missionary Society in New York on January 30th, show the kind of hardships the missionaries formerly experienced, and which in a modified form are met with even now in the lower quarters of the city. Mr. W. K. Peyton, in describing the struggles and trials of missionaries, said: When missionary work was begun in "Mackerelville," the minister was absolutely hooted out of the houses. Hot water was thrown upon him in one case, and he was treated with every indignity that malevolent godlessness could invent. He believed "Mackerelville" at that time was the worst place in New York City. Now there is a flourishing mission in that quarter.

The Need of the Cities in the Present day is stalwart Christian citizens who will see that the laws are enforced. A Christian citizen of Chicago writes: "Sunday theatres have been in full blast here for two years. They seem to have the right of way, leading our young men and maidens to destruction. Our city, I fear, is another Paris. Where are our men in authority to put down such things? Is it true that we must be governed by foreigners, who have no regard for our Sabbaths? I have been praying over this for a long time, and hope most truly that something can be done to put them down. Six evenings in the week ought to be sufficient for them."

The Alarming Increase in the Number of divorce suits was the subject of a recent Boston lecture by Rev. S. W. Dike of Royalton, Vt. The facts stated have astonished the public, and associations are being formed with the view of checking the evil. A Chicago journal says: "In Chicago, suits for divorce are one to every ten marriage licenses taken out, and the divorces decreed in the ratio of one to twelve. It only increases our sense of the danger threatening our entire country to be told by Mr. Dike that 'Chicago is not as bad as Hartford and New Haven.'"

The Use of the Sponge.—A Prominent Scientist of Philadelphia, in an article recently published, makes an admission which ought to caution the numerous class of persons who are setting up science in antagonism to the Bible. He says: "Our science of nature, like our science of man, is a patchwork of half-stated, half-worked-out sums on a slate; and we are kept as busy with the sponge as with the pencil." The Christian has no use for the sponge, for the Word of God is steadfast (John 10 : 35).

A Perilous Descent at Niagara Occurred to an English tourist on January 30th. The spray from the falls has formed a wonderful ice-mountain in the river, and the Englishman had climbed to its summit to obtain a good view of the cataract. As he stood gazing, his feet slipped, and he descended at a rapid pace. He made frantic endeavors to save himself, and only succeeded in checking his terrible career when a few feet from the water. He had clutched at every projection until his nails were literally torn from his fingers. He escaped a horrible death, and in this was happier than many who under the plea of "seeing life" venture into places where the life of the soul is imperilled (Prov. 2 : 18).

A Fatal Kiss Passed Between a Husband and wife at Philadephia two weeks ago. The husband was dying of small-pox, and his wife, who loved him tenderly, kissed him at the last moment. She contracted the fatal disease, and in a short time followed him to the grave. We feel pity in a case so touching, for the devoted and affectionate wife, whose love token lost her her life, but how much greater sorrow we ought to feel for those who, having given their love to unworthy objects, suffer themselves to be dragged down into eternal death rather than submit to a sacrifice which the Saviour demands from those who would follow Him (Luke 14 : 26).

A Diamond, Sold for Ten Cents a few Years ago, is now valued at a fabulous sum. The Eagle, of Gainesville, Ga., relates that on one occasion a visitor to the works of Mr. Luther saw a boy panning out some earth, and noticed among it a beautiful pebble, for which he offered the boy a dime. The offer was accepted, and some time after he showed it a lapidary, who said it was a diamond of considerable value. It was cut and polished, and then proved to be a gem of the first water, the worth of which must be immense. The diamond-cutters purchased it for $300, and it has been re-sold in Europe at a high rate. The value of the stone was not perceived because it was uncut and unpolished, but after those processes it was manifest to every one. Affliction is often the process God employs to bring out the goodness of His people, whom He describes as His jewels (Mal. 3 : 17).

Footprints in Solid Rock have been Found in the State of New York. A scientific journal calls attention to the neighborhood of the town of Stockbridge, in Madison County, N. Y., which is rich in historical associations and geological curiosities, among the most noted of which are the wonderful foot-prints in the rock, near the little village of Munnsville. Leaving the railroad at Munnsville station, and proceeding along a romantic road, walled on either side by huge rocks, the traveller comes to a little stream at the summit of the hill, which flows over a precipice into the gorge below. In the bed of this stream, plainly discernible in the solid rock, are the foot-prints. There are the tracks of three persons, apparently of a man, woman and child, crossing and recrossing the brook several times. How long it is since the wanderers crossed the brook we cannot tell, but the evidences of their having been there are clear after the lapse of an immense period of time. The fact is an illustration of a truth men are too apt to forget when in secrecy they go into haunts of sin, that God sees all their ways, and as we are warned, has "set a print on the heels of our feet (Job 13 : 27).

A Donation in Answer to Prayer is an In-cident narrated by the correspondent of a New York journal. It appears that Dr. Hartshorn, who for twenty-five years was the agent of the American Bible Society in Eastern Ohio and Illinois, attended the anniversary of an auxiliary society in Central Illinois, and made an appeal on behalf of the parent society. A gentleman present responded among others with a liberal donation. Dr. Hartshorn referred to this particular gift in the course of conversation with his host after the meeting, when it was stated that the donor might have well afforded to give one hundred and fifty dollars. If that be so, said the Doctor, it is a legitimate subject for prayer, that his heart may be opened to give that sum. The two friends that night and the following morning presented the case in prayer, and then Dr. Hartshorn went to the donor of the preceding evening to receive the money. He had scarcely explained the object of his visit when a check was handed to him with the remark that he felt impressed after last night's meeting that he had not given the subject the consideration it deserved, and he would supplement the gift with another for one hundred and fifty dollars.

An Irishman at Lewiston, Me., Made an Ad-mission which is suggestive. He was recently placed on trial, charged with an offence against the law. He objected to two of the jurymen, and when reminded by the judge that he must give good and sufficient reasons for challenging, naively said : "May it please yer Honor, I would a good deal rather be tried by a man that don't know me than by a man that does!" The accused man may be supposed from his admission, to have been guilty, and was probably wise in making the objection he did. At the great tribunal it is the Christian's joy to remember that the Judge will be one who knows him well. He is guilty, but his plea of justification through Jesus will be all-sufficient. (Rom. 8 : 1.)

One Thousand Dollars for an Eye was the estimate made by the Board of Supervisors at San Francisco lately. A lady was admiring the display of fireworks at Yerba Buena Park, when one of the rockets struck her in the eye, inflicting injuries so serious as to cause the loss of sight in that organ. After bringing suit and making several appeals, the Board granted her a thousand dollars in compensation, and the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. Even that sum was an insufficient compensation for the pain she suffered, but it was only after persistent effort and tedious litigation that she obtained it. Her perseverance showed how fully she realized the loss she had sustained ; yet the loss of the soul, which is infinitely more serious, does not excite apprehension or anxiety in the minds of a large number of people (Matt. 6 : 33).

"Is Dying Painful?" is the Subject on which a physician writes to the New York Evening Post. The physician replies to a previous correspondent who had said that death was generally unutterable agony. The physician says : "I beg leave, as a physician, to object very decidedly to this statement. I have been a frequent observer of the passing out of my fellow-beings, in army and navy, in large hospitals—civil and military, and in private life, and hence cannot help feeling that what I have seen must be a fair sample of the methods of dying peculiar to our race. The result of these sad observations, covering eighteen years, is, that the vast majority of persons do not find death 'suffering and agony.' Many suffer more in the various illnesses from which they recover than most do in the article of death."

Even if the physician is mistaken, the approach of death has no terrors for the earnest Christian. He is supported by Him who came to "deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2 : 15).

The Persistency of the Orphan Daughter of an officer in the army was rewarded by a Government appointment not long ago. The young lady found on the death of her father that the duty of supporting her invalid widowed mother and her brothers and sisters had devolved upon her. She tried various openings without success and finally resolved on seeking a situation in the Treasury. She called on Secretary Sherman and presented her plea. Mr. Sherman assured her that there were ten applicants for every one place, and there was very little chance. She told him that she could not take a refusal, and declared that if he would allow her she would come up every day and black his shoes, if he couldn't do better for her. The secretary was struck with her determination and told her to come back. In less than a week she had a good place in the Treasury, which she still holds. Every morning she walks to the department with the step of a business woman who is proud that her delicate hands can be the support of others. If Christians were as much in earnest in their prayers for spiritual blessings they would place a higher estimate on the value of prayer than they now do (Luke 18 : 1).

SIN SUBDUED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"He will subdue our iniquities."—MICAH, 7 : 19.

Pardon not Enough for the Sinner—He Wants Emancipation too—Enemies Within and Without—God will Subdue Sin—I. Its Fascinating Power—II. Its Depressing Power—III. Its Domineering Power—IV. Its Clamoring Power—V. Its Defiling Power—VI. Its Hampering Power—VII. Its Indwelling Power—Perfect Subjugation Assured—The Place Where it will be Attained—"Not Here I Trow"—An aged Hearer's Protest.

BUT lately I tuned my harp to the music of forgiven sin, and we sang of pardon bought with blood ; it was a sweet subject to all our hearts, for we all have a portion in it, seeing we are all sinful, and have need to be forgiven. But, beloved, the pardon of sin is not enough for us ; we have another equally urgent need. If the Lord would forgive us all our sin we could not be happy with that alone. "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities" is not perfect music till we add to it the next note, "who healeth all thy diseases." We feel that we have within us a tendency to sin, and that tendency is our misery ; from this tendency we must be emancipated, or we are no more free than the captive who has had the manacles removed from one wrist but feels the iron eating into the other arm.

We, dear friends, who have been awakened by the Holy Spirit, find that we are by nature under the power of sin. It will not be an easy thing for us to escape from the terrible tyranny of sin ; not without the putting forth of great power can the iron yoke be broken. What little experience we have had in the divine life leads us to see that there is an immense difficulty before us, making our upward progress one of conflict and labor. A dreadful power has our nature in subjection, and that power cannot easily be overcome.

We find that our inward enemies are assisted by allies from without. The world which lieth in the wicked one is ever ready to assist his dominion within us. We cannot walk down a street but we hear language which pollutes us ; we can scarcely transact business in our own counting-houses without being tempted. If we stay at home there is temptation there, and if we go abroad it is the same. The most retired are not free from sin, nay, their very retirement may only be a sinful selfishness which shirks imperative duty. We cannot do good to others without running some risk ourselves, and if we cease from godly endeavors because we would not hazard our own spiritual comfort, we are already taken in the snare.

Moreover, that mysterious spirit, the devil, is always ready to excite our flesh, and to urge on the world. I have heard that some people doubt his existence. Very likely they are so friendly to him that they would not like to betray him, and so they deny that he hides in their hearts ; but those who are his enemies do not try to conceal him, but own with sad humiliation of heart that they are very conscious of his power.

With so many in league against us what can we do? What is to become of us? My text is the answer to that question : "He will subdue our iniquities." That same blessed God who has pardoned our sins will conquer them. I am going to speak briefly upon seven points, if time shall hold out for me to do so, and each of these seven points will show phases of the energy of evil which God will subdue.

I. One of the first powers of evil which a man perceives when the heavenly life begins to breathe within him is of sin. When grace in the soul is only like a little spark, and has not come to its brightness, yet the man discovers with alarm that he is held under the enchantment of evil. I do not know any other word which quite gives my idea except that one. Satan casts a spell over men. They come and hear the gospel and they are impressed by it, and they see the reasonableness of the endeavor to escape from sin ; they perceive the beauty of holiness, and they see that the way of God's salvation is a very glorious one, namely, by faith in Jesus Christ, and they begin to yield ; but yet they neither flee from their sins nor lay hold on the salvation of Christ, but remain as persons besotted, who act contrary to reason.

In many cases Satan exercises over men a kind of soporific power. He puts them to sleep. I do not know whether there is anything in mesmerism or not, but I know that there is a devilish sleep-creating charm which Satan casts over men. They are no sooner a little awakened, and startled, and persuaded to escape for their lives, than suddenly they fold their arms again, and crave a little more sleep.

In the matters of the soul you have not merely to get men awake, but to keep them awake. Over the arctic traveller there comes a tendency to sleep in the cold—a tendency which he cannot resist. He may be awakened by his fellow and shaken out of his torpor, but by and by he is anxious to sleep again; they march him on between two, perhaps, and try to keep him awake but still he cries, "Let me sleep." He begs to be allowed to lie down and slumber. Such is the power of Satan over some of you who are present here; you wish that we would let you be quiet, and go on in your sins, without worrying you with our warnings. I have shaken you sometimes; at least, I have tried to do so; and then after all you have gone to sleep, and still you are asleep, nodding with hell beneath you, with the wrath of God abiding on you.

Now, I am rejoiced to think that, if there is any life in you, if the Lord enables you to look to Jesus Christ, his Son, for salvation, he will subdue your iniquities. Man, He will help you to escape from the magician's wand. Sin shall no longer delude and ensnare you.

II. A second form of the force of sin in most men is

ITS DEPRESSING POWER.

When men are really awake, and no longer under the witchery of sin, then Satan, and their flesh, and the sin that dwells in them, conspire to make them think that there is no hope of salvation for them. The evil ones mutter, "It is no use your trying to be saved. You do not stand the smallest chance." Jeeringly the tempters cry, "Look at your sins! Look at your sins!" Satan, who aforetime did not want us to look at sin, becomes all on a sudden eager that we should take to self-examination and confession. He who is the father of lies sometimes finds truth answer his purpose so well that he uses it with terrible effect; but even then he use it to support a lie. He suggests to the heart the thought, "If you had not sinned so much you might have been forgiven, but you have piled on the last ounce that has broken the back of mercy; you will never be saved."

Then comes the second suggestion, "You know you have tried already. You did keep yourself pretty steady for a time, but it all broke down. There is not the slightest use in venturing again upon this hopeless business. Depend upon it, there is a divine decree against you; you are one of the reprobate. There is no hope for you at all. Don't you see how false you are? You never make a resolve but you break it. You made an awful failure of it last time, and so you will again." Then there comes up again in the soul the depressing thought, "Perhaps it is not true after all that there is any mercy for sinners. It is very possible that there is no such power in the blood of Jesus as the preacher wants you to think."

Once get a man upon the rails of doubt and you can draw him on as far as you please. It is interesting to see a man go on doubting in the style I once followed. I doubted everything till at last I doubted my own existence. Now I have at least a little bump of common-sense, and I laughed outright at myself when I got as far as that, and the ridiculousness of the situation brought me back again to believe. To run right on to a reductio ad absurdum and prove the absurdity of your own unbelief is a very useful method of bringing a doubting spirit to a measure of belief.

Yes, I know that this is the way of sin. It depresses the man. "I would, but cannot believe," says he. "I would have a hope, but I cannot believe that my name is among God's elect ones. I cannot think that the blood of the atonement was shed for me;" and so on. What is to be done when you feel this, and wish to conquer it? What is to be done but to fly to a promise like this in the text, "He will subdue our iniquities?"

O cast-down one, be comforted, the Lord will subdue your iniquities in this respect. If you will but look to Jesus Christ He will say to you, "Be of good comfort." He will tell you that your sins are forgiven, and breathe hope into your soul.

III. But now, thirdly, the Lord has power to subdue sin in another form of its force, namely,

ITS DOMINEERING POWER.

What a domineering thing sin is over men. Any one sin will lord it frightfully over a man. I know a man in his senses—at any rate, he has never been in Bedlam yet: in business he is as sharp and cute a man as can be, and yet he drinks himself into foolishness, into madness, and even into delirium tremens. He has done this several times, and owns to the madness and wickedness of the deed, and yet he will repeat his insane and suicidal course. He has drunk away all his estate: from a man of property he has descended to become a very inefficient working-man. He has drunk away all his wife earns, for he does not earn much himself now, and he is mean enough to let the poor woman kill herself to find him with food.

He drank a horse and cart a fortnight ago. He went out of the house upon a business errand for his wife, pulled up at a drink-shop, drank till his money was gone, and so he sold the means by which his wife has kept him out of the workhouse. I dare say he is here: let him take it home to himself, he knows that it is true. He never went home again till the last ear of that horse had been drunk. And yet he would not like anybody to say that he is a fool, though I beg leave to have my doubts. His sin domineers over him. Only let drink come to him and say, "Go and do a mad thing," and he does it directly.

Expense, pain, disgrace, disease, poverty, and an early death—all these are demanded by the drink demon, and his victims cheerfully pay the tax. Why, now, if I were persuaded that it was the duty of any one of you to go and spend every penny that you have, and starve your own children, in order to support a child at the Orphanage, you would not see it, I dare say. I should be a very long while before I could persuade you to such a thing as that. I am sure I should not wish you to do so; but even if it were right I could not get you to do it. Yet things far more preposterous are done greedily at the bidding of drink.

This devil of drunkenness comes to a man, and he says, "Come along with me. Leave your fireside, and your wife and little ones, and associate with the lowest of the low. Come and spend everything you have upon stuff that will muddle your head, harden your heart, and destroy your character. Sell your household furniture, and drink till all your comrades call you a jolly good fellow. Pawn your children's shoes, so that the little ones cannot even go to Sunday-school." The man goes along as meekly as a lamb. And he has done that scores of times. He knows what a fool he is, and yet he will do it again if he gets a chance. Oh, the domineering power of sin! It is not the one sin of drunkenness only, for there are other men who are domineered over by their lusts. It is a delicate question to talk about, but I dare say there are some here who are slaves to the vilest of lusts, and it becomes me to be plain with them and assure them that persons living in fornication or adultery cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Then there is anger, which carries men away as with a flood; they cannot restrain themselves; the least thing sets them off boiling with passion. They say they cannot get the mastery in this respect, and it is perfectly true; but there is a stronger power than ours which can be brought in, by which the victory can be won.

Sin in some form or other has bound us hand and foot, and made us slaves. Do you wish to be free? Do you wish to be delivered from the tyranny of sin? Then I do not advise you to do anything in your own strength in the hope that you can accomplish deliverance; but cry to Christ at once, whose precious blood can blot out the past, and change you for the future. Give yourself up to Him, and be made a new man in Christ Jesus. Oh, you did try to mend, you say. One of our kings used by way of swearing to say, "God mend me?" That was his regular expletive till somebody said that he had tried that oath long enough; he thought that God could more easily make a new man than mend him. That is just the truth about you. There is no mending you. You need to be made new creatures in Christ Jesus. It will be by far the easier work of the two, though in itself it will be impossible to you. The Lord can do it. He can make you such a new man that you will not know yourself the next time you meet yourself; you will be so entirely new that you will begin to fight against your former self as your worst enemy. Oh, for an earnest cry at this good hour, "Lord, save me! I am sinking in the depths of my sin. Jesus, stretch out Thy hand as Thou didst to sinking Peter. Save me, or I perish." Jesus will lift His royal hand, and cause both winds and waves to lie still before Him; for it is written, "He will subdue our iniquities." The domineering power of sin is readily broken when Jesus enters the heart, but never till then. We refuse to obey our lusts when we bow our necks to the pure and holy Saviour. What a change He works! Speak ye, who best can tell, ye who have felt it! Ah, Lord, we bless Thee that it is even so "Thou wilt subdue our iniquities."

IV. Now, fourthly (for I must be brief on each point), there is another power about sin, namely,

ITS CLAMORING POWER.

I do not know any other word just now which so nearly expresses what I mean. Some of us know that we are forgiven, and we know that the domineering power of sin is broken in us, and our old sins have been long washed away by the blood of Christ, so that God does not know anything about them. You say that is a strange expression. It is no stranger than the Scriptures warrant, for the Lord says of our sins that He will remember them no more for ever; and I believe that He means what He says.

But as for my transgressions, I recollect them when God does not, and they come up before me, and they howl at me. "You be saved?" says one of my sins: "You?" "Remember what you did while yet a youth." Sometimes a thousand of them at once make an awful din, and howl out, "Guilty, guilty, guilty, and doomed to die." Then one or two bigger sins than the rest take the lead, howling with a deep bass, "Condemnation! condemnation! condemnation!" I have tried to argue with these memories of sins. When the dogs have barked in that fashion I have tried to put them down. Conscience has come out with his big whip, and he has whipped them till they howled more than ever. Conscience has said "Why, even now that you are a Christian you are not what you ought to be. You still fall short of your own standard. You condemn yourself while you are preaching. You know you do." Then all the dogs have howled again, as if they were only now beginning their horrid music.

You have never heard, perhaps, a whole kennel full of sins all howling at once, but it is a most awful noise at night. If you listen to the voice of these clamorous dogs you will wish that you had never been born, or could cease to exist. No voice that I know of, short of the one in the text, can make them lie still. But the Lord Jesus can subdue our iniquities, and when He steps into the middle of these dogs they lie cowed at His feet. As He speaks with gracious words of pardon the hell-hounds vanish; and instead of their baying you hear the sweet voice out of heaven: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus."

Did you ever experience this delightful change? It is something like the case of a newcomer at a court of law, who one day went with a magistrate and sat on the bench. A prisoner was brought up, and evidence was given, and the counsel against the prisoner spoke; and this person said to his friend, the magistrate, "You may as well end it, the man is clearly guilty. Wind the case up, and let us go to dinner." But the magistrate said, "You must listen and hear the advocate on the other side, and the case will look very different." When he listened to the advocate on the other side, he began to whisper, "I have my doubts about that now." As he listened further, he said, "I am glad you did not condemn that man. What a mistake I made; he is as innocent as a new-born babe. That advocate has done his work wonderfully." The prisoner was acquitted. It is so with us.

When our sins plead against us we readily allow that we are hopelessly ruined. But, oh, when our blessed Advocate takes up His brief, when the Wonderful, the Counsellor urges His plea, and pleads that our sins were laid on Him, what a change comes over the face of things! The sin is owned and then covered, lack of righteousness is acknowledged and then supplied, condemnation is recognized as just, and then seen to be with equal justice put away forever.

V. But I shall have my time gone, otherwise I wanted to say that this text is true as to of sin. Do you know, brothers and sisters, that after we are quite forgiven, and after the domineering power of sin has gone, yet the defiling power of sin is a great affliction to us? Our experience is embittered by the corruption of sins long ago dead, which send forth a dreadful rottenness, and make our thoughts a terror to us. Some of you were converted late in life, and you have very much, I am sure, to trouble you about in the influence of evil upon your memory. Perhaps this very night while I am speaking there has come up into your mind—though you cannot bear to think of it—some wretched scene in which you played a guilty part. Even the holiest words when you are in prayer will sometimes suggest to you a loose song that you used to sing, and a casual expression which has no special meaning to others will arouse a thousand vile remembrances in you.

Ah, I remember when words I never heard from human tongue rushed through my ear, filling my heart with blasphemies which I never thought of—profane suggestions which made me tremble like a leaf as they poured through my poor brain; I could have died sooner than they should be there; and yet they were rushing through my mind, and bearing all before them. Many of God's people are tried in that way.

Some of you know nothing about this, and I hope you will abide in happy ignorance of it; but those of you who do know it will perceive whereabouts I am, and you will triumph in this priceless promise, "He will subdue our iniquities." Look to Jesus Christ for power over infernal suggestions, and over evil memories, and he will give you that mastery; and it may be you shall never again be tried in that way as long as you live; for frequently the Lord gives such sudden and decisive deliverance that, between that one battle and heaven, the Christian pilgrim pursues his way and never meets Apollyon again.

VI. We have now reached sixthly. The Lord our God will subdue sin in

ITS HAMPERING POWER.

I am speaking, of course, to Christians in these latter points. There is a hampering power about sin. I will just hint at some instances of it.

Many believers might do a great deal of service for Christ and his church, but they are hampered by shame. They are ashamed, afraid, alarmed, where there is nothing to be troubled at. They indulge a foolish distrust of God. Their fear may once have been modesty, but it has grown rank, till it is not now the kind of modesty which is wholesome. They might serve God, but they are ashamed to make the attempt: ought they not to be ashamed of such cowardice? Some, again, are hindered in their joy and their peace by unbelief. They are always doubting, inventing fears, planning suspicions, compiling complaints. This cometh of evil and leadeth to no good. It is a dreadful thing to be hampered from doing good, and hampered from glorifying God, by an inveterate tendency to unbelief.

Others are hampered by frivolity. Many of us have merry spirits, but some are all levity. They were cradled in a bubble, and made to ride upon thistle-down. It is a pity when a man has no solidity of character, and runs to froth, for this sin dwarfs his manhood and dries up his vigor. Oh, that the Lord would subdue this form of iniquity.

Some I know, too, are very unstable: they are never the same thing two days together. They might have borne fruit if they had kept where they were, but they have been transplanted every week, and so have never taken root. They have undertaken a dozen works, but they have done nothing. Unstable as water, they shall not excel.

Some, again, are hampered by pride. There is no use in denying it. The natural tendency of many persons is to a silly pride. When they were children they could not have a new frock but they gloried in it; and since then they cannot have twopence more than their neighbors but they become almost unbearable. I know some who I hope are Christians, but they have a dreadful tendency to swell; they will grow before your very eyes if any one will but favor the process. They have always looked upon the many—the multitude—as being far inferior to them because their grandfather's grandfather was either a knight, or a baronet, or a foreigner of unknown degree: they feel that they are superior sort of people. This is a great drawback to godly workers, especially when it makes them feel that they could not go among poor people. Those who do go to visit the sick poor are often quite unable to reach their hearts, because of their stiffness of manner.

Some professors are slothful. They have a torpid liver, and are always afraid of doing too much. They are lethargic, Dutch-built, broad-wheeled-wagon sort of Christians, and slow are all their movements in the work of the Lord. They do not move at all by express: indeed, they are distressed by zeal, and disgusted by enthusiasm. The Lord subdue these iniquities for us.

Others are hampered by a quick temper. They cannot take things calmly; they snap and snarl, and scarcely know why. They boil over so soon; they are very sorry for it directly afterward, but that does not cure the scalds. There is no use in breaking the tea things because you can rivet them afterward: they are not much improved by it. Some must be forever fighting, for peace is stagnation to their burning spirits.

I have given a long list of

THESE HAMPERING SINS.

What is to be done with them? "Well," says one, "I do not think we can do anything, sir; these are our besetting sins." Now, do not make any mistake about it, if there is any sin that gets the mastery over you, you will be lost: you are bound to conquer every sin, mind that. You may call it a besetting sin or not, but it must be either overcome by you or it will be your ruin. A man may plead that a certain fault is his besetting sin; but I am not so sure of it. A sin that you wilfully indulge, is that a besetting sin? Certainly not.

If I had to cross Clapham Common to-night and three stout fellows beset me to take away whatever I had got, I would do my little best in self-defence. That is what I call besetting a man. A besetting sin is a sin that sometimes surprises a man; and then he ought to show fight and drive the besetting sin away. If I were to walk over the common every night, arm in arm with a fellow who picked my pocket, I should not say that the man "beset" me. No, he and I are friends, evidently, and the robbery is only a little dodge of our own. If you go wilfully into sin, or tolerate it, and say you cannot help it—well, you have to help it or you will be lost. One thing is certain—either you must conquer sin or sin will conquer you, and to be conquered by sin is everlasting death.

Well, what is to be done? Fall back upon this gracious promise—"He will subdue our iniquities." They have to be subdued; Jesus will do the deed, and in His name we will overcome. If we are slothful, we will, in God's strength, do ten times as much as we should have done had we been naturally of an active turn. If we are angry we will school ourselves till we become meek. Some of the most angry men that ever I have known have come to be the meekest of men. Remember Moses how he slew the Egyptian in his heat, and yet the man Moses became very meek by the grace of God.

You must overcome your sin, my dear hearer, be that sin what it may. Whatever else you forget of this sermon I want to leave that in your heart: you must overcome sin. By the blood of the Lamb it is to be done. By the power of divine grace it must be accomplished. Up! slay this Agag that you thought to spare. Hew him in pieces before the Lord, or else the Lord will hew you in pieces one of these days. God give you grace to get the victory.

VII. Now, the last and seventh point, God will deliver you from of sin. Sin nestles in our nature. Its lair is in the jungle of our heart, and if we are believers in Jesus Christ we must hunt it out. The first thing the Lord does with this indwelling sin is to neutralize it. He puts in His indwelling Spirit to subdue it and overcome it. Next, He begins to drive it out. He said of the Canaanites, "By little and by little I will surely drive them out." Thanks be to God, He has driven out certain of our sins already. I know that I speak to some who are not tempted now to vices that once ruled them with a rod of iron. You have conquered the grosser shapes of sin. Brother, the day will come when there will not be one Canaanite left in the land; when, if you should search through and through, there will be no tendency to sin, no wandering of heart, no error of judgment, no failure of righteousness, no inclination to transgression. You will be as perfect as your covenant head, Jesus Christ.

Where will you be then?

NOT HERE, I TROW.

I notice that God always puts His jewels into fit settings, and the proper setting for a perfect man is the perfect joy of heaven. In a pure region the pure heart shall dwell; and you, believer, shall go on toward that sacred height, till, one of these days, your Lord will say, "Dear child, you have fought long enough with corruption and sin; come up hither; the conflict is all over now." You will look back when you get up to heaven, and you will say to yourself, perhaps—if you can have any such regrets—"I wish I had conquered those sins earlier, fought against them more earnestly, watched against them more vigilantly.

However, forgetting all about regrets, what a song we will raise when we find ourselves quite free from the power of sin! What a song! O you bad-tempered brother, when that anger is all gone, and you will never be angry again, will you not sing? Ah, you, brother, a little inclined to laziness, when you find that you can serve God night and day, will you not sing? And some of us who are inclined to despondency, when our gloom is all gone, and life becomes everlasting joy and sunshine, will not we sing? Yes, I was going to say:

> "Then, loudest of the crowd I'll sing,
> While heaven's resounding mansions ring
> With shouts of sovereign grace;"

I did utter that resolution once in the pulpit, and when I came down the stairs an aged woman said to me, "You made a mistake in your sermon to-night." "Dear soul," I said, "I dare say I made a dozen." "Ah," she said, "but you made one great one. You said that you owed more to God's grace than anybody, and therefore you would sing the loudest. But," she said, "you won't, for I shall." I find all my fellow-Christians, both men and women, are resolved that they will sing the loudest to the praise of grace divine.

What a heaven there will be, and what music there will be in heaven, when our iniquities are subdued. How will the Lord look down with joy upon us all when He shall see us all made like His Son, perfect, faultless, glorious. Then we will sing, "He has subdued our iniquities. Oh, come, let us sing unto the Lord, for he has triumphed gloriously, and all our iniquities has he cast into the sea."

Anticipate that joy, and begin to sing now, and let this be the matter of your song, "Thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord." May that victory be yours and mine. Amen.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

PRIVATE SHORT.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER II.

OF all Charlie Short's triumphs, none was so signal as that over Sergeant Wilmot. He was just the one man who had been proof against his good qualities as a pleasant fellow. But now, all of a sudden, the Sergeant had taken a decided fancy to him; and instead of passing him by, seemed to take every opportunity of saying a kind word to him. And the Sergeant's hearty greetings day by day were not the least pleasant of the drops which made his cup so full. Charlie's heart quite warmed to him.

Our readers will observe that Sergeant Wilmot went to work in a very wise manner, and instead of thawing all at once, did so little by little, every day getting more and more friendly until he had quite got the young private's confidence. He saw clearly enough that to broach the subject of religion to Charlie Short abruptly, and without any preparation, would have spoiled all his chances of doing him good.

"Perhaps if I can get his heart," he used to say to himself, "he'll let me lead him on to give his heart to Christ."

And often did the good Sergeant pray that this might be so, and that God would deliver him from doing or saying anything to hinder the young fellow's recovery. The plan he had after some thought decided to follow was to get him to the Soldiers' Home, and especially to induce him to attend some religious meeting there. So one day, asking Charlie to accompany him for a short walk, he purposely led him past the Home which had been so wisely and lovingly instituted for the good of the soldiers' bodies and souls.

"Have you ever been in there?" asked the Sergeant.

"No," said Charlie rather sheepishly, for he felt that he would have been a much wiser man if he had.

"Let's go in and have something to drink, then, to keep out the cold."

They went in and sat down. How comfortable it looked! There was a capital fire in the stove; the walls were covered with bright pictures and texts; there were papers of all kinds on the table; and indeed everything seemed to have been thought of to make the men comfortable and happy.

"This is better than the public by a long way," said Charlie to himself when he had taken everything in, and saw how contented and happy the men were who were sitting at the table. "I wonder I never found out this place before."

"What do you think of it?" asked the Sergeant after they had got into the road.

"Fine!" replied Charlie.

"Anybody can go there," added the Sergeant; "free and open for us fellows whenever we like to use it. Stunning, isn't it?"

"Aye, that it is," he replied.

When Charlie Short was singing his songs that night, and draining his glasses, he couldn't help contrasting the roughness of this sort of pleasure with the rational comfort of the Soldiers' Home; and though he drunk no less, and staggered to the barracks in the very same state as usual, the sting was felt for all that, and defied all his efforts to soothe and remove it. Never did he feel it more than when he turned out in the morning with a parched tongue and a head ready to split.

"I'll go to that place again as sure as my name's Charlie Short," he inwardly resolved.

But up to this point he had got no farther than a determination to combine the two. How he proceeded to a point far beyond this will be seen.

"We are going to have a temperance meeting. Would any of you like to join us?"

So spake the lady who superintended the Soldiers' Home to the men in the reading-room of that institution. The invitation was kindly given, and from its very tone could not but conciliate the most unwilling.

The response to it was just what might have been expected, for not a man there but immediately rose and followed her into the large room where the meeting was to be held.

One man among them, however, was really surprised at himself, for he had then been at the point of rising to join his comrades at the public house; and whatever induced him with such apparent willingness to accompany the others he could never say. Need I say that the man in question was no other than Charlie Short?

There was no time to change his mind had he felt ever so inclined to do so, for the meeting was just commencing, and he was borne in by the quick movement of those who had been sitting beside him.

When he found a seat, and had time to look around him, he was surprised to find so many soldiers there. He never thought so many red-coats could have been induced to attend such a meeting as that. At the same time to find himself in the midst of so many of his own comrades removed the feeling of strangeness which he had at first experienced.

Now he had often heard of temperance meetings, but never before this had he attended one, and it was with much curiosity that he prepared himself to listen. He quite expected to hear total abstinence praised to the skies by the men who spoke, but what surprised him most was the way in which they mixed it up with religion. Not a soldier who spoke but could say what the Lord had done for his soul; and thrilling were many of the stories which they told from their own experience.

One and all insisted with much fervor that it was little good for a soldier to attempt to break off from the drink without coming out on the Lord's side; that the public house and the Lord Jesus Christ could never be embraced; and that for the sake of the one the other must be given up. But the speech which had the greatest effect on Charlie Short was Sergeant Wilmot's, who, without mentioning names, managed to weave into his speech the very career which Charlie had himself passed through, the downward path he was leading, and the two poor women at home whose tears were, perhaps even at that very moment, streaming down with sorrow.

"Think of your mothers, young men," he said; "think of your sweethearts if you've got any, and don't forget that your pleasure, as you call it, is pain to them, and perhaps death. Think of your souls too, and remember that there's many a lad here who this very night will be prayed for with strong crying and tears by her who gave him life. Take an old soldier's advice who knows what he is talking about, and break with the drink to-night by coming to the Lord Jesus Christ and giving your heart to Him."

Poor Charlie! How miserable he felt! What guilty thoughts were rising within him! How true it all was, every word of it! His poor old mother and Jenny, how unhappy he must have made them! Would God forgive such a miserable wretch as he was?

Charlie signed the pledge that night, for he was determined to have no more of the drink. But he did more than that, for when the same kind lady asked him as he was going out to come again, and added, "But be sure to give the Lord Jesus your heart, and do it to-night," Charlie really did it. Not at once, but before the night was over. For the Sergeant and he had a long talk that night, and Charlie saw it all, and understood for the first time the wonderful love of Jesus in dying on the cross for him, and with his heart believed it, and was saved.

To dismiss Charlie Short at this stage would be rather a pity, and especially as one or two who may have read thus far about him are calling him a good fellow spoiled. So before we bid him a final good-by we may as well knock such an idea on the head and dispose of it forever.

True, Private Short had become a teetotaler and turned religious, but he wasn't less of a man for that. When, a year or so later on, he got mentioned in the dispatches as the most plucky man in the regiment; when, in the face of the enemy, and with a storm of bullets raining upon him, he bore away into a place of safety a wounded comrade; when again and again he was the first to enter the deadly breach—if he wasn't worthy of the name of a man, what other name could you give him?

Neither did his religion affect his voice, or force him to sing less. The only difference it made in this particular was to change the songs. Instead of singing for the devil, he began to sing for the Lord who died for him—that was all. For my part, I think a changed heart improves a man's voice rather than spoils it.

But didn't it sour him? perhaps you will ask. Sour him! Why it made him more merry than ever; and it made him happy in a way he never had felt before. It put true peace in the place of false, and made him smile in circumstances which would in the old days have made him well-nigh cry.

Have you got any more questions to ask? Ah! one more, I see.

Well, now, didn't Charlie turn his back upon his old friends? No, he didn't. There was one thing he did, though; he turned his back upon their sins. He wouldn't go to their public house. But to say his heart changed toward them is great libel. Why, the very first thing he did was to go up to his old mates and beg them to give the Lord Jesus their hearts as he had done. And when they said "No, not they," instead of giving them up he was up and at them again and again, telling them what a bad place the public was, begging them to spend their spare time at the Soldiers' Home, and declaring that if they took up with the Lord Jesus they'd wonder they'd ever been such fools as to take up with sin and the drink. A man must have a friendly, loving sort of heart to take so much trouble with fellows as that, I think.

Ask Charlie's mother whether she thought he was a good fellow spoiled.

Ask Charlie's sweetheart, too, what she thought about it.

Ask the colonel of his regiment whether he was sorry or glad at the turn Charlie had taken.

And if these arguments don't weigh much with you, I would simply say in conclusion, Look at Charlie's stripes—first one, then two, then three—and say whether or no he wasn't better without the drink and with the Lord Jesus Christ.

If you still hold that Charlie Short had made a mistake, I would simply look you straight in the face and tell you that you are making one ten thousand times greater.

Pauper Millionnaires.—Rev. W. Hay Aitken, the eminent English evangelist, in one of his noonday addresses recently to London business men remarked: "The wise man says, and he generally speaks pretty near the mark, 'There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing' (Prov. 13: 7). I believe there are many such men in London. They want to make their 'fortune'—strange word! if men understood what it is to be really fortunate, how differently many would act—even though all their finer and nobler feelings go to the wall. At last they reach the end of their ambition, and die rich! I remember an old gentleman in Liverpool whose father, after giving large sums of money to other sons, said to this one, 'As for you, John, I have left you the business; you must do as I have done—sink or swim.' 'Thank you, sir,' he replied; 'I will swim.' And he did it. He devoted his whole life to the acquistion of money. He is now an old man, on the brink of eternity, and extremely wealthy, though to get a £10 note out of him is a very difficult business indeed. I heard of another man who was so overburdened by his wealth that when a relative died and left him £100,000, he cursed him, and said, 'Did the man think I had not got quite enough to ruin my soul already?' He really had nothing! There was not a soul in the world to love him; nobody cared two straws whether he lived or died. Worth a half-million, and yet had nothing!"

Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, Mass., who is now in England, is about to proceed to India on a mission to the Hindoos. Many of these people, who have cast off their hereditary heathen belief, have accepted the cold and heartless doctrines of Deism or Socinianism. Mr. Cook is deeply moved by their state, and is anxious to tell them of the better way and of a living personal Saviour.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK,

February 4, 1881.

The Deathbed of Carlyle—Recollections of his Residence—A Portrait of the Thinker with the Toothache—His Library—The Unadorned Workshop—The Room Characteristic of the Worker—The Habits of Literary Men—Trouble in the British Parliament—The Issue one God only can Settle—A Week of Sickness and Sudden Death—Planetary Warnings—Readiness for Sudden Emergency a Duty—Preferences for Sudden Death.

DURING the last week the world has hovered over the deathbed of the great essayist, satirist and revolutionary thinker,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

He has done more than any man of this century to slay cant, philosophic cant, religious cant. Though he has complained much of men and institutions, he has been the most magnificent fault-finder of the ages. He has been the mightiest foe of sham and subterfuge. He has for half a century been the great literary iconoclast.

It is a solemn time in London, and in the world now that he is dying. The world, sometimes impatient of his rebuff, will grow tender over his memory. Mighty eulogies are about to be written and pronounced. Poet, and rhetorician, and biographer, and politician, and moralist will in a few hours take up the theme, and all civilized nations will uncover their heads at his obsequies. Bulletins day by day have announced him worse and worse, and the last says he can survive only a few hours. Everything concerning him will now attract attention.

I was most deeply interested when I first saw his residence. It is in Chelsea, a suburb of London, and on a narrow street, with not even a house in front, but instead thereof a long range of brick wall. You go through a narrow hall and turn to the left and are in the literary workshop where some of the strongest thunderbolts of the world have been forged. The two front windows have on them scant curtains of reddish calico, hung at the top of the lower sash, so as not to keep the sun from looking down, but to hinder the street from looking in. The room has a lounge covered with the same material that I have spoken of, and of construction such as you would find in the plainest house among the mountains. It looks as if it had been made by an author not accustomed to saw or hammer, and in the interstices of mental work. I think he made it himself.

On the sides of the room are a few woodcuts in plain frames, or pinned against the wall, also a photograph of Mr. Carlyle, taken one day, as his family say, when he had a violent toothache, and could attend to nothing else, and it is his favorite picture, though it gives him a face more than ordinarily severe and troubled. I happened somewhere after returning from Europe to speak of that picture in his study, and some months after, I got a letter from an artist in London saying: "I see you admire that rough sketch of Thomas Carlyle with the toothache. There are but three pictures of that style. One Mr. Carlyle has, another I have, who made it, and the other is on the Atlantic coming to you if you will please to accept it."

In long shelves, unpainted and unsheltered by glass or door, is the library of the world renowned thinker. The books are worn as though he had bought them to read. Many of them are uncommon books, the titles of which we never saw before. American literature is almost ignored, while Germany monopolizes many of the spaces. We noticed the absence of theological works save those of Thomas Chalmers, whose name and genius he well-nigh worshipped. The relation between Thomas Carlyle and Thomas Chalmers will appear after awhile. It is known to but few. I had shown me in Edinburgh, the first time I saw that city, a most remarkable letter written by Thomas Carlyle to Thomas Chalmers, the first part of it devoted to eulogy of Doctor Chalmers and great admiration of his work, and the rest of it descriptive of his own religious doubts.

I copied that letter and carried it to my hotel; but afterward I bethought myself, I had better return the copy, as it is a private letter, and it might somehow get out of my possession, and go into the public prints before it ought to go there. But a wonderful letter. He never wrote anything more tremendous. Beautiful, grand, melancholy.

Speaking of this room of Carlyle's, the carpets are old and worn and faded, not because he cannot afford better, but because he would have his house a perpetual protest against the world's sham. It is a place not calculated to give inspiration to a writer. No easy chair, no soft divans, no wealth of upholstery, but simply a place to work and stay. Never having heard a word about it, it was nevertheless just such a place as we expected. We had there confirmed our former theory of a man's study as only a part of himself, or a piece of tight-fitting clothing. It is the shell of the tortoise just made to fit the totoise's back. Thomas Carlyle could have no other kind of a workshop. What would he do with a damask covered table, or a gilded inkstand, or an upholstered window?

Starting with the idea that the intellect is all, and the body naught but an adjunct or an appendage, he will show that the former can live and think without any approval of the latter. He will give the intellect all costly stimulus, and send the body supperless to bed. Thomas Carlyle taken as a premise, this homely room is the inevitable conclusion. The study is a part of the mental development. Do not blame a man for the style of his literary apartments, any more than you would for the color of his hair or the shape of his features.

If Hobbes carries his study with him, and his pen and his inkstand in the top of his cane, so let him carry them. If Lamartine can best compose while walking in the park, paper and pencil in hand, so let him ramble. If Robert Hall thinks easiest lying flat on his back, let him be prostrate. Do not criticize Charles Dickens because he threw all his study windows wide open and the shades up. It may fade the carpet, but it will pour sunshine into the hearts of a million readers. If Thomas Carlyle choose to call around an ink spattered table Goethe and Schiller and Richter, and dissect the shams of the world with a plain goose quill, so be it. The horns of an ox's head are not more certainly a part of the ox than Thomas Carlyle's study and its appointments are a part of Thomas Carlyle.

Now he leaves all this. After struggling with many doubts and fears, in the time of old age, I hear he has come back to the simplicity of the Gospel, and when he goes away, I hope he will go away into everlasting peace, and into the place where there are no clouds and no doubts, and no struggles, and no pain. In a few days he will go out of his home never to return; but the plain brick house in Chelsea will be the Mecca to which generations will make pilgrimages. "The wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish." Neither the wisdom of the one nor the ignorance of the other can win discharge in that war.

The greatest political event of the week is the culmination of concerning Irish affairs. Thirty-five Irish members ejected. Both styles of administration have tried their hand on the pacification of Ireland, and neither Tory nor Liberal, neither Beaconsfield nor Gladstone has succeeded. The fact is that the controversy between England and Ireland going on for centuries is, after all the legislation and eloquence and statesmanship on the subject, as unsettled as at the start.

Only one Being in the universe can tell what will be the upshot of this bitter contest. My opinion is that as the slavery agitation in this country grew worse and worse for forty years, until God settled it in the most unexpected and peremptory way, so the fight between landlord and tenant in Ireland will grow in acerbity until in some divine way not now suspected, the whole trouble will be settled once and forever. Administration will follow administration, and one style of policy will follow another style of policy, and when all parties shall be in despair as to what is best to do next, God will take His hand out of His bosom, and strike for the rectification of all wrong, and for the upbuilding of all righteousness. How soon that day shall come will depend much on the faith and prayers of the good transatlantic and cisatlantic.

Higher than Parliaments and Congresses and presidential chairs sits the Ruler of nations. To Him we commit Ireland and her sufferings, England and her perplexities. May the land of Goldsmith and Burke and Emmet and Daniel O'Connell soon bloom into a peace and prosperity which shall astonish all nations.

I remark again that the week has been alarming for

SICKNESSES AND SUDDEN DEMISE.

Some months ago it was said that in consequence of certain planetary juxtapositions, we were on the eve of revolutions and plagues and disturbances of all sorts. Indeed something unusual seems to be the matter. I never knew such a time of unexpected decease. You have all noticed it. The warnings are ringing on every side. While I would not inculcate a morbidity on this subject, I think it would be well to be ready for every emergency. We do not want to go blundering out of this life and aghast into the next.

What preparation we make for the next life, we will have to make on this side the cold stream. Wide awake about all other interests, we ought to be wide awake about the best way of exchanging worlds. If a man is going across the Atlantic Ocean, he does not want to go on board a craft which will sink in the first cyclone. If equipped for the journey from this world to the next, we cannot start too soon. If you are going from one city on earth to another city, you prefer the swiftest train, and if there is one train that will take you in two hours and another train that will take you in ten hours, you take the train that goes the swifter. Why not have a common-sense preference in regard to the way of going out of this life? Instead of going out of this life by slow disease, why not prefer to go like a flash?

But we must leave all this to God. If we are to go slowly, then we will go slowly. If we are to go swiftly, we will go swiftly. I often hear people say how they would like to leave this world. I have sometimes thought I had preferences, but I have come to have none. I would a great deal rather have God's wisdom in this matter than my ignorance. All these matters are determined higher up, and it becomes us to submit, and to have no fear if we have made God our everlasting friend.

While on earth let us be busy, helpful, sympathetic, genial, prayerful, Christian. Then all will be well, whether we tarry here among old friends or go over to the majority. We all need to have our ideas of the next world made so graphic and real that we shall understand that going out of this earth into heaven is only an exchange of apartments in the one great mansion of the universe, from a room partly lighted to one full of sunshine, from a room of hard work to a room of luxurious ease, from workshop to pillow, from kitchen to parlor, from dungeon to throne. Believing this, you will not be alarmed at the thought that your departure may be most expeditious. Sudden death, sudden glory.

A Curious Mirage was Visible at Minot, Me. on January 13th. The Portland Argus says, "about 7 A.M. the inmates of a farm-house in Minot discovered the reflection of the city of Lewiston vividly portrayed upon the sky. The city building, churches, one mill—thought to be the Androscoggin—trees, Lisbon Street, a train at the main Central Depot, and numerous buildings were distinctly seen and recognized. This marvellous spectacle was visible about one half hour from the time it was first discovered until its disappearance. As the sun rose it gradually faded away, the northern part of the city first disappearing from view. The farm-house from which this curious sight was witnessed is situated upon the highest point of land lying between Portland and Streak Mountain. This remarkable phenomenon can be accounted for by the operation of known natural laws, but there will one day be a glorious city visible in the sky, with which the laws of nature will have nothing to do. That will be no mirage. (Rev. 21: 10–27.)

A Letter from Donald.

"THE Arabs say we have insulted the sheik of the village by entering the tomb," said Miss Schwarz, "and they threaten all sorts of dreadful things. But I will manage them; don't be alarmed! Have you any money with you, Sir William?"

"Yes, a little," he said, "not very much. How much will they want?"

"Oh, they shall not have very much," she said. "Have you a mejedie? It is a large Turkish coin—larger than half a crown; it is worth about three and sixpence" (eighty-four cents).

"Yes, I think I have," he said; "I will look."

"No, not now, please," she said; "wait a minute or two."

So she had another long conversation with the Arabs, and then, to our astonishment, they brought up our horses and helped us to mount in the most gallant manner. Then, when we were quite ready to start, Miss Schwarz turned to Sir William.

"They may have the mejedie now," she said; "if you will give it to me, I will hand it to the sheik, and he will divide it among them." For they were all holding out their hands greedily to Sir William to receive the coin.

"Now it is all right," she said; "let us ride on quickly."

"You are a splendid dragoman, Miss Schwarz!" said Sir William; "how did you manage them so well?"

"Oh, I threatened them with the English consul, and the German consul, and with the Pacha, and with all sorts of other authorities," she said, laughing. "I knew they would not dare to hurt us; they would never hear the last of it if they did. And, besides, the sheik knows my father well, and as soon as I mentioned his name they became very civil. I hope you did not mind giving them the mejedie, Sir William; but I promised them a little reward if they were good."

"Oh, not at all," he said, laughing; "it was a cheap way of getting off. They would not get much each, poor fellows!"

"Oh, quite plenty," said Miss Schwarz; "if they had been more civil we might have given them a little more. I hope you were not very much frightened, Miss Trafford?"

"Oh, only a little," said Evelyn; but she looked pale and tired, and we were all very glad to get safely back to the hotel.

Evelyn lay on the sofa in the sitting-room all the evening, and I sat beside her, while Sir William went into the coffee-room and discussed the adventures of the day with a party of English travellers who had arrived that evening from Jaffa.

My beautiful ferns and flowers looked withered after the heat of the day, so I gave them fresh water, and pressed one or two of the prettiest in blotting-paper. Then I sat down beside Evelyn, with my work in my hand, but I did not feel inclined to sew. I felt very dull and depressed, and Evelyn seemed so likewise. I said to myself that it was only the reaction after the excitement and fright we had experienced that afternoon, and yet I felt that, after all, that was not the real reason.

Was it because—could it be because—Mr. Stanley had gone away? For, after all, he was only a stranger; a pleasant—yes, a very pleasant—travelling companion, who had been very kind and useful to us when we were in his company, but who would think no more of us now that he had gone away. Like ships meeting on the sea, we had gone side by side for a little time, but now we had parted—probably never to meet again. That was all; it was nothing to be dull or miserable about. And I was quite angry with myself for having given way to the feeling of depression which had crept over me. I tried to think of my work, of Maggie, of our encounter with the Arabs in the tomb—of anything but of Mr. Stanley's mysterious disappearance!

But, somehow or other, I could not tell why, my thoughts would come back to it, in spite of all my efforts to turn them to other subjects. I could not help wondering whether Evelyn was thinking of the same thing. Why was she so quiet this evening? Could it be that she missed Mr. Stanley? Was I right in fancying that was the reason? Did she really care for him more than for an ordinary acquaintance?

I looked up at her, and found she was watching me with a curious expression on her face—half amused half inquiring. I rather resented it, I am afraid, and looked down again quickly, and went on steadily with my work.

"It will all come right, May, dear," she said after a pause.

"What will come right, Evelyn?" I asked; "what do you mean?"

"I mean about Mr. Stanley's mysterious disappearance," she said, smiling; "I am sure we shall get a solution of the mystery in a day or two."

"Oh, yes," I said carelessly; "we shall have to find another dragoman; that is the only drawback."

"The only drawback!" she repeated.

"You don't think so," I said.

"You don't think so either, May," she said; "I know you don't."

"Well, perhaps not," I said. "How close it is to-night, Evelyn! Would you mind me taking a little walk on the veranda outside the window—to get cool before bedtime?"

"Oh, not at all," she said, smiling; "go, May, dear, it will do you good."

So I left my work and went outside the window.

It was a quiet, starlight night, and the stars in the east are wonderfully brilliant and beautiful. I walked up and down for some time, not exactly thinking, not exactly praying, but with my heart lifted upward, above this changing world, to the unchanging Friend above. And an answer came to that upward appeal. It came in the recollection of some words I had heard a few days before: "Next time a trouble comes which you cannot understand, and which seems so very hard to bear, just say to yourself it is God's chisel at work upon me—you will find it such a help." And it was a help to me; the very help that I needed—God's chisel at work upon me, then I must not complain; I must not murmur; I must not even wonder; I must just trust and wait.

The next day was Sunday, and I think we were all glad of this. Sir William felt unable to make any plans without Mr. Stanley's advice, but as we had already been several times to the pretty little English church, we had no difficulty in knowing how to spend our time on Sunday.

The service began at ten o'clock, so we were up early and started for church directly after breakfast. I felt comforted and rested during the service, and hoped to get just the message I needed from the sermon. I must confess I was somewhat disappointed when the text was given out, for it seemed to me that no comfort or help could be found in it. It was a singular text, and one I had never noticed before. The preacher was a German by birth, but he spoke English as if had been his native language. We were told afterward that he was a converted Jew, and the missionary to the Jews in Jersualem.

The text was from Leviticus 23: 40: "Ye shall take you the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days."

The clergyman first answered the thought which I had had in my heart, that there was no lesson for me in the text, by showing that all God's word was written for our learning, and that these Jewish feasts and ceremonies were wonderfully suggestive and helpful, if we looked into their real meaning and significance.

The text contained directions for the Feast of Tabernacles, the feast of joy. It came after the Day of Atonement, after pardon had been obtained, after sin had been put away. First must come forgiveness, then follows joy; pardon first, rejoicing afterward.

"And in the text," he said, "we are given four conditions under which alone the joy of the Lord can be ours; four characteristics of the true Christian, who can alone rejoice before his God."

I felt in my own heart, as he was speaking, how little I knew of the true joy of the Lord. I was so easily cast down by little earthly troubles and worries, and I so soon lost the happiness and peace of feeling the Lord's presence with me, and the Lord's smile upon me. The last two days, for instance; oh, how depressed and miserable had I felt! Could it be that I was overlooking and neglecting one of the four things pictured in the text?

Then the sermon went on to show that although these four kinds of trees meant nothing to our English ears, they meant a very great deal to the men to whom the direction was given, for, to them, each kind of tree was a word-picture of some particular grace. Just as we speak of the innocent daisy, the humble lily of the valley, the modest violet; and just as we take these flowers as emblems to us of innocence, humility, and modesty; and just as we talk of "a butterfly life," and every one knows at once what we mean—so in the same way, the Jews had emblematic meanings for different trees, and flowers, and other things in nature, and they understood perfectly well what was symbolized when these trees or flowers were mentioned.

The four kinds of trees in the text had a very deep and beautiful meaning for them. The goodly trees, or citron trees, were their emblem for a pure and true heart; the palm trees were a picture to them of uprightness and bold straightforwardness.

The willows of the brook were to them a picture of a mouth filled with words of kindness and truth. The leaves of the willow were thought to be in the shape of a mouth, and they were most particular that only those willow trees should be used in the Feast of Tabernacles as had smooth, soft leaves. Those of a sharp and prickly nature, and the edge of the leaves of which is rough like a saw, were never allowed to be gathered or used in this ceremony, that they might understand thereby, that in order to have true joy they must set a watch before their mouth, and only suffer words of truth and kindness to come out of it.

Four characteristics then were at once brought to their minds, when the direction in the text was given. The Israelites understood at once, that to be able really to rejoice in the Lord they must have a heart pure toward God, they must be upright as the palm-tree, they must be contented as the myrtle, and they must have mouths ever speaking words of kindness and truth.

And then he asked us to examine ourselves by these four tests. Were we keeping the door of our hearts, guarding it against all evil thoughts, evil motives, evil desires? Were we also upright before God and man, growing ever heavenward, Godward?

Were we contented and happy to be just where God placed us, and to do just the work that God had chosen for us to do? And how about our words; were we careful to be strictly truthful in every little matter? And did we guard against ever letting unkind or hasty words come out of our mouth? "If not," he said, "how could we expect to be able to rejoice before the Lord?"

I have not time to write down more of the sermon now, but I felt it very much; it went straight to my heart, and made me feel that it was my own fault that I was so seldom in a rejoicing frame of mind. Oh, how earnestly I prayed that I might be more careful over my heart, that I might be upright as the palm, contented as the myrtle, and that my words might ever be acceptable in the sight of my Lord.

A few days afterward, as we were sitting at breakfast, the waiter came into the room with a letter. Sir William looked at the postmark.

"Alexandria!" he said; "well, I am glad he has written at last!"

"Is it from Mr. Stanley, papa?" asked Evelyn.

"Yes," he said, "I should think so; I do not know any one else who is likely to be in Alexandria."

He opened the letter and glanced hastily at its contents. Then he took up the envelope, and looked at it again; then he turned once more to the first page of the letter and began to read it through.

Evelyn and I sat watching him. I tried to go on with my breakfast, but I felt as if the food would choke me, for Sir William looked more and more impatient and annoyed as he went on reading.

When he had finished he tossed the letter on the table, saying angrily, "He is a good-for-nothing rascal!"

I looked up quickly, and Evelyn asked, in a trembling voice,

"Who is, papa—not Mr. Stanley?"

"No, not Mr. Stanley," he said; "at least he may be, I do not know that he is; but that cousin of yours, Donald Trafford—the letter is from him. An idle, good-for-nothing rascal, that is what he is! And I shall tell his father so when I see him!"

"Let me have the letter, papa," said Evelyn. She was as white as a sheet and trembling with agitation.

"Well, don't trouble about it, darling," said Sir William, in quite a different tone from that in which he had spoken before; "he is not worth troubling about; he really is not. If I could only get you to see that. Here, take the letter; I suppose I shall have to let you see it; but don't make yourself ill again, for my sake!"

THE PREACHING OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for February 20th, Luke 4 : 14-32. Golden Text, ver. 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord Jesus is Himself the Word of God, the message of God to man, "being . . . the express image of His person, and upholding all things by the Word of His power" (Heb. 1 : 3). He is not as John the Baptist was, and as every other true preacher of Christ ought to be, "a voice," but more, even that which the voice communicates. "Never man spake like this man" was the testimony of His enemies (John 7 : 46). "Thou hast the words of eternal life" was the testimony of His friends (John 6 : 68). And yet in His human life He received from His Father every word which He spake (John 14 : 10), that He might bring Himself into the position of those who should follow Him.

Conquered temptation was His great immediate preparation for His preaching. It was the Word of His Father which He was about to proclaim, and He had first tried and proved its power against the enemy, and found in the forty days and forty nights of fasting through which He had passed that "Men shall not live by bread alone, but by every Word of God" (ver. 4). John the Baptist was fitted for his testimony by an unusual life of loneliness and austerity in the desert; the Lord Jesus was prepared for His by fighting over the ground of all conceivable temptation in the enemy of souls; and being tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin (Heb. 14 : 1). He could speak as man of God's deliverance with all the authority of conscious experience. He had "suffered being tempted" (Heb. 2 : 18), and was yet not overcome, because He counted on the stability of His Father's written Word.

There is no such preparation for preaching as this experience of God's faithfulness. There is a weight about the words of those who have had experience of God which no power of eloquence, no acquaintance with doctrine, no amount of practice can give. Let a preacher be himself awed under the solemnity of his message, and all his hearers will be awed with him; let him break down under the power of his own words which speak of the love of God, and no heart in the audience will be unmoved. It is easy to know whether a preacher lives in the known presence of God, for when he does so there is something about him akin to that radiance which lit up Moses's face when the children of Israel could not look upon it, something of that power which made Elijah master of the situation wherever he was, with King Ahab, with Obadiah, with the captain of fifty. There is a something which men feel without being able to explain it; it is the unseen God with them; Joseph had it in Egypt, and Potiphar felt it; Stephen had it before the council, and the power was irresistible; Paul had it, and neither Felix nor Agrippa could help feeling the power that was with him.

The Lord Jesus, fresh from His conflict with the devil in the wilderness, "returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee." It is a glorious thing to come forth strengthened from the hour of temptation, strengthened in the consciousness of God's almightiness. Every preacher and every teacher who comes out of temptation strengthened carries his tested strength into his preaching. "There went a fame of Him through all the regions round about. And He taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all." "He taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes" (Mark 1 : 22). "They were astonished at His doctrine, for His Word was with power" (Luke 4 : 32). And just so far as Christ speaks through us, in our word "with power," just so far as we come out of every trial and temptation strong in the Lord, will the simplest words which we speak for Him tell with power upon those to whom He sends us.

At Nazareth, where He had been brought up, we are told the subject-matter of His preaching. It was nothing original, although He was the Son of God. He used God's Word already written, and applied it. And oh, how different is God's teaching to that of man! "Do the best you can, live according to your conscience, struggle against sin, and then satisfy your conscience that no man can do better than you;" this is man's gospel. But how utterly groundless it is! It meets men who are already debtors to God, and says to them, "Do all you can to pay your way," without making any provision for the past load of debt which is hanging upon their consciences. We want a gospel which will meet us where we are, helpless, hopeless bankrupts. A gospel which ignores our past sins is no gospel for "the poor . . . the broken-hearted . . . the captives." God sees the unconverted to be poor, whatever they may think of themselves; if they are not broken-hearted, there is enough to make them so, if they face the reality of their state before Him.

The Lord Jesus opened the Word of God at "the place where it was written. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord." He came there to rescue those who could not help themselves. Reader, are you poor? Are you a debtor to God with nothing to pay? Knowing that you ought to love Him, do you find no love in your heart with which to love Him? Knowing that your sins are grievous, do you find no power in your heart to grieve over them? Knowng that you ought to believe on Him, do you look into the resources of your own heart and find that you have there no provision, no love, no sorrow for sin, no faith? Then are you poor—poor enough to want a friend? There is a message for you in the preaching of Jesus. Good news, for that is what "gospel" means—good news to the poor. What is it then? Poor debtor, thy debt is paid—paid by Jesus on the cross. Your great Creditor says, "I have found a ransom" (Job 33 : 24); your Redeemer tells you that your debt is cancelled. "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins; return unto me, for I have redeemed thee" (Isa. 44 : 22). "But my love is so cold, and my faith is so weak," you say. That is the very reason that Jesus' faith, and Jesus' love have stood in its place before God. Now take the good news, and let heart and voice praise Him.

"But," another may say, "I am a slave to sin which I cannot conquer. My temper is beyond my control, I have secret temptations which are too strong for me, I cannot overcome my feverish anxiety." Bless God, the anointed Saviour came to preach deliverance to the captives. You say, "But I pray and strive, and all to no purpose." Very likely. But He did not come to preach that the captives should pray themselves free or struggle themselves free. Blessed be His name, He undertook the battle, and He has fought it and won the victory. "Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. 6 : 6). When Satan can persuade you to look at yourself, he will say, "Now you have always fallen into such and such a sin, there is no help for it, you will fall again," and you can only sigh and groan and fear. But look right away to Jesus; He tells you that that "body of sin" of yours is crucified, is nailed tight up to the cross, that so you should "not serve sin." "But," you say, "I feel sin working in me." Then, my brother, you are not keeping your place. "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let a woman reckon herself to be my cook, and she will be out of place except in the cooking; let a man reckon himself to be a printer, and if he is called upon to drive a pair of horses he will feel that he is out of place; let a man reckon himself dead, because God says he is, and every appeal of Satan to find him alive unto sin will be futile, because he keeps his place in Christ, and in that place Satan cannot enter. Bless God, there is real deliverance from sin in Christ, open to the experience of all who will take and keep their place in Christ and not in themselves.

In the prophecy (Isa. 51 : 1, 2) from which the subject of Christ's preaching on this occasion was taken, the words "recovering of sight to the blind" are wanting; the Lord added them. No doubt our blessed Lord referred to physical and spiritual sight. Truly, we never hear of one blind man who came to Jesus for healing and was turned away unhealed. But how often Scripture speaks of the spiritually blind! "Blindness in part is happened to Israel" (Rom. 11 : 25); "Anoint thine eyes with eyesalve that thou mayest see" (Rev. 3 : 18); "To open their eyes and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God" . . . (Acts 26 : 18). The Lord Jesus says, "The light of the body is the eye," and He would have our whole body to be "full of light" (Luke 11 : 34-36); transparent, "having no part dark," that in every word and movement we may "shine as lights in the world" (Phil. 2 : 15), and that we ourselves may have no difficulty in recognizing the mind and will of our God.

What was the result of the Master's preaching? If Paul knew that his words and those of his companions in labor must be a savor of life unto life or of death unto death (2 Cor. 2 : 15), how much more must the very words of the Word of God Himself be "quick and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit . . . a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart? (Heb. 4 : 12). Alas! for these men of Nazareth, and for the hundreds and thousands who follow their example, "the Word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it" (Heb. 4 : 2). The first impression was profound, and it was caused by the simple reading of the passage from Isaiah; but every word was a living reality; the Spirit of the Lord was upon Him who pronounced the words, He was anointed, and stood there in His office as the Messiah waiting only to be trusted, and He waited in vain. Were there none poor enough there to need His redemption? Were there no broken-hearted ones to need His healing? no blind? no captives? The synagogue was filled with such, but they did not believe on Him. They were almost gained; they had bowed beneath His power, when He had said unto them, This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears. They felt that it was true, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth; but the enemy was at hand, and whispered, "Are you going to think that the son of the carpenter is anything more than you are? If He had been a prophet, you would have found it out before now. 'Is not this Joseph's son?'" And the sorrowing Saviour had the experience first in the home of His childhood, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life" (John 5 : 40). There He was ready to save, ready to heal, ready to open blind eyes, ready to set captives free, and because of prejudice they would not let Him do it. Nay, more; when He quoted to them the unbelief and the consequent fearful loss of blessing, of those who did not believe in the prophetical office of Elijah and Elisha, their indifference turned to enmity, and they sought to persecute the Son of God even unto death.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Panic has Fallen on the Ranks of the Irish Land League. The founder of the movement and its most conspicuous leader and organizer, Michael Davitt, was arrested last week and condemned to seven years penal servitude. Davitt was one of the Irish political prisoners who were released by the clemency of the British Government before the expiration of their terms of imprisonment. The original sentence was for fifteen years, and Davitt had completed eight years when he was liberated. The ticket of leave given to him bore the indorsement that it might be revoked at the pleasure of the Queen. When therefore Davitt delivered speeches of an inflammatory character and spoke of "Every sod beneath our feet" becoming "a soldier's sepulchre," rather than that victory should be lost, he must have known that his liberty was in peril.

The government had received information from an American firm that a number of explosive machines had been shipped to Ireland, and it was known that attempts were arranged to blow up several public buildings in London, with other evidence of a dangerous and far-reaching conspiracy. The ministers therefore decided to be first in striking the blow. Davitt was quietly arrested in Dublin and taken to London; his ticket of leave was revoked and he was sent to the convict establishment at Dartmoor to complete his sentence. As he is in delicate health he will not be put to hard labor, and the severity of his imprisonment will be mitigated as far as is possible.

Decisive Action has been Taken in the British Parliament to quell the obstructive tactics of Mr. Parnell and his friends. The House of Commons met on Monday afternoon, January 31st, and the debate on the Coercion Bill was resumed. The Prime Minister asked that a division on the bill might be taken that night, but Mr. Parnell announced the intention of the Irish members to prevent the progress of the bill by all the means in their power. Then came a trial of endurance. The House would not adjourn, and the Irish members persisted in obstructive motions. The session continued until nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, when, after the House had sat for forty-one hours, the Speaker summarily stopped the debate on his own responsibility. Violent excitement followed, in the midst of which Mr. Parnell moved the impeachment of the Speaker, and Mr. Gladstone announced that he would propose rules of debate giving increased power to the Speaker, under specified circumstances, to resist obstructive debate.

A Scene in Parliament Almost Unparalleled in the annals of that assembly occurred February 3d. The Irish members went to the House, excited by the arrest of Michael Davitt, which had taken place that morning, and by the apprehension that the rules to be introduced by Mr. Gladstone would take from them their weapon of obstruction. As soon as the session opened the ministers were questioned as to the cause of Davitt's arrest, and the reply was given that it was in consequence of his having violated one of the conditions of his ticket of leave.

Mr. Gladstone proceeded to introduce his motion, but was interrupted by an Irish member who refused to obey the commands of the Speaker. A like course was adopted by the other Irish members present, and as they persisted in defying the Speaker's authority, they were all suspended by a formal vote of the House from legislative functions during the remainder of the sitting. They refused to withdraw voluntarily, and the police were summoned; then the strange spectacle was seen of thirty-five members of Parliament being removed by force from their places.

The episode has taken the public by surprise. So much patience had been displayed by the Government and the House of Commons toward the Irish party that vigorous action was not expected. The organs of the advanced section of the Liberal party condemn the procedure, but the general opinion of the British press is that the tactics of Mr. Parnell and his friends had been submitted to long enough, and that the dignity of Parliament required some such action as has been adopted.

Mr. Parnell has irritated and offended those statesmen most anxious to initiate remedial measures in Ireland, and has delayed the introduction of those measures into Parliament. His course in and out of the House of Commons has thus tended to the injury of the cause he professes to have at heart.

Thomas Carlyle, the Philosopher, Essayist, and historian, whose works are extensively read on both sides of the Atlantic, died on Saturday, February 5th, at the advanced age of eighty-five. He had complained for some time of increasing infirmities, and his niece who had watched him with the devotion of a daughter, felt convinced two weeks ago that his end was approaching. Early last week he sank into a state of unconsciousness from which he never revived.

Carlyle was born at Ecclefechan, in Scotland, in 1796. He was the son of a farmer, who, recognizing his son's brilliant abilities, gave him a first-class education. He entered Edinburgh University in 1810, and for some time contemplated a ministerial career. After a severe mental and spiritual struggle he relinquished the idea of the ministry and devoted himself to literature. He was a bold and original thinker, and expressed himself in terse, epigrammatic sentences, full of fire and life. His "History of the French Revolution" attracted public attention, and since that book was issued his career has been one of uninterrupted success. Among his numerous works are "Sarter Resartus," "The Life and Letters of Cromwell," "The Life of Frederick the Great," "Past and Present," and "Hero Worship." A rumor is current that in his later years he avowed himself a follower of Jesus and died trusting in Him. The confirmation of the report would be received with thankfulness and true pleasure.

Turkey and Greece are Actively Preparing for the desperate struggle which now seems to be inevitable. All the government departments at Constantinople have been ordered not to make any payments whatever, even for salaries, until the end of March, the whole revenue being absorbed in military preparations. The correspondent of the London Times at Bucharest says: "I am in possession of confidential information which indicates as certain that in case of war between Turkey and Greece there will be outbreaks in other quarters than on the Roumelian frontier, and the preparations made will strain the Turkish resources to the utmost." The British Minister at Constantinople has, as a last effort in the interest of peace, asked the Porte to state positively what is the utmost extent of the concessions it is disposed to make to Greece, since it will depend on the Porte's reply whether England will enter into further negotiations.

The Grand Resort of European Gamblers is situated at Monaco. An influential national committee has been formed in Great Britain for the purpose of putting down the abominations of the gaming tables there. A British journal says that "Monte Carlo has wealth to the amount of five million dollars at its disposal, and is not likely to surrender without a struggle." It is known that hundreds of unfortunates are ruined every season, and that many commit suicide; that naval squadrons dare not stay in the neighborhood for fear of their officers succumbing to the siren; that a spot which, with its fine air, warm sun, flowers, and perfumes, ought to be a paradise, is haunted by croupiers, swindlers, dupes, courtesans, bankrupts, loungers, and parasites.

Two Clergymen Imprisoned in England for Ritualistic practices, in defiance of the law, have been released on appeal to a higher court than the one that sentenced them. They were regarded as martyrs by a large section of the people, and their release has been made the occasion of much rejoicing. There is, however, little of the martyr spirit manifested. The trouble has arisen out of the connection of the Church with the State, on the ground that a minister paid to preach certain doctrines, violates his contract by preaching doctrines diametrically different. If the clergymen preached and acted as they have done in a Roman Catholic, or any church other than the State Church, the courts would have no power to stop them. The Bishop of Carlisle has issued a letter to the clergy of his diocese, deprecating further legal proceedings, and exhorting both the clergy and their congregations to refrain from appealing to the law, and expressing his conviction that scandals such as the imprisonment of the two clergymen tend toward the downfall of the Church of England. Sincere Protestants, however, continue to oppose the Ritualists who, they believe, are acting as recruiting agents for the Church of Rome.

A Japanese Prisoner, in Jail at Otsu for Manslaughter, had part of a New Testament in Japanese given to him. In 1878 a fire broke out, and a hundred incarcerated persons, instead of trying to escape, helped to put out the flames, and to a man remained to undergo the rest of their sentences. This curious circumstance led to an inquiry as to its cause, and it turned out that the prisoner to whom the Testament had been given had been so impressed with the truth of Christianity that he had taught it to his fellow-captives, and Christian principle, combined with his personal influence, restrained them from defrauding justice. Out of thirty-four millions of Japanese there are only two thousand converts to the Protestant Christian faith. The majority of the people are said to be Sceptics or Materialists.

The Sudden Darkness Occasioned by the Extinguishing of a lamp in a lady's room was the means of her conversion recently in Switzerland. She had long lived only for the world, and the thought of her sins had never given her uneasiness. One night, while alone in her room, she saw the lamp suddenly go out. Although she was alone, she said aloud (thinking only of the accident which left her in the dark), "There is no oil in the lamp!" The words thus spoken sounded in her ears with a new sense. She recalled the parable of the five foolish virgins who had no oil, and whose lamps had gone out at the coming of the Bridegroom; and from that moment, day and night, that Word of God remained in her soul. It recurred to her constantly: "No, I have no oil in my lamp! My God! what will become of me? I have not Thy grace in my heart!" She was filled with fear, began to pray, and continued in prayer, until God gave her peace through believing in Christ.

The Funeral of an African Chief is thus Described by the traveller, Commander Cameron, as taking place in Urua, in the centre of the Dark Continent. "The first proceeding is to divert the course of a stream, and in its bed to dig an enormous pit, the bottom of which is then covered with living women! At one end a woman is placed on her hands and knees, and upon her back the dead chief, covered with beads and other treasures, is seated, being supported on either side by one of his wives, while his second wife sits at his feet. The earth is then shovelled in on them, and all the women are buried alive, with the exception of the second wife. To her custom is more merciful than to her companions, and grants the privilege of being killed before the huge grave is filled in. This being completed, a number of male slaves, sometimes forty or fifty, are slaughtered, and their blood poured over the grave, after which the river is allowed to resume its course."

DR. JOHN KITTO, the eminent commentator and expositor, was born at Plymouth, England, December 4th, 1804. The early married life of his parents had been surrounded by circumstances of much promise. The father, an intelligent mason, had, while yet very young, worked his way by talent and industry, to the position of a master builder. The mother united good sense and vigor of character to the sweetest feminine gentleness and affection. All seemed to point to a future of comfort and respectability. But that fell destroyer, intemperance, seized the father, and he and his were speedily made to feel how hard the ways of transgressors are, not to the actual offender only, but also to all connected with him.

John was a sickly, puny infant, and hardly expected to live. He was carried in arms long after the age when most children enjoy the free use of their limbs, and one of his earliest personal recollections was a headache, which accompanied him, with intermissions of longer or shorter duration, to the end of his days.

In childhood he was distinguished from those of the same age chiefly by a greater fondness for home, and a comparative indifference to their usual sports and amusements. At four years of age he was committed to the care of his maternal grandmother in order that he might escape the blighting evils of a drunkard's home. From his birth this good woman had regarded him with great tenderness, and that want of physical energy, which rendered him less companionable to other children and less attractive to his seniors, only served to call forth her warmest sympathy. She could hardly bear to let him be out of her sight, and if permitted to go out for amusement, her loud recall of "Johnny! Johnny!" was soon heard from the garret window—a sound which twenty years afterward rang in his ears when travelling through the cities of the East.

HIS GRANDMOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The period he spent with his grandmother remained ever after in his memory as a green oasis in the dreary tract of his youth's trials. With much content he sat, like a girl, needle in hand, by her side, in her cosey little room, and with more than content—with high delight—he listened to her stories. Very pleasant too were their walks in the green fields, and with earnest heed the gentle boy heard the aged woman talk of the love and kindness of our Father in Heaven. How far Mrs. Picken's religious lessons went we know not. A reverence for the Scriptures and for the house and servants of God she certainly did instil into the boy's mind.

FIRST LESSONS IN LITERATURE.

In the house next to that in the garret of which John Kitto and his grandmother lodged, an old couple resided, whose son carried on his trade on the ground-floor. His name was Roberts, and his calling that of a shoemaker. "Johnny" often sat with him, and listened to his stories while busily driving the awl. These rehearsals may be reckoned as one of the predisposing causes of John Kitto's devotion to literature, for having learned that these stories were not orally transmitted from one generation to another, but were actually in print, adorned with pictures, that the most expensive cost only a few pence, and that they were at that very time exposed for sale in the shop-window of Mrs. Barnicle, at the head of Market Street, gingerbread and sugar-stick, with which he had often regaled himself, were no longer thought of. Whenever "Johnny" obtained a penny, it was saved to buy books, and in less than eighteen months he had secured quite a little library. Once a customer at Mrs. Barnicle's shop, there was no resisting its attractions, until smitten with the rival charms of an old book-stall in the market, where, by expending his money at rather longer intervals, he was informed he might dispose of it much more advantageously.

HIS EARLY LIBRARY.

When he was twelve years of age, the boy possessed about a dozen volumes. Among these were an old Bible and the poetical works of Spenser and Young. And that he read in a studious manner is shown by the fact that he had already made copious and careful indexes of his books. The "Pilgrim's Progress" was of course an early favorite with the young student; but although so young, he studied some other less attractive works of the old divines.

A sad change now took place in "Johnny's" circumstances. His dearly-loved grandmother lost her little property, and both were obliged to return to the home which the elder Kitto's drunkenness rendered exceedingly miserable. The little lad's school days were over. These had been short enough, extending only from his eighth to his eleventh year, and frequently interrupted by indisposition, chiefly in the form of violent headaches. Many of his days were now employed in assisting his father, who was again a journeyman mason, or in nursing the group of little children at home, while his mother went out to work for bread.

HIS FIRST STUDY.

Yet he was not without his enjoyments. There was a closet at the top of the house, very small, very dingy, very naked, but it contained Johnny's collection of curiosities and his books, and at night at least it was all his own. It was his study—his first study—and many happy hours were spent there. "Often since," writes his biographer, "when sitting in vast libraries, musing in carpeted studies, or traversing seas and deserts, his thoughts wandered back to the "vernal fancies" and fond hopes which gave a lustre to those dingy walls, and made them glow as with visions of paradise."

Thus passed the boy's days till he had entered his thirteenth year, when an event occurred which left its indelible stamp upon him for life. On the 13th of February, 1817, he was assisting his father in repairing a house in Bale Street, Plymouth. A sudden death had taken place in a house adjacent to the one where he was at work, and a post-mortem examination had been ordered by the coroner. John Kitto had thought with horror about the man's body being cut and hacked by the surgeons' knives, and he was somewhat nervous when he went to his work. There was a butcher's slaughter-house in the same yard, and an animal was being killed there that morning. A stream of blood flowed from the slaughter-house into the gutter of the yard, and John caught sight of it just as he approached the top of a high ladder. He associated it with the post-mortem examination then going on, and turned sick and faint and fell from a height of thirty-five feet on a stone pavement in the yard below. He was taken up in a state of unconsciousness, which continued, with the single interruption of a few minutes, for a fortnight.

As he began to recover he attributed the total silence around him to the kind consideration of his friends for his weakness. Soon after, however, having asked for a book which he had borrowed just before his fall, he was surprised to see his friends look at each other, and then at him, with an air of perplexity, when at length one of them took a slate and wrote the desired information upon it. "Why do you write to me?" exclaimed the poor sufferer. "Why not speak! speak! speak!" Again there was an interchange of looks and seeming whispers. The fatal truth could no longer be withheld. Therefore, one present took his pencil, and wrote in characters but too legible—

"YOU ARE DEAF."

Eight months passed away ere his health was fully re-established, and then the deaf boy, being considered unfit for any employment, was permitted to roam at will. His books now became his friends more than ever, and his hours were spent either in reading or in procuring the means of doing so. Manifold were his schemes to get the pence necessary to pay for his "library" literature, or to add a little to his own bookstore. His average weekly income was about equal to five cents. There was one week in which he got as much as three times that sum. He had a stall at Plymouth fair, on which he displayed for sale some little pictures which he had painted.

He also occasionally wrote neat labels for shop windows, and waded on the briny sea-beach at ebb time to gather pieces of rope and yarn or iron, the sale of which brought a few pence. Scantily clothed and scantily fed, the boy was pressed by some of the hardest ills of life, but cold and hunger could not extinguish his love of knowledge, or subdue the indomitable perseverance with which he sought to attain it.

He had nearly completed his fifteenth year, and no prospect appeared of his being able to obtain a livelihood of the scantiest kind by his own exertions. As the last resource, application was made on his behalf to the guardians of the poor, and on November 15th, 1819, he was placed among the boys

IN THE WORKHOUSE.

His anguish was indescribable when he found himself no longer at liberty to visit his wonted haunts; and he was often on the point of forming plans for making his escape, for, like the wolf in the fable, he used to say he would rather starve in a state of freedom than fatten in a chain.

Though at this period the great change from death unto life does not appear to have taken place in the soul of John Kitto, there was a seriousness about him which it is pleasing to contemplate. Private prayer and the reading of God's word were fixed habits with him, and when his sensitive spirit turned from the contempt with which his fellows treated him, he sought comfort in the remembrance of God's mercy and love. "And why am I thus treated with contumely?" he wrote in his workhouse journal. "Because I am—unfortunate! And does misfortune render me inferior in Thy eyes, O my God? No, for Thou hast said Thou art no respecter of persons. Pardon my doubt, which had dared to prescribe limits to Thy mercy, and endue me with resignation to kiss Thy salutary rod."

From Mr. Roberts, the governor of the workhouse, he received the greatest kindness. When this friend left he found another in Mr. Burnard, who remained a fast friend of Kitto's through life. Kindly and wisely did this gentleman care for the poor boy. He lent him books from his own library, suggested subjects for composition, and then in a paternal spirit examined them.

Thus did the Lord's care and mercy surround the poor lad. But that mercy had not yet done with trial, and bitter trial, too, as a means of good. When Kitto had been about a year and a half in the workhouse his grandmother died. She was his dearest friend, and he sorrowed for her with a great sorrow. "Gone forever," he wrote; "that is a word of agonizing poignancy. Yet not forever—a few short years at most, and I may hope to meet her again; there is my consolation."

HIS APPRENTICE LIFE.

The entire term of Kitto's workhouse life extended over nearly four years. During the first part of this period he was employed in making list shoes. After two years he was apprenticed to a shoemaker of the town. His master was a tyrant, overworking the poor lad, and subjecting him to cruel violence. His sufferings were keen. Yet such was the ardor of his devotion to mental pursuits, that though obliged to work sixteen, sometimes eighteen, hours out of the twenty-four, he wrung from needful rest, time enough to enable him to make considerable progress in study. After a few months, through Mr. Burnard's intercession, he was released from his apprenticeship, and re-entered "the house," where he continued another year.

But now the lad's abilities began to attract considerable attention. Mr. Harvey, an eminent mathematician in the town, with other gentlemen, determined that the youth should have an opportunity of cultivating his talents, and turning them to useful account. A subscription was raised for him; he was removed from the workhouse, boarded with Mr. Burnard, and permission obtained for him to spend his days in the Plymouth library, which he designated his second study.

But amid the existing hopes of this period, another care, happily for John Kitto, forced itself on his attention. Intellectual progress is a good thing, but what is it in comparison with the concerns of the never-dying soul? With a growing sense of the overwhelming importance of spiritual things came a growing dissatisfaction with himself. Under date April 2d, 1824, he confessed in his journal his own wickedness and need of Christ, "and that it is only through His atoning blood that we can hope for mercy and forgiveness."

While John Kitto was eagerly engaged in study in the Plymouth library, and his friends were discussing plans for his future course, his Unseen Guide was opening up for him. There resided in Exeter a dentist of the name of Groves. This gentleman having become greatly interested in Kitto, he made the deaf youth a handsome proposal in connection with his own business. It was accepted, and Kitto removed to Exeter. The temporal advantages of his position there were considerable, its spiritual advantages very great.

About this time Kitto's first work was published by subscription, and well received. It was a volume of essays and letters. To be an author was an early and abiding object of his ambition. He related of his workhouse days in which, being touched by the wand of an angel, he found himself the occupant and owner of a comfortable study, well filled with books, and in a conspicuous position were placed several volumes of which he was the author, while on the table lay letters addressed to him from different parts of the world. He lived to have his boyhod's dream completely fulfilled.

Happy as the young man was in Exeter, he had not yet found his resting-place in his life-work. He had many weary steps to tread, and many trials to endure, before he could feel that he was "the right man in the right place." Mr. Groves having determined to give himself to missionary work, his business was relinquished, and for his deaf friend he obtained admission into the missionary college at Islington, that he might be taught the art of printing, with the view of being employed at the presses of some of the foreign mission stations. Kitto's connection with the Church Missionary Society extended to rather more than three and a half years, the first two of which were spent in London, the remaining time in Malta. Differences occurred between Kitto and his employers in both places, on the ground of his devotion to literature being considered incompatible with a thoroughly vigorous discharge of his duties as a printer, and he subsequently withdrew from the work.

AN UNFORTUNATE COURTSHIP.

To this period belongs a romantic episode in the printer's life. Kitto's affections were of the warmest kind, and he had resolved upon marriage as soon as circumstances permitted. The wisest men frequently err in choosing a wife; and Kitto was not very cautious in making his selection. Happening to enter a shop one day, to make a trifling purchase, he saw in the daughter of the owner of the place the possessor of a pleasing face which some time previous had fascinated him in a public assembly. The lady and he became friendly, and on further acquaintance he formed the opinion that she was a fit person to be his wife. Her consent was obtained, a time fixed for their marriage, and the bans published. It was found necessary, however, to delay their union for a short time, and Kitto sailed for Malta, whither his betrothed was to follow him. He had not been long away when the news reached him that his betrothed was false to him and had become the wife of another. He never saw her again.

Early in 1829 Kitto returned to England, and soon after visited his native town. His spirits were depressed, and his prospects decidedly gloomy. But he was afterward inclined to date from this time his

TRUE SPIRITUAL BIRTH.

Writing to his mother from abroad two years after ward, he said, "I doubt if my heart were ever truly converted to God till after I was at Plymouth the last time."

At this time Mr. Groves was preparing to depart on a mission to the East, and when he asked Kitto whether he would like to accompany him as tutor to his sons, the immediate reply was, "Yes," and thus the opportunity was opened up to him of visiting biblical regions, where he might gather up the lore which would fit him for the great work of his life—the illustration of the sacred writings.

Early in the summer of the year 1829 Mr. Kitto and his party left England. Their travels thence to St. Petersburg and to Bagdad occupied nearly six months, and on the 6th of December they reached their destination. As tutor he set himself at once with much energy to work; but the studies with which he and his young friends were engaged met with A TERRIBLE INTERRUPTION.

Inundation and pestilence, quickly followed by siege and famine, fell upon the devoted city. The angel of death entered its streets and threw his shadow upon every home. Fearful were the horrors which gathered over the once proud city of the Caliphs, and very awful was the situation of the few Christians within its walls—the living among the dead.

Among the victims was Mrs. Groves. Her husband immediately shut himself up with her as sole nurse. She soon died. It was expected that Mr. Groves would fall next. It was a most anxious time to the deaf man, who feared that he might be left in the strange city in charge of three helpless orphans. But Mr. Groves was spared, and evoked the warmest admiration of Mr. Kitto by his Christian resignation and quiet heroism. The female servants of the household, however, died; and, when the sword of the destroying angel was withdrawn, it was found that not one of the teachers employed in Mr. Groves's schools had survived the visitation.

The death of Mrs. Groves rendering it desirable that new arrangements should be made for the education of her sons, Kitto, with Mr. Groves's full approbation, prepared to return to England. His friends in the East assured him that at home he could not fail to obtain literary employment. Before he left Bagdad he was a witness of the great disorder associated with the deposition of one pasha and the appointment of another.

BAGDAD IN THE HANDS OF THE MOB.

During the whole of the morning of June 12th, 1831, the city was in the hands of an excited mob, which occupied itself chiefly by plundering both Jews and Christians. Mr. Groves had just finished family prayers, when there was a rush at his house. It was an anxious moment, and only harsh treatment was anticipated. They fired a shot through the door, and endeavored to force it open. It was ascertained, at length, that they wanted powder and shot, and also a present, which if denied them they would take. Mr. Groves observed among them a carpenter who had worked for him, and addressing himself to him, said he had no powder and shot, and as they demanded admittance, he would open the door provided they would promise that only four should enter. This they promised, and they entered and remained in the inner court while the affair was settled. They were dressed in their best clothes and armed with very good guns; one of them was an Arab. They named no price, and Mr. Groves offering them one hundred piastres (five dollars) they accepted that sum with satisfaction.

His journey home commenced on September 18th, 1832, and in the course of it he visited several noted Eastern cities. Constantinople was one of his resting places, and there his eye and his heart were equally gratified. By the American missionaries there the deaf traveller was received with the kindest attention, and remained with them five weeks. In the beginning of June, 1833, the wanderer's eyes once more gazed on his dear native land.

LITERARY LABORS.

On Kitto's arrival his Plymouth friends exerted themselves to procure literary employment for him, and he was soon enrolled as a writer in the Penny Magazine. Besides this, Mr. Knight, the proprietor, made him a proposal with regard to permanent employment, which was accepted by him. There he is set down pen in hand for life. The providence which had specially unfitted Kitto for most other occupations specially fitted him for this. His very calamity, in the hands of Him who from "seeming evil still educes good," by throwing him more on his own resources, tended in a certain direction to increase his fitness for the path he was designed to tread.

On September 21st, 1833, Mr. Kitto married a young lady named Miss Fenwick, whom he dearly loved, and who interested herself in all her husband's pursuits, and proved to be a helpmeet which his Heavenly Father had given him, and which he regarded as one of the greatest blessings of his life.

The history of Mr. Kitto now becomes merged into the history of his works. Erelong he found himself engaged in that department of labor for which his residence and researches in the East very specially qualified him. He brought the public mind into vivid contact with Oriental scenery and life by applying them in the form of a continuous commentary on the Holy Scriptures.

In addition to the Pictorial Bible, he either wrote, compiled, or edited the following: "History of Palestine and the Holy Land," "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature," "The Journal of Sacred Literature," and many works of a similar character.

In the mean time the little home at Islington had become too small, and he had pitched his tent in various other places. It was a home full of sweet young faces, and glad with the abounding joy of happy childhood. As they grew up there was one spot in the house which they were emphatically taught to regard as sacred, viz.,

THE LIBRARY.

Within its precincts no one, save Mrs. Kitto, was allowed to touch anything.

In 1844 he received the title of D.D. from the University of Giessen, in Germany; the following year he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries; and in 1850 a pension of $500 a year from the Queen's Civil List was obtained for him. In the year 1849 he projected his last—perhaps in some respects his best—work, "The Daily Bible Illustrations." It extends to eight volumes, and is dedicated to the Queen. It was concluded amid seriously increasing illness, and it was with deep emotion that, when the closing sentence was written, in January, 1854, he united with his wife in thanking God.

The next morning he had a slight attack of paralysis. In much weakness and pain he struggled on with his literary engagements till February, when a severe fit, followed by a total prostration of strength, convinced him that absolute rest must be deferred no longer. A sum of money was subscribed by attached friends of all religious denominations, and in August he fixed his home at Cannstatt, in Germany. About a month after their arrival his youngest son died; and three weeks later his first-born followed her brother to the grave. The poor father's heart was wrung with sore anguish, which told on his enfeebled frame.

On the morning of November 25th, 1854, Dr. John Kitto breathed his last. The final attack was short, and in the course of it he was able only to ask if it was death, and on being told that it was, to reply, "Pray to God to take me soon." It was enough. His life for many years had witnessed to the blessedness of those whose God is the Lord—had witnessed to it in hours of joy and sorrow—and no special last words were needed to add force to this his living and dying testimony. His remains lie beside those of his children in the cemetery of Cannstatt.

He lived only to the age of fifty years, but he had not lived in vain; and when death at length came it was but the Master saying, as of old, "Ephphatha—be opened!" and his spirit, which had so long dwelt in distressing silence, burst away to join the hymning myriads, whose song is

"Louder than the thunder's roar,
Or the fulness of the sea
When it breaks upon the shore."

THE TEST OF AMUSEMENTS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, February 6, 1881.

"Every tree is known by his own fruit."—LUKE 6 : 44.

A Ghastly Mistake—Good Men at Play—Thomas Chalmers Kite-flying—What is Right and Wrong Amusement — Rules for Guidance — I. The Effect Produced—Healthful or Baneful?—Men Made of Hard Facts—Men of Exhilarance—God-sent Burden-Lifters—Their Dangers—Unhealthy Reaction—Disgust of Practical Duty—II. FOR two or three Sabbaths I have been preaching in regard to amusements and recreations, and I shall next Sabbath morning, and on the following Sabbath morning, continue this theme, most practical in its bearing, trying to solve for you and for myself questions of vast import; for if you will show me the style of a man's amusements and recreations, I will tell you what are his prospects for this world and the world to come.

You have already learned, from what I have said in these discourses, that I have no sympathy with ecclesiastical strait-jackets, or with that attempt to ignore all amusements and recreations, as though they were something not fit for Christians to enjoy. A book came out, some time ago, discussing this subject, and saying that if a man returned at nightfall from business, and felt weary, and desired some recreation, and he should put on slippers and go into his garret, and walk around lively four or five times, there would be no harm in that; but further than that, frowning upon all recreations and amusements.

I think one of the ghastliest mistakes ever made by Christian men is the attempt to put down the sportfulness of youth, and drive out the desire of amusement and recreation from the people. So I have known men of such morbid state and of such twisted theology that they were opposed to ball-playing, and hated puzzles, and denounced charades, and despised tableaux, and cried, "Away with all parlor amusements!" And when young people, full of exuberance and vitality, asked, "What shall we do by way of recreation?" they were answered, "Prayer-meetings!" I have noticed, however, that the people who do not know how to play do not know how to work.

I have noticed that the mightiest men in the Church of God in all ages have joined in hilarities and recreations. William Wilberforce trundled hoops with his children; Martin Luther helped to dress the Christmas-tree; Helen Chalmers told me that her father, Thomas Chalmers, in the days when he was most overworked, in the awful hour of Scottish history when the Free Church was about to come out from the Established Church, and good men were at their wits' end—almost every day Thomas Chalmers played kite with his children on the commons. The men who know how to play, and in the right way, generally know how to work.

Now I propose this morning, so far as God may help me, to lay down by which every person in this house may decide for himself what is right and what is wrong in the way of amusements and recreations.

I. The first test I want you to apply to every amusement is, Has it a healthful influence, or a

BALEFUL REACTION?

There are some men made up of hard facts. They are a combination of multiplication-tables and statistics. They have no rebound in their nature. They never do anything more than faintly smile. There are no deep tides of their soul surging up in billow after billow of reverberating laughter. It seems to me that nature built them by contract, and made a bungling job out of it. But, blessed be God! there are people with bright faces and genial hearts, and their life is a pæan of victory. Often their sorrows are like vines growing around a great tower, on the top of which the sunlight sits, and the soft airs of summer hold perpetual carnival. If you but touch the hem of their garment, you are healed. I know men so kind, so genial, so large-hearted, so sympathetic, that I would rather have them come into my house than to have twenty ministers pronounce on me the benediction. God sends them out with a shining face and a great soul, to lift your burdens, and wipe away your tears, and heal your wounds.

But let me say that these exhilarant and rebounding spirits are in most peril of going into dangerous amusements. The gayer the horse, the more important to have a stout driver; the swifter the ship, the more important to have a strong helmsman; and all these people who have rebounding and exuberant spirits ought to be very cautious, and discipline themselves into the right style of recreation and amusement.

If you come from a place of amusement or recreation so nervous you cannot sleep, and you arise in the morning, not because you are slept out, but because your duty drags you from your pillow, you have been where you ought not. There are amusements that send one to the practical work of life bloodshot and yawning and stupid and nauseated. They are all bad—all that style of amusement. There are amusements that disgust one with the drudgery of every-day life—with tools of trade because they are not swords; with work aprons, because they are not robes; with the cattle because they are not infuriated bulls of the arena.

If any style of amusement gives you a longing for a life of romance and hair-breadth escapes, and love that takes poison and shoots itself, and makes you impractical in the great duties of life—those amusements ought to be obnoxious to you as they are obnoxious to God. Our recreations were intended to build us up, and if they pull us down in our moral or physical health, they are bad amusements; and I charge you, O young men! steer clear of them.

II. Again: I want you not to go into any style of amusement which will lead you into

EXPENDITURES BEYOND YOUR MEANS.

Money spent for recreation is well spent. Do not be so silly as to come from a place of innocent recreation and say, "Now time is wasted and money wasted." It may yield you more profit for this world and the world to come than money that has brought you $500 from the investment, or $1000 or $5000.

But, oh, how many properties have been riddled with costly amusements! The table has been robbed to pay the club; the champagne has drowned the boy's primer; the table-cloth of the corner saloon is in debt to the wife's faded dress; excursions that in a day make a tour clear around a month's wages; ladies whose lifetime business it is to go shopping—all these have their echo in bankruptcies that appall the Church and shake the money market, and send drunkenness staggering across the richly-figured carpet of the mansion, dashing into the mirror and drowning the carol of music in the whooping of bloated sons come home to break their old mother's heart.

When I was at school in New Brunswick, I heard of an incident that occurred the evening before, of a young man brought home by his comrades from a place of evil entertainment, the young man intoxicated and helpless. I had the house pointed out to me the next day, where he was carried up the steps; then his comrades rang the door-bell, and father and mother came down, and the comrades pitched the young man into the doorway, and said, "There he is, drunk as a fool. Ha! ha!"

They that go into amusements that they cannot afford, first borrow what they cannot earn, and then they steal what they cannot borrow. First into embarrassment, then into lying, then into theft; and when a man gets as far as that he does not stop short of the penitentiary. There are thousands of men who have enough salary to support them and support their families, but have not enough salary to support their expensive amusements; and in that direction they perish. How often it is that we ministers of the Gospel are requested to go over to New York and beg off some young man who has made a false entry or taken money from the drawer that did not belong to him, or made some financial shipwreck. We have sometimes been successful in begging him off, and getting the firm to try him over again, to give him one more chance before he is sent home to break his mother's heart; but sometimes we have not succeeded so well.

O merchants of New York and Brooklyn! if there be a leakage in the money-drawer, if the cash account did not come out last night aright, if there be something in the financial management of your store, would it not be well to look to see if you have not in your employ some one who is a victim of bad amusements? You pay enough salary to support that young man—honorably support him; but the amusements which he has entered into cannot be supported by any such salary, and you had better give the note of warning while warning may be of some good.

Sinful amusements open very brightly. The young man says, "Now

I'M GOING TO HAVE A GOOD TIME.

I don't know where the money's coming from, but I'll get it somehow. Ah! what a beautiful day for a ride. Crack the whip. Away go the horses' hoofs racketing over the turnpike. Come, my boys, fill high the glasses. Drink! Drink to health! Drink to long life! Drink to a good many rides like this!" Young men engaged in stores or shops or factories look out of the window and say, "I wonder where that young man gets his money? He gets no more salary than I get. I can't afford that: how can he afford it?"

Life is full of excitement and full of mirth. Cheeks flush. Eyes flash. Watch-chain jingles. Cup foams. They swagger, they jostle decent men off the sidewalk, they blaspheme God, they parody the hymn they learned at their mother's knee; and when you point out the perils of their course, they say, "Who cares?" And when you counsel them to do right, they say, "Who are you?" Some night, going down the street, you hear a shriek in a grogshop, and the rattle of the watchman's club, and the rush of the police. What is the matter! A young man killed in a grogshop fight. Carry him home to his father's house. Father and mother will come, and they will wash the blood off the wounds and close the eyes in death; and they will forgive him, though he cannot ask now to be forgiven.

The mother will go out in the garden, and she will gather the most beautiful flowers she can find, and she will twist them into a chaplet and lay them on his silent heart, and brush back from his bloated brow the long locks which were once her pride, and the air will resound with the father's cry, "O my son, my poor son! Would God I had died for thee! O my son, my son, my son!"

III. Again: I charge you not to make amusement your lifetime business. Life is an earnest thing. I do not care whether you have been born in palace or hovel, affluent or pinched, you have got to work. If you do not sweat with toil you will sweat with disease. Besides that, you have a soul which is to be transfigured amid the pomps of a judgment day; and after the sea has chanted its last anthem, and the mountains have come down in avalanche of rock, you will be living in a realm where seraphs sing, or in a dungeon where demons howl.

Alas! that in a world where men have so much to do for themselves and so much to do for others, they can find nothing to do. Our amusements are only

HELPS TO HARD WORK.

Amusement is the bower in which business and philanthropy rest a little while on their way to stirring achievement. Amusements are the vines that grow up around the anvil and the blossoming of the hammers. Alas for the man who spends his life in laboriously doing nothing—the days in hunting for sport, the nights in seeking out some gas lighted foolery. No time to pray, no time to work, no time to read. Always with the sporting-jacket on, hunting game in the mountain or fish in the brook—not half so well off the man as the greyhound that runs at his side, or the fly-bait with which he whips the stream. God has given us shoulders—why? to lift; hands—why? to work; brain—why? to think; heart—why? to sympathize. Our amusements are only the playing of the orchestra while the tragedy of life plunges through its five acts—infancy, childhood, manhood, old age, and death. Then exit the last chance for mercy. Enter the overwhelming realities of the eternal world.

Again: I charge you, stand clear of all amusements which lead you into BAD COMPANY.

If you belong to an organization where you have to meet with the intemperate, or the unclean, or the dishonest, or the abandoned, in God's name I beg you, quit it—quit it. I never knew a man yet who could stand evil association and be unhurt—never one. Out of the fourteen hundred millions of the race there never was one.

If your duty leads you among bad men, God will take care of you. If your style of work day by day carries you among those who are bad, God knows that, and He will take you through the furnace, and you will be unscorched. But I mean, when a man deliberately chooses bad association because he likes it, that man has started on the road down. Oh, I do not care what you call it, that association will despoil your soul. After you are destroyed, body, mind, and soul, what will they do for you? what will they do for your family? They will not give one cent to support your children after you are dead. They will not weep one tear at your burial. They will chuckle over your damnation.

I HAD A RARE FRIEND

at the West. He was full of welcome when I went there to live. He had splendid personal appearance. There is not a grander looking person in this house to-day than he was; and to this grand personal appearance he added all geniality and all kindness of soul—tender as a child, beautiful and loving nature, and I loved him as a brother; but I saw evil people coming up around him, evil men coming up from bad places of amusement, and they seized hold of this social and genial nature, and they began to drag him down, and he went further and further.

I used to say to him, "Now, why don't you stop these bad habits and become a Christian?" for I talked with him just as I would talk with a brother, and he understood me, and I understood him. I said, "Why don't you give up these things and become a Christian?" "Oh," he said to me one day, leaning over his counter, just after I had asked him for a hundred dollars to help educate a young man for the ministry, and he had given me the hundred dollars before I had the story half told—he said, "'if it will do the young man any good, here are a hundred dollars." Right after that conversation, I said, "Now, you are a splendid fellow; why don't you give up your bad habits and be a Christian?" "Oh," he said, as the tears ran down his cheeks, "I can't. I should like to be a Christian. You see, I have got those habits on me so, sir, I can't get rid of them. I have been going wrong longer than you would think for, and I can't stop."

Sometimes, in the moments of repentance, he would go to his home and embrace his little girl of eight years convulsively to his heart, and he would cover her with adornments and strew toys and pictures all about her, and then from her beautiful presence—the beautiful presence of his little child—he would go to the intoxicating cup, and to the house of shame, as a fool to the correction of stocks; and there these bad men kept pushing him on, a ship, full-winged, crashing into the breakers.

I was called to his death-bed. I hastened, and when I got into the room I was surprised to find him in full every-day dress, lying on the top of the couch. I put out my hand, and he greeted me very cordially. He said, "Now, Mr. Talmage, sit down right there." I sat down, and he said, "Last night, just where you sit now, I saw my mother, though she has been dead twenty years—yes, sir; just where you sit now she sat. I couldn't have been mistaken. I was as wide awake as I am now. She sat just where you sit. Wife, I wish you would take these strings off that they are weaving around me; I wish you would take them off; they annoy me very much in this conversation." I saw he was in delirium. His wife said: "There is nothing there, my dear; there is nothing there."

Then he resumed the conversation, and said, "Yes, my mother sat just where you sit now. I knew her. She had the same spectacles, and the same cap and the same apron, and the same dress. It must have been her, just as she looked twenty years ago—she has been dead now twenty years. And sitting there she said to me, 'Roswell, I wish you would do better;' and I got up out of bed, and I knelt beside her and said, 'Mother, I wish I could—I wish I could do better; I would like to do better. Won't you help me? You used to help me. Why can't you help me now, mother?'" But soon I said, "Now we will pray." I knelt to pray. He did not realize anything I said, I suppose. Then I got up and said, "Good-by! good-by! I hope you will be better soon." He said, "Good-by! good-by!" That night he went to God.

Arrangements for the obsequies were being made, and they said, "Oh, it won't do to bring him to the church; he has been so dissolute." I said, "Bring him, bring him; he stood by me when he was alive, and I'll stand by him when he is dead. Bring him into the church." The Sabbath came. As I stood in the pulpit and saw his body coming up the aisle, I felt as if I could weep tears of blood. I stood there that day, and I said, "This man had his virtues, and a good many of them; he had his faults, and a good many of them; but let that man in this assembly who is without sin cast the first stone on this coffin-lid."

On the one side of the pulpit sat the beautiful child, as radiant and sweet-faced as any child that sat at your table this morning. She knew not the sorrows of an orphan child; she was not old enough to realize them. Sometimes when I think of that awful scene, her face haunts me like a beautiful face through a horrid dream. On the other side the pulpit sat the men who had destroyed him. They had put the wormwood and the gall into that orphan's cup. They pushed him off the precipice. I stood there, and I told them that there was a God and a judgment and a hell for those who destroyed their fellows. Did they weep? Oh, no, not one tear. Did they sigh repentingly? Not one sigh. Did they say, "What a pity that we destroyed him?" Oh, no. They sat and gazed at the coffin as vultures at the carcass of a lamb whose heart they had ripped out. That night, though my friend lay in Oakwood Cemetery, I heard afterward that these men went right on with their iniquities, destroying themselves and destroying others.

That friend, whom I cannot think of without emotion, was a Samson in strength, but Delilah sheared him, and the Philistines put his eyes out, and they threw him into prison, and he made sport for them; but in the hour of his death he rose up and took hold of the two-pillared curse of God against intemperance and uncleanness, and threw himself forward, and down upon him and upon his comrades came the crashing thunders of eternal catastrophe.

AMUSEMENT VERSUS HOME.

IV. Once more: I want you to stand clear from all amusements which interfere with your home happiness—all amusements that destroy domestic happiness. How many shattered homes in Brooklyn! Tens of thousands in the United States destroyed by sinful amusements—homes destroyed. The father went off, the mother went off, the child went off. Is there such a wanderer here? I should like to charm you home by that imperial word—home! home! Do you know that very soon you will be done with your home, and you cannot bless it? Do you realize that soon, oh father, your children will be out in the world, and all the influence for good you have to bring upon them you must bring very soon? Do you know that death will crash in and break up that conjugal relation? And alas for you if you stand by the grave of one who perished through your neglect!

I saw a recreant husband stand at the death-bed of his Christian wife. She said to him, "Do you see that ring?" He said, "Yes, I see it." She said, "Do you know who put that ring there?" He said, "Yes, I put it there; that is the wedding ring." They both seemed overwhelmed with memories. And I do not know but that the chain of influences is going to draw you home and draw you to God and Heaven; I do not know but that long chain of influences has for its last link

THE WEDDING RING.

So I lay hold of the rope, I lay hold of the chain, and I pull for your eternal life. By the hour when you stood in the church, or in the house at the wedding altar, and promised to be faithful until death did you part, in sorrow and in joy, in sickness and in health; by the hour when you sat in your new home planning out a bright future; by the cradle and the glad hour when one life was spared and another given; by the sick bed from which the little one lifted the hands, and you knew he must die, and he put one arm around father's neck, and the other arm around mother's neck, and bound them with a dying kiss; by the grave you can never think of without a rush of tears; by the family Bible, where amid the story of heavenly love is the short but expressive record of births and deaths; by the judgment-day, where husbands and wives, fathers and mothers, in immortal groups shall rise up in shining array or shrink down into darkness—by all that, I beg you, give your best love to your home.

I address you as Gehazi addressed the Shunammite, when I look into your faces this day, and say, "Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child?" Go forth, then, and test all your amusements by these four tests. Be happy in your work. Be happy in your recreations. When there are so many innocent amusements, do not plunge into the pernicious. Do not stop your ears to a Heaven full of songsters, and then listen to the hiss of a dragon. Do not turn your back upon the mountain-side, a-purple with wild flowers and dashing with nimble streams, to go with blistered feet climbing up the hot sides of fire-belching Cotopaxi. And if there be in this assembly a man who is leading others astray, my last remarks to you: Let me say, if you are not only going astray yourself, but leading others astray, the judgment of God will meet you.

Talk about the

in a theatre. There was never anything enacted in Haymarket or Drury Lane theatre equal to the last spectacular. Scene, the last day. Stage, a rocking earth. Enter dukes, lords, kings, clowns, beggars. No sword, no tinsel, no crown. For footlights, the kindling flames of a world. For galleries, the clouds filled with angels. For orchestra, the trumpets that wake the dead. For applause, the clapping floods of the sea. For curtains, the heavens rolled together as a scroll. For last scene in the fifth act, the tramp of nations across the stage—these to the right, those to the left. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him!"

An Italian Service was Conducted at Grace Chapel, New York, on Sunday, February 6th, in connection with the Italian mission of the Episcopal Church. The mission has been in existence for seven years, and Mr. Stander, who has directed its operations, reviewed in his sermon, which was delivered in the Italian language at Grace Chapel, the success it has achieved. He said that it started as a concern on wheels, seeking, wherever it could find one, a corner to preach the Gospel to its people, and now about 600 Italian communicants adhere to the faith of the Episcopal Church through the blessing of God on its ministrations. A flourishing Sunday-school has been built under its supervision, composed mostly of those little Italian children with whom, unfortunately, we are too familiar at the corners of the streets and at the market-places, trying to make a penny for the sustenance of their non-English-speaking parents. The mission was not established to perpetuate the habits, the language, and the education of those Italians who come to these shores, but, on the contrary, it was originated and maintained to educate immigrants who come to our shores from Italy, ignorant of our language and liable to drift into a career of sin and crime.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Jesus Welcomed to the Home—Mike's Request—On the Way to the Prayer-Meeting—Drunken Scoffers—Homely Petitions—Prayer for "the Young Lady."

THE lady would often say, with sweet manner and gentle voice, which carried in its tones so deep a ring of pathos that it had ofttimes brought tears to faces hard as the rock, "Were Jesus on earth, He would be my favorite guest. I never should like to be without a room into which He could enter. He cannot come in His bodily presence, but His people can! His servants! His poor! His saints! And sometimes they are those who, like Himself, are humble and despised. I must welcome them. I love to do it, for His sake."

She was soon beside Michael.

"Good evening, Mike," she said.

Mike arose from his seat, and in the worn and furrowed features of his honest face, his shabby coat, short manner, and twinkle of his brown eyes, he presented an amusing contrast to the lady who stood before him. Slightly tall, smooth brown hair, and still smoother—unruffled—features, benevolence idealized in her forehead, and wisdom coupled with firmness in her lips, while the whole of these different characteristics were blended into an intensity by a look of love, quite indescribable, but always present, she said to him,

"Sit down, Mike. Have you got any news to tell me?"

"Thank 'ee, mum," said Mike, "I don't want to keep ye, not a minnit. But I thought I'd just look in and tell ye how as I had a walk with that there young lady from the Hall to-day; and I thought p'raps you'd pray for her. She do seem so sad, and all over black; and, lor! mum, now you wouldn't think it, she was goin' out this afternoon, seeing to a young chap in the South End." Here Michael sunk his voice to a very mysterious whisper, as if he were letting out secrets that ought not to be told.

"Ah, yes!" answered his listener, "the young gentleman died there the other day. Her brother, he was. I have prayed many, many times for them all, when I have seen them riding or driving past. I only know the lady very little."

"That's what I was a-goin' to say," whispered old Michael, still more mysteriously, and drawing still closer, with bowed head and earnest manner. "I thought perhaps you could some ways see her. Do ye think ye could?"

The lady smiled. "I don't think so, Mike," she said. "I am not an intimate friend; and particularly at this time of trouble in their house, I could not go to them. But, you know, the Lord can speak to the young lady. It is much better that you should ask Him. Tell me about the sick lad. Did she go to his house and see his mother? What is his name?"

The name and sad story were told; and then old Mike, after respectfully and cordially asking after "the gentleman," hurried away at his usual short, brisk pace, sometimes looking down, sometimes looking up, as he went, and often entertaining himself by a long and audible soliloquy.

As he went to his home that evening the stars were beginning to appear in the sky, and the lamp-lighter hurrying along the pavement, was creating manifold larger reflections of them, in the shape of street lamps. In one of the alleys at the back of the town, there was an old tumble-down place called the Van Shed. This had been utilized by a small number of earnest men for frequent little gatherings. This was a "prayer-meeting night;" and after eight o'clock, old Mike might have been seen hurrying down the alley toward this, his favorite haunt.

"Well, old boy! where are you running off to?" asked one and another of the idle men who lounged about the public-house doors.

"Bound for mischief!" hoarsely laughed a tall, thin man, with stooping gait, and coat out at elbows.

"Come on!" shouted two bloated-looking draymen, who stood regaling themselves, at the end of a long day's work, with two pots of foaming beer, touched up with "a drop of speerits," and spiced with comments on the passers-by.

"Come on!" echoed a red-faced landlord, "and have a drop with us. This is just the night for it, and Bill's been asking after you."

Michael stopped, turned round, and faced them. "You come wi' me," he said, "and you won't be none the worse for it."

"I like that," they shouted; "that's good! Where are you going? Tell the truth."

He pointed up into the star-spangled sky, and said, "There, friends; and I wish you'd come along wi' me."

Roars and shouts of laughter, with a deafening chorus of oaths, was the only reply.

Michael went on his way, and soon reached the lighted window that he knew so well. As he warmed his hands by the fire, he conversed with a young man and an old man who were there.

"There's Tom Jenks at the 'Cricketers' to-night," he said. "He's goin' on bad, I'm afeard. All his good toggery and everything—it's all a-goin', they say. He hasn't been to the church, nor nowhere, for ever so long."

"Yes! he's drinking hard," responded another. "I saw Sykes along with him too. They're in a bad way down there. Missus bad, and child going in the decline. Strikes me, we've got anough to pray for to-night. I hope 'tothers is comin'!"

"Well! I don't know," replied one of the other two. "Can't tell. Robson said, up at work, he'd come down if he could; but he thought his guv'nor might want him to take orders, and if he did that it make him as how he would be latish a bit."

"Then we'd better begin. We're the 'two or three,'" said Mike, and they knelt down.

"O God! bless 'em all," he prayed. "I wants thee to make 'em hate the drink, I do. I wants 'em to be differ'nt. 'Tain't fair, it ain't, them landlordies carryin' all along with 'em; and them poor critturs all goin' off to the bad. O God! do stop 'em. I be so sorry. I be so werry sorry for 'em. And I'm a wicked old sinner myself, too, Thou knowest. Whatever shall I do for 'em? And they just goes drinkin', drinkin' on, and they don't care. Oh! what shall us do?

"Now, please, Lord Jesus, come in this little shed to-night, and tell us what we are to do; for we be so troubled about the drink. And the missuses is all tired out wi' 'em; and the babes is crying too—and I war just as bad meself wunst, and so was Abel here. Please send somebody to help us. But we wants Thyself most; and all we ask is for Jesus Christ's sake."

"Amen!" was heartily echoed to this prayer, none the less forcible because of its humble simplicity.

By this time two or three others had come into the room, and they continued praying, earnestly, simply, as the Galilee fishermen might have prayed; and then Mike said:

"Brothers! I've got something else to ask; and I didn't say nothing about it before." Then once more folding his hands, bending his gray head, he said:

"O Lord! I want to 'mind Thee about that there young lady up at the Hall, what's lost her brother; and them others with the smart bonnets. O God! thou hast took away the young gemman; and I don't know whether he's gone Home or not. I think p'raps he has. And I want Thee to 'courage her in comin' to Thee, and in goin' about among us poor people. O God! we ain't much fit company for the likes of her; but we wants Thee to take hold on her, and bring her to us. We do want some such to be kind to 'em, and talk about Jesus."

Here the old man quite broke down. When his prayer was ended, a deep voice close beside him said, "Let us read the 116th Psalm!" It was Hutton, the Rector's gardener.

They read it all round, stumbling over some of the verses, reading others clearly and distinctly, and finally commenting on the whole in their usual graphic, earnest manner.

The proceedings did not last very long; and when they dispersed they trudged away in twos and threes, the burden of their conversation being the misery that was eating out the very heart's core of their little town, destroying its respectability, ruining its trade, and wrecking the homes of its inhabitants. The evil was on the advance, that was certain. They could no longer close their eyes to that fact; and, powerless as these men felt themselves to meet it, they resorted, in humble faith and appealing earnestness, to the God of all grace. His assistance they entreated, and the answer must surely come.

"I wish we could get some of the young 'uns to come along with us," they said; "but it ain't o' no use askin' 'em. 'Tis but a poor place to bring 'em to. There's one young chap what's always up along at that corner. He's ill abed they say."

"I'll call in that way, some time," said another.

As they passed the "Cricketer's" that night, there was a drunken fight going on.

"Just horrid drunkards!" Etta's friends would have said. But they were human beings. Robson recognized two of them. Amid all their dirt and wildness, faces inflamed, and hands bedabbled with blood, he knew them. They were his fellow-workmen. The one who was taking the foremost part in the row had not long been addicted to this beer and spirit drinking.

He had been a very respectable and well-conducted man. But the continual smell of intoxicating liquors, wherever he went—at his work, on his way home, out in the street; offered him by his friends, nay! his enemies rather; forced upon him by his master after long conversation, and on all occasions; put before him in every bargain; and, in fact, placed as a net round his very feet, to catch him at every step he walked—"how could it be wondered at that he had fallen?" so he would have said to you himself, had you expostulated with him.

And he was right. It would have been a miracle had he escaped the snare. The majority fell beneath it, and he was one of them. The landlord, who up to this moment had encouraged the fighting because it was drawing a greater crowd to his "bar," now began to think the consequences might be awkward. He therefore used his utmost powers to draw off their attention, and at any rate to disperse the crowd.

By a poke here, and a nudge there, and a wink at a third, he managed to direct attention to Michael and his friends, as they came along the other side of the street.

This discovery was the signal for drunken shouts and low ribaldry. The wild scene was at its height, when a policeman's burly figure turning the corner altered matters a little. The worst of the combatants slunk off, the hangers-on preserved a nonchalant, would-be innocent air, and the younger men retired into oblivion within the tap-room.

Here old Mike and his friends were hauled over the coals in an unmerciful manner, the landlord always taking a lead in the conversation, his object being to keep the young customers there as long as possible; for as long as their visit could be extended, so long he could reckon on the continued exchange of "tin," as he called it, from their pockets to his. When this seemed to be falling short, and drunken confessions of poverty began to blurt out, and one after another either became unbearably riotous or dropped down in a heavy sleep on the floor of the barroom, he used his tactics to dispense with their company.

Clapping one on the shoulder, taking another by the arm, whispering into the ear of a third, he managed at eleven o'clock to "clear out" his premises. He had sown a seed of mischief that night more cleverly than he was aware of.

Alfred Jenkins and Tom Sykes sallied forth in the direction of the alley that old Mike had sought. Peering about into the darkness, as they laughed and sang, and reeled and tottered, Sykes took his pipe out of his mouth, and knocking it against the tindery wall of the old shed, he left the contents to do their work, and leaning, and tumbling, and struggling, he walked a few yards nearer the melancholy room he called his home.

The disheartened mother, wearied out with her long watching by his brother's sick-bed, had fallen into a deep sleep. From this she was aroused by thud after thud upon the door from the street. She opened it, and was almost knocked over by her drunken, now helpless son.

"Oh, do take care!" she said, "you will waken your brother. Look out, Tom, I say!" for he had raised his fist, and had she not fled to the inner room, terrified and wretched, he would have struck her. Yes! he would have struck his mother! and it would not have been the first time that she had suffered the humiliating outrage.

Tom fell where he stood on the floor of that outer room, till his father in the morning, with a kick, had roused him.

"Great stoopid!" he said; "sleeping about all over the place. Get up! will ye?"

From whose lesson book had Tom taken the leaf? The father knew too well; and the consciousness of this knowledge made him as surly as a bear all that day.

THE CLOSE OF THE PRESENT AGE.

By the Rev. S. Peacock, of Barrowden, England.

I. A Threefold Argument—The Close of the Age—1. The Scripture Dates—2520 Years, or "Seven Times"—2300, 1335, and 1290 and 1260 Years—Simultaneous Starting in A.D. 555—2. The Revelations of the Great Pyramid in Egypt—3. The 6000 Years from the Creation of Man—II. Signs and Events—1. Political—2. Ecclesiastical—The Spread of the Gospel—Of Romanism—Ritualism—Infidelity—Wickedness—3. Celestial—The Perihelia of Jupiter, Neptune, Uranus, and Saturn—The Disappearance of Sun Spots—The Star of Bethlehem.

TWO great mistakes have been made in connection with the two Advents of Christ. 1st. The mistake made by the Jews; 2d. The mistake made by the generality of Christians, fostered, we fear, by the ministrations of a large number of ministers of all denominations.

1st. The Jewish people made the mistake of supposing that the Messiah was coming as a temporal king, to establish a temporal kingdom, and to reign over a temporal empire. It never occurred to the Jewish mind that the First Advent was to be the exact reverse of the popular idea. True, Christ was a king, not a temporal one; Christ came to establish a spiritual kingdom. True, Christ wore a crown, but it was one of thorns; He mounted a throne, but it was a cross. Can we not almost sympathize with the utter disappointment of the multitude in the mistaken views they held in relation to Christ's First Advent? They overlooked Calvary in the glories of Olivet, and forgot the Saviour in the glowing anticipations of a king whom they were expecting.

2d. We venture to assert that a similar mistake is made by the generality of Christendom to-day. (With the pleasing exception that a large number of pre-millennarian pamphlets are constantly being issued that must have some effect in directing men's minds to their views.) Is it not true that the great mass of Christians believe only in the Second Advent, at the end of the world? They forget, or do not believe in, the Millennium reign of Christ for 1000 years, much in the same way as the Jews forgot, or did not understand that the purport of our Lord's First Coming was not to reign, but to suffer and die to make atonement for sin. When He appears the second time, it will not be to judge the world, but to reign as King of kings and Lord of lords over this present but renovated world.

No unprejudiced mind that reverently reads his Bible in the light of present events can fail to discern that the times in which our lot is cast are most momentous ones. A great cloud of witnesses, on the earth and in the sky, seem to say, "The end is nigh at hand." Let us marshal these witnesses and hear their testimony.

We would, before we proceed any further, explain the meaning of the heading of this paper, and then proceed to lay before our readers the reasons that we have for the conclusion that the close of the age will be about 1890.

We do not mean that the end of the world will be in 1890, but

THE END OF THE AGE

"aion" will in all human probability, end before or about that time. We mean that the Christian dispensation, the "Day of Grace," will terminate with the present decade. Nor is it presumption on our part, in making this astounding statement, but it is founded on Bible data that has been literally fulfilled in regard to the past, and it is therefore only faith in that God who worketh all things according to the council of His own will, to believe that what yet remains in the unborn future will be as correct as what the past data has been.

The functions of the Gospel itself, we believe, are misunderstood by most people. We read in Matt. 24 : 14, "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." Also, in Mark 13 : 10, "And the Gospel must first be published among all nations." Now, both these passages have an undoubted reference to two events—1st. The impending destruction of Jerusalem; and, 2d. The Second Advent of Christ. It is generally understood that Matt. 24 and Mark 13 have a twofold meaning; the one having reference to the close of the Jewish dispensation, and the other to the close of the Christian era. So that the above-quoted passage had a first partial fulfilment, and will have a second full accomplishment before the end of this age.

Nothing, however, is said about the Gospel being universally accepted by the world, but on the contrary, the plain teaching of Scripture is, that it will not be, but that the world will be in a far worse condition spiritually at the close of this age, than at the beginning. Take a passage or two in confirmation of this statement. Luke 18 : 8, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" 2 Tim. 3 : 1-5 is but a true portrait, not only of the world to-day, but alas! of the professing Christian Church.

I. Now we will endeavor to show by a threefold argument that the end of the present age will be in or about A.D. 1890.

II. Signs -Political, Ecclesiastical, and Celestial—of Coming Woes, ushering in the Millennial Age.

I. A THREEFOLD ARGUMENT.

(1) We will call attention to the various prophetic dates given in the Old and New Testaments, and show that they have their termination about 1890, and some of them before that period.

There are five principal dates that we would call attention to, viz., 2520, 2300, 1335, 1290, and 1260. It is a generally conceded fact that a day means a year. This is what is termed the year-day theory. Most modern prophetic writers believe also in a double fulfilment of prophetic dates—1st, a day for a year, and, 2d, a literal day of 24 hours. The 2520 days are years, in the first place, and they indicate the whole period of the reign of the four Gentile powers, viz., The Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman.

It is obvious that if we have no reasonable doubt as to when to commence to date the 2520 years, there can be no question as to when it ends. About the year B.C. 710 the ten tribes of Israel were carried into captivity (2 Kings 18); and in A.D. 1810–15 the first steps took place toward the downfall of the Gentile powers. Again, it was not until B.C. 630–4, that the two tribes were carried into captivity, and Nebuchadnezzar was born. From that date to 1890 is exactly 2520 years. This 2520 years is the "seven times," that is, 7 times 360 equal to 2520 (Dan. 4 : 16).

(2) The next prophetic date is 2300 (Dan. 8 : 14). This has a double fulfilment, the same as the other date of 2520. (a) From B.C. 455-6, the time of the restoration of the daily sacrifices (Ez. 7 : 9), to A.D. 1845 is 2300 years. From this time may be dated the first steps toward preparing Palestine for the return of the Jews. (b) A secondary fulfilment is also found; from B.C. 410, the end of Nehemiah's ministry, to A.D. 1890 is 2300 years.

(3) The third date is 1335 (Dan. 12 : 12). This period is mentioned as a blessed period to arrive at. It is in fact the commencement of the Millennial era. It is to be dated from A.D. 555, when the Roman Emperor Justinian's Code of Laws was completed, which legally constituted the Pope the Head of all the Churches, and from 555 to 1890 is exactly 1335 years.

(4) The fourth date is 1290 (Dan. 12 : 11), that is to be reckoned from the same date as above, and it terminated in the already mentioned date of A.D. 1845, the very year which also terminated the 1260 years of the Mahometan Calendar, and also the termination of the 391 years' duration of the Turkish Woe (Rev. 11 : 2), which began (A.D. 1453) with the capture of Constantinople by the Turks.

(5) The fifth and last date that we call attention to is 1260 (Dan. 12 : 7; Rev. 11 : 3). That 1260 is exactly half of 2520; it is the reign of the Papal Antichrist, and began in A.D. 555, and consequently terminated in A.D. 1815. But the full length of the present dispensation is 75 years from that period, which brings us to A.D. 1890, as the time of the completion of all the prophetic dates, and the appearance of Him who will destroy all Antichrists by the brightness of His coming!

2. REVELATIONS OF THE GREAT PYRAMID.

We will now look at the matter in another light. The wonders of the nineteenth century are fairly eclipsed by the simply marvellous revelations that have been made by Professor Piazzi Smyth, the Astronomer Royal for Scotland, and which, in a most remarkable manner, confirm the argument we have already endeavored to prove.

(a) Biblical reference to the Great Pyramid. In Isaiah 19 : 19, 20 is the following remarkable passage: "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord, in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord." No satisfactory explanation has ever been made of this seemingly contradictory passage (for how can a thing be in the middle and yet at the border?) until the discovery of the Great Pyramid; and thus the geographical position of it exactly coincides with this passage, strange as it may seem. "The land of Lower Egypt is in the shape of a sector of a circle or fan. The Great Pyramid is erected at its border, and yet at the centre of the circle of which the land is the sector, or portion cut out of a circle."

(b) Remarkable Symbology of the Great Pyramid. We cannot refer to anything like all that is taught by this silent stone revelation, which is, in fact, a Bible in stone. It is in the measurement of the length in inches of certain galleries of this pyramid that the discoveries are made, and by the correctness of the dates of past events, that are shown by the pyramid, its value is further enhanced in giving a clew to future dates. The scale is an inch for a year. Thus the date of the dispersion is shown to be B.C. 2520. The epoch of the flood B.C. 2743. The time that elapsed from the march out of Egypt under Moses until the First Advent of Christ is shown to be 1542 years, which are shown by the periods given in the Old Testament to be singularly correct. Many other things are also revealed that we have not space to mention here.

(c) The close of the present dispensation foreshown by the Great Pyramid.

This is what concerns our present purpose, and is itself truly remarkable. What is termed the Grand Gallery is 1881.4 pyramid inches long. That means that the Jewish dispersion ends in the fourth month of the year A.D. 1882. What is very remarkable is, that immediately after this Grand Gallery is a very intricate and difficult passage that is short, and ushers in the visitor to a very large and open expanse. The meaning of this at first sight is difficult to understand, but upon careful consideration it seems to indicate the intricate and difficult period of the seven last years constituting the 70th week of Daniel, which leads to the large and open expanse of the Millennium of 1000 years, when righteousness shall cover the whole earth as the waters cover the sea. If this is so, then it follows that the pyramid itself points to about 1890 (i.e., 1882 years added to 7 years and 75 days) as being the close, not only of the "Day of Grace," but also of the Great Tribulation, and the beginning of the Millennial reign of our Lord.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate and House Met in Joint Convention on Wednesday, February 9th, to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. The vote of Georgia, which was cast on a day other than that fixed by law, was not counted. Generals Garfield and Arthur were declared elected. The electoral vote stood: Garfield and Arthur, 214; Hancock and English, 144, not including Georgia's votes, and 155 counting Georgia. Happily the difficulty as to the vote of Georgia did not affect the result of the election, as the majority for General Garfield was assured whether the vote of that State was counted or not; but had the election turned upon the vote of Georgia, the ceremony of counting the votes might not have been so tame a formality as it was. The possibility of such a difficulty arising ought to prompt Congress to the immediate consideration of the Presidential electoral system. Improvements might be made now wisely and amicably while there is no election pending, which would only be made after a bitter party fight if the question of a Republican or Democratic President hung upon the result.

The Bill for the Relief of the Poncas, Prepared by the Interior Department and sent direct to the Committee on Indian Affairs instead of to the Senate, ought to be carefully considered before action is taken upon it. The sum the Secretary proposes to appropriate is $165,000. Under this bill the Indians would get less than half as much land as was recommended to be given to them by the commission. But the most objectionable feature of the bill is the provision that those who are in the Indian Territory must select their land there, and only those who are in Dakota and Nebraska now can select their lands on the old reservation. Before the Indians can have any of the money appropriated in the bill they must relinquish to the United States all their right and title to every part of the old reservation not selected to be held in severalty by the Indians who are there. It will be seen at once how inadequate are these provisions to meet the difficulty, and also how radically they differ from those recommended by the President in his special message. The controversy between Secretary Schurz and Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, on the subject is a further proof that in spite of the magnanimity displayed toward Mr. Schurz by the President, he is still disinclined to make that reparation to the Poncas he above all other men is most concerned in making.

The Appropriation of Ten Million Dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors came before the House on report from the Committee on Commerce, on Monday, February 7th. A motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was defeated on a yea and nay vote, the friends of the bill lacking four votes of the necessary two thirds. As the bill is a very long one, covering forty pages, its promoters fear that if it is considered clause by clause it will not reach the Senate in time for a vote before the end of the session. It was before the House on the following days of the week, when vigorous opposition was offered to it on the ground that the committee had not made a fair distribution of the money appropriated by the bill. Mr. Page, of California, asserted that the committee had not recognized the fact that the United States extended west of the Mississippi River, and had only given $130,000 for the 1700 miles of Pacific coast, with its great rivers, navigable for hundreds of miles; while $200,000 had been assigned to the Great Kanawha in West Virginia. Another objection urged was that the proposed appropriations of $1,600,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River between Cairo and New Orleans was not properly limited, and that the appropriation might be used for filling the gaps in the levees instead of the improvement of the channel.

On Saturday the House devoted most of the day to the consideration of the bill, and passed without amendment the first eighteen items of appropriation, leaving 334 items still to be considered. Nearly all of the first 130 items relate to the improvement of harbors. Over 200 items relate to river, creek, and bayou improvements of all sorts.

Disastrous Storms and Floods have been the latest development of the remarkable weather with which we have been visited since the opening of the new year. On February 12th dispatches from Washington described that city as partially submerged, and in some parts of Pennsylvania Avenue people were going about in boats. A correspondent writes: "The Pennsylvania station stands in a lake. The lower floors of the St. James Hotel are covered with water several inches in depth, and the guests were prone to make their exit this morning upon the broad backs of enterprising negro porters. Carriages and carts, as well as rowboats, have been doing a thriving business in transferring people from shore to shore."

Reports from Toledo, Ohio, say the excitement in the city consequent upon the flood is intense. A snow-storm set in about nine o'clock on February 12th. The streets leading to the river have since daybreak been crowded to the water's edge. In Water Street the water is fully five feet deep, and rushes through at a fearful rate. The loss in the district cannot be less than $35,000; but should the water carry away the lumber the loss will be more than doubled. From Philadelphia and other cities in Pennsylvania come similar accounts of rising rivers and floods, causing losses estimated at over $100,000.

A Fatal Accident at Buffalo, by which Four persons at least were killed, occurred February 8th at the New York Central Depot. The arched roof, overweighted with the accumulated snow, fell about nine o'clock in the morning with a crash, burying a number of persons and cars beneath a tangled mass of iron, wood, glass, snow, and brick. Only one train of occupied cars was in the building at the time, and that one was waiting the arrival of the St. Louis express, which was late. There were about fifteen passengers in the cars, but not one of these was injured. They were virtually buried, but the roof and side wall in falling had made a sort of archway over the cars, protecting them from harm. The passengers recovering from the first shock and surprise had no difficulty in getting out. Only a few minutes before the roof fell, two trains heavily laden with passengers had drawn out of the building. The bodies as yet recovered are those of the officials of the depot, who were standing on the platforms when the crash occurred.

The Dangers of Immigration and the Responsibilities of this country in view of the unprecedented numbers of immigrants from all lands who have come here in recent years formed the subject of an earnest sermon delivered by Dr. S. H. Tyng, Junr., on Sunday, February 6th. The fact that Cincinnati has no Sunday, Chicago only half a one, and New York is fast progressing in the line of desecration, the preacher considered, was an ominous sign of the influence which foreign immigrants are even now exerting on society. As a Christian student, Dr. Tyng expressed his conviction that the vital question of the day is, Shall the Continental thought in these matters prevail over the Puritan or Anglican thought? Shall the German-French or the English-American Sabbath prevail among us? Another danger pointed out was in the opportunity offered to these immigrants for propagating their peculiar ideas—social, religious, and political. No matter what their creed in these matters was, our unmuzzled press, our free platform, and other countless agencies for the dissemination of free thought, afforded them the utmost facility for making proselytes. Many of their theories, if carried out, would be absolutely subversive of our institutions. Yet they spread and gained strength just as noxious weeds grew the more plentifully in a rich garden. "It is our duty," Dr. Tyng said, "to meet the immigrant with the Bible, and to establish churches and schools in all new settlements. The safety of the country is bound up in the way in which this generation shall meet the present flood tide of immigration."

A Warning to Infidel Lecturers comes from Delaware. Chief-Justice Comegys, addressing a grand jury at Wilmington, Del., soon after a notorious blasphemer had lectured there, pointed out that blasphemy was an ancient common-law offence, and was also made a crime by a Delaware statute as long ago as 1740. The punishment until 1826 was the pillory, the brand, and the whip. He said that the man who had recently lectured there might be arrested by any officer without a warrant, and added: "It is, I hope, hardly necessary to say to this community, and to assure the people of it, that if any one shall be convicted of the crime of blasphemy there will be no stint of the full measure of punishment the law now prescribes. "No community such as ours," said the judge, "can exist as a healthy moral organization, where men are allowed to speak without challenge against the very and only foundation upon which it securely rests — the overruling power of God. When we dethrone His majesty and erect in His place our own notions of right and wrong, we shall soon pass into a state of life not restraining, but in effect promoting, our inherent propensity to evil; for no candid man can pretend that our impulses are not toward the gratification rather than in restraint of our passions."

The Anxiety Respecting the Fate of the Cunard steamship Batavia, which sailed from New York January 19th, was relieved on Friday by the intelligence that she was being towed into port by a steamer of the Anchor line. The Batavia had lost her propeller in the storm which swept the Atlantic two days after her departure, and as she had not been heard of when she was twelve days overdue at Queenstown, serious apprehensions were excited as to her safety.

The Ninetieth Birthday of Peter Cooper, the venerable philanthropist of New York, was celebrated February 12th. Not less than five thousand persons assembled in the Cooper Institute to do honor to the day and the founder of the Institute. Mr. Cooper, by way of celebrating the anniversary in characteristic fashion, sent a check for ten thousand dollars to the trustees for the Golden Wedding fund, established in 1864; another check for thirty thousand dollars, and the receipts for seventy thousand dollars which he had expended on the building during the past year.

Gov. Neil, of Idaho, has sent a Second Anti-Mormon message to both Houses of the Legislature. That there is pressing need for the Governor's persistency is manifested by the fact that the first message was not attended to, and also that his second message, dealing exclusively with the Mormon question, had no effect except to put "the Mormon members in a great rage." Gov. Neil apprehends imminent danger from the extension of Mormon doctrines and practices, and calls the attention of the Legislature to the fact that the Mormons "are making rapid strides toward the attainment of temporal power on the Pacific Coast. Utah is completely under their control, and by the spreading-out policy they are seeking to overturn and subdue the States of Colorado and Nevada and the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

A Young Lady from Ohio was Providentially escued from a perilous situation last week in New ork. While at home she formed the acquaint-nce of a drummer for a New York firm, and fan-ied herself in love with him. A few days ago he vrote telling her to come to New York and get narried. She left home secretly, arrived in New ork on Monday, February 7th, met the man, and vas taken by him to a respectable boarding-house, here she passed the night. The next day he saw er and arranged that she should go to another oarding-house, and that they be married from it. n the afternoon a hack came for her at the board-ng-house where she slept on Monday, and she was riven to a well-known vicious haunt. She sus-ected its nature, and her suspicions were con-rmed when she questioned the hackman. She ad the presence of mind to apply to the police for rotection, and being sent on to headquarters, was aken care of while a communication was sent to er distressed family. Young ladies in the country ould know that an invitation to a secret expedition New York implies dangers worse than those of battle-field.

A Party of Five Men were Carried over a ataract a few days ago, near Portland, Oregon. appears that a railroad engineer, with four com-anions, took a boat at the mouth of the John ays River to go to Celilo. A dense fog lay on the ver, and the men lost sight of the shore line. hey soon became alarmed by the swiftness of the rrent, and in a short time, in spite of their efforts, ey came within sound of the dull hoarse roar of e falls below Celilo. They redoubled their forts to stop their course, but without avail; they ere carried to the edge of the rapids. There, to eir momentary delight, the boat struck against a ck, and was stopped in its perilous course. But ter remaining there a few minutes, swayed by the rrent, a huge floe of ice floated toward them, and ssing under the boat, raised it above the rock, d with arrow-like velocity it descended the rapids to the basin below.

Providentially the men were all rescued, but the perience of that fearful descent will never be for-tten. How many young men are living lives of nich that experience is a type. The shore-line of d's commands lost sight of, and a swift current sinful pleasure carrying them on to the awful yss, from which, unlike the Oregon adventure, ere is no rescue possible.

A River of Gold is Claimed by a Discoverer Accord, N. Y. A man named Daniel D. Bell nt to the Secretary of State's office at Albany, on bruary 5th, a claim of pre-emption as "dis-verer of gold, silver, copper, zinc, and other pre-us metals in and adjacent to the Genesee River d valley in the State of New York as the said er flows from the northern part of Pennsylvania, rth-east through Livingston and Monroe counties, o Lake Ontario. The said metals are found in sand-hills, clay-banks, low or bottom lands, hlands or mountainous parts—in the quartz ks and others in and along the said river and val-." The claim afforded some amusement to the icials, but even such riches as a river of gold one ndred and fifteen miles long are worthless as mpared with the value of that river to which the ristian is assured that he will one day come ev. 27 : 1–4), the river of the Water of Life.

A Father Selling his Dead Daughter's Body whiskey is an incident related in the Cleveland ader, which shows to what extent the passion intoxicating liquor can degrade a man. An old n living in Cleveland until recently depended on his daughter for support. He is a slave to whiskey-bottle, and is a common loafer, sleep-in some gutter or saloon at night, only going ne when in need of money. The daughter ned a livelihood by sewing, and was obliged to e twenty-five cents each day to her father, for uor. One day the daughter slipped upon the ice l fell. She was picked up badly injured, and ried to the hospital. Her fall was too much for frail system, weakened by unceasing toil, poor d, cheerless days, and nights of sorrow. For eral days she tossed in fever, and finally died. e father missed her daily pittance for rum, and pawned the sewing-machine to buy more liquor. The dead girl was buried quietly, no one going to the paupers' graveyard except the undertaker and the father. The ladies who lived neighbors to the girl made a beautiful wreath to be put upon the coffin, and gave it to the father to be placed there in the grave. That wreath he sold for liquor. At night, when the rum cravings came on strongest, the old man secured a horse and wagon, drove to the grave where his dead daughter was buried, dug up the earth, tore the emaciated body from its resting-place, and conveyed it away to the storage-room of a medical college. He sold it there for a miserable pittance—a few dollars—with which he returned to his cups.

A Little Girl's Treasures were Sacrificed in obedience to the promptings of filial love during the recent cold snap. In the sparsely settled village of Hardenburg, N. Y., lives a family named Osborn, consisting of father, mother, and one daughter, a child of six years old named Nellie. When the last heav snowstorm fell, both Mr. and Mrs. Osborn were lying sick, suddenly stricken by fever, and Nellie was alone in the house with them. Living in an isolated place, far from neighbors, and being scantily supplied with the necessaries of life at this severe and inclement season, with snow lying three or four feet deep everywhere, the situation may be imagined. Little Nellie did what she could to alleviate the sufferings of her parents in every way. It was bitterly cold, their rude little house offered poor resistance to the winds, the bed-covering was not abundant, and the supply of fire-wood was finally exhausted. The child knew the fire must be kept up, and rather than let it go out she took her wooden toys — her treasured play-things—and cast them on the embers; then she kneeled by the couch of her sick mother and prayed: "Please, dear Lord, send a big, good man to help us." Help came in the person of James McGavitt, a lumberman of the mountains, who, finding the family in this deplorable condition, exerted himself to afford prompt relief.

A Blessing in Disguise is Recognized by some of the orange-growers of Florida in the recent severe weather. That it did a great deal of damage among the oranges none will question, as a large number of them were frozen and thus spoiled, unfitting them for the trade. It is also true that a large number of the trees were killed, but at the same time it killed the oranges it killed off the scale insects that, we are told, have grown a very formidable enemy. The insects are now gone, and their eggs put beyond any fear of hatching, and this will doubly offset the loss of oranges and of trees. How often does God so deal with His children, sending the nipping blasts of adversity when He sees that in prosperity they are not bearing fruit (John 15 : 2).

A House has been Locked up for Nearly Thirty years near Boston. The Boston Traveller gives the following account of the circumstance which led to its never being occupied. Nearly thirty years ago a young man built the house for his bride, intending to mortgage it and pay for it gradually, as his worldly goods increased, to all of which she agreed. When the wedding-day was appointed, the trousseau ready, and the house finished, he took the lady out from Boston to inspect it. After going over the house he presented her with a deed of it for a wedding gift. Knowing his circumstances she was astonished that he had actually paid for it. He explained that, buying a ticket in a lottery, he had drawn the first prize, which just covered the cost of the house. The Puritan maiden protested she would not take a home obtained by gambling, and refused the deed. His arguments were of no avail; she remained obdurate. When they left the house the young man locked the door and threw the key into the brook near by. The next day he boarded up the windows, and only the spiders and mice have ever occupied it. The man never married; he became rich, but is a wanderer on the face of the earth. The young woman has also remained single. It is a remarkable instance of a faithful obedience to conscience, and victory over love and self-interest, which philosophers assert are the strongest impulses of human nature.

TAUGHT THAT WE MAY TEACH.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the man said unto me, Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee; for to the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought hither: declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel."—EZEKIEL 40 : 4.

WE learn from this text something concerning Ezekiel himself. He was certainly one of the greatest of the prophets; his visions remind us of those of John, both for their brightness, splendor, and number, and yet this eminent prophet was, nevertheless, styled "son of man." He is continually called by that name. The title is used over and over again throughout the book of his prophecies —"son of man"—to remind him that even the seer, the prophet, the inspired, the man who was indulged with vision upon vision, was still only a man.

The best of men are men at the best. Those eyes that are strengthened to behold the cherubim, and to gaze upon the stupendous wheels of providence, are still only the eyes of a son of man. The title was used to teach him humility, and also to remind him of the condescension of God toward him, and to fill him with awe and wonder that he should be chosen from the rest of mankind, though no more than they, to see such wondrous sights, withheld from other eyes.

We have no worthiness or fitness; neither does Ezekiel claim any. He is reminded of his descent; he is still one of the sons of men. Oh, be of good comfort, you who think that God can never use you—you who are poor in spirit, and wish to serve Him, but deeply feel your own insignificance. Remember that God is able to do for you exceedingly abundantly above what you ask or even think.

This is our present subject: we will speak upon the manifestations with which God favors certain of His servants. Then, secondly, we will dwell upon their responsibility while they are enjoying such manifestations; they are bound to behold with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and set their heart upon all that God shall show them. And then, thirdly, we will speak upon the object which God has in giving these manifestations to His more favored people.

I. First, I shall have a little to say upon with which certain of God's servants are favored.

The Lord Jesus Christ does draw near in a very special manner to some of His people. He did to Ezekiel; for I take it that the man, mentioned in the chapter, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, is none other than our divine Lord, who, though a man, yet exceeds all men in the brightness of His wondrous person. It was He, doubtless, who appeared to Ezekiel. Long before Christ came on earth to die, He appeared to His servants in different ways. He sojourned with Abraham as a wayfarer, for such He found the patriarch to be. He wrestled with Jacob at the brook Jabbok, for Jacob was wrestling with a sore trial. It was He that revealed Himself to Moses when the bush was burning; and it was He that stood by Joshua's side as the man having a drawn sword in his hand.

In divers ways and forms He proved that His delights were with the sons of men. Or ever the Word appeared in actual flesh and blood He communed here and there with His chosen servants. He will show Himself to any of you who seek Him. He will unveil the beauties of His face to every eye that is ready to behold them. There is never a heart that loves Him but He will manifest His love to that heart. But at the same time He does favor some of His servants who live near to Him, and who are called by Him to special service, with very remarkable manifestations of His light and glory.

These revelations are not incessant. I suppose that no man is always alike. John was in Patmos I know not how long; but he was "in the Spirit on the Lord's-day" on one occasion, and he specially notes it. I do not suppose that Daniel or Ezekiel saw visions every night, or beheld the glories of God every day. Humanity is scarcely capable of the incessant strain of a perpetual manifestation of God. These things are, as we shall see, "like angels' visits, few and far between."

There is a fellowship that can always be kept up, but the flood-tide of manifestation—a noonday revelation—will not last on continually. Ezekiel enjoyed a special manifestation, and he tells us when it was; for men do not see God's face without recollecting it. He knew the date, and recorded it. "In the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the city was smitten." Days of heavenly fellowship are red-letter days, to be remembered so long as memory holds her seat.

Yes, and it is noteworthy that the occasion of these manifestations was one of great distress. Five and twenty years of captivity must have been enough to wear down the spirits of God's servants. Hence He whose feet are as fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace, comes and manifests Himself to His people, burning like brass in a furnace, giving them their times of comfort after twenty-five years of captivity. He says, too, that it was fourteen years after the city had been smitten, after it had been laid as a ruinous heap.

THEN GOD APPEARED.

Oh, beloved, when you have been long sorrowing you may expect bright days. The coal-black darkness will brighten after all. Nights do not last forever. Whenever you have much joy, be cautious; there is a sorrow on the road. But when you have much sadness, be hopeful; there is a joy on the way to you; be sure of that. Our blessed Lord reveals Himself to His people more in the valleys, in the shades, in the deeps, than He does anywhere else.

Saints have seen Jesus oftener on the bed of pain than in robust health. There were more manifestations of Christ in Scotland among the heather and the hills in the days of bloody Claverhouse than there are now. There was more seen of Christ in France, I do believe, in the days of the Huguenots than ever is seen now. I fear me that our Master has come to be almost a stranger in the land in these days, compared with what He was once, when His people wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, destitute, afflicted, tormented; for then He was meeting them at every turn and corner. Let us hope that, if days are gloomy now, and we ourselves are in trouble, our Beloved will come and manifest Himself to us as He does not to the world.

It appears, in this case, that the manifestation to Ezekiel was made when he was put into an elevated condition. He says, "In the vision of God he brought me into the land of Israel, and set me up upon a very high mountain." God has ways of lifting His people right up, away, away, away from mortal joy or sorrow, care or wish, into the spiritual realm. And then, when the mind has been lifted above its ordinary level, and the faculties are brought up by some divine process into a receptive state, He reveals Himself to us. These times come not always, but blessed are they to whom they come at all. When on the mount alone with God their spiritual nature asserts supremacy over the body, till they scarcely know whether they are in the flesh or not, then the Lord reveals Himself to them.

When He had elevated him thus, it appears that he conducted him to certain places, for he says, "For to the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought hither." God's children are brought in experience to unusual places, on purpose that they may get clearer sights of the love and grace and mercy of God in Christ than they could obtain elsewhere. I have sometimes been puzzled to know why I underwent certain states of mind. I have found out the reason occasionally; perhaps as often I have not.

I remember preaching to you one Sabbath day from the text, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and if ever a minister preached from that text, fearing that it was true of himself, I did. I was under an awful darkness all the while, and I could not tell why. But on the Monday evening there came to me one who, by his very appearance, I could see was not far from madness; his eyes were starting from his head, his face was full of terror; and when he was in the room with me alone, he said, "You have delivered me from self-destruction. I am a man that God has forsaken, and no one has ever spoken to my soul or my experience till last Sunday night." By God's great grace and infinite bounty we were able to pilot that brother into smoother waters, and I hope that he now lives to rejoice in God. I felt thankful to the last degree that I had been dragged through all my depression, because I was able to help him.

Sometimes our experience is for the good of others, and sometimes it is for our own good. You cannot see the beauty of certain gems unless you place them on black velvet. When you have something black behind then you see their lustre. So there are promises of God in which you never will discover their very brightest meaning except they are set against some dark soul-trouble. Much of faith's education may be called black-letter learning. Very black the letters are, too, and very ugly-looking, but they must be spelt over. You cannot see the stars in the day-time; you must wait till the sun has gone down.

Many promises of God you cannot see till you are in the dark; and when the soul is in gloom it may be that the Lord allows it to get there, that it may gaze upon the starry promises, and value every ray of light that streams from them. So you see, dear friends, God leads His people from one place to another of Christian experience, along hills and dales, ravines and precipices—all in order that, their minds being elevated, they may be prepared to see bright visions of Himself, and know Him better, love Him better, and serve Him better.

However, it is not outward circumstances that can affect the divine purpose, there must always be a movement of the divine Spirit. In the third verse you read,

"HE BROUGHT ME THERE."

When you get home, just look through the chapter, and see how this is repeated. "And He brought me to the inner court, and He brought me to the north gate, and He brought me" to this and to that. We never learn a truth inwardly until God brings us to it. We may hear a truth, we ought to be careful that we do not hear anything but the truth; but God must bring that truth home. No truth is known well until it is burnt into us as with a hot iron. Some doctrines we can never doubt. "Oh," said one to me, failing to convince me of some new theories, "no one could get a new idea into your head except with a surgical operation." That witness is true if the new idea be contrary to the old-fashioned Gospel. The things I preach are part and parcel of myself. I am sure that they are true.

"Are you infallible?" say you. Yes, when I declare what is in God's word. When I declare God's truth I claim infallibility, not for myself, but for God's word. "Let God be true and every man a liar." It will not do to be saying, "These are our views and opinions." Why, if the doctrines of grace are not true, I am a lost man; if they are not the very truth of God, I have nothing to live for; I have no joy in life, and I have no hope in death. May God bring you, dear friends, into a truth, and I will defy the devil to bring you out of it. If God brings you to it, if He writes it as with His own finger upon your soul, you will know it with solemn certainty.

People may say, "Where is your logic? and how does this consist with the progressive development of human thought?" and all that. I reply, "You can go and fiddle to what tune you please; as for me, these things are part and parcel of myself, and I have made them my own." I have gripped them, and they hold me fast; I have no choice about them; I do not choose to believe in free grace; I believe it because I cannot help it.

When one was asked whether he held Calvinistic doctrine, he answered, "No." "Oh," said the other, "I am glad to hear that." "Ay," said he, "but Calvinistic doctrine holds me." There is a great difference between holding truth and truth holding you. You will not hold truth aright unless you can say of it, with all your heart, "The Lord brought me into it"; "He brought me toward the south; He brought me into the inner court; He brought me forth into the outer court; He brought me to the temple." He did it all. "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord"; and there is no teaching like it, for he that is taught of God is taught infallibly.

Thus I have spoken upon the manifestations with which God favors certain of His people.

II. Now, secondly, let us notice of these chosen men while they are thus favored.

"The man said to me, Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall show thee." Did he not mean this: "Use all your senses, all your faculties, all your wits to understand divine truth"? When the Spirit of God favors you with light, mind that you see; and when there is a sound of grace, mind that you hear. Be not one of those forgetful hearers who behold their likenesses in a glass, and then go their way and forget what manner of men they are. Oh, how much more we should understand of God's word if we gave our mind to it. We tell our children to learn their lessons "by heart." If we put the full meaning into that expression, that is the way to learn the things of God. Learn them all over; take them into yourself by every faculty you possess; strive as God shall help you by His Spirit to get at their innermost meaning by every power that is given you.

First, he says, "See with thine eyes." What are the eyes for but to see with? He means this: Look, pry, search with your eyes. Do not let the truth flit before you and then say, "Yes, I have seen it." No. Stop it. Hold it by meditation before the mind's eye, and see with your eyes. Look, look, look into it. Remember what is said of the angels: "Which things the angels desire to look into"; not "to look at," but "to look into." Looking to Christ will save you, but it is looking into Christ that gives joy, peace, holiness, heaven. Look into the Gospel; let your eyes be intent and steadfastly fixed upon every truth, especially at choice times when God favors you with the noontide light of his face. Then be doubly intent upon His word.

And then He puts it, "Hear with thine ears." Well, a man cannot use his ears for anything else, can he? Ay, but hear with your ears. Listen with all your might. You are to spy out the meaning with the mind's eye; but, besides that, try to catch the very tone in which the promise or precept has been uttered. Treasure up the exact words, for though cavillers call it folly to speak of verbal inspiration, I believe that we must have verbal inspiration or no inspiration. If any man shall say to you, "The sense of what your Father said is true, never mind His words"; you would reply, "Yes, but I would like to know precisely what He said, word for word." I know that it is so in legal documents. It is not merely the sense that you look to, but every word must be right.

God's word, as it came from Him, came in such perfection that, even to the syllables in which the sense was clothed, there was infallibility about it. When I get God's word I would desire to hear it with my ears as well as see it with my eyes—to see its sense and then to love the expressions in which that sense is conveyed to me. He cares little for the sense of the words who is not jealous over the words which convey the sense. Oh, brethren, whenever God does, by His word, open His heart to you, do not lose anything; do not lose a sound—a syllable.

The Lord demands something more. "Set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee." Oh, but that is the way to learn from God—by loving all that he says—feeling that, whatever God says, it is the thing you want to know. It is well when your whole heart comes to know the truth, and, when it knows it, encompasses it about with warm affections, so that it may be like a fly in amber, the word in the midst of your heart, encased there, enshrined there, never to be taken away from you. Set your whole heart on the word. Some people like to read so many chapters every day. I would not dissuade them from the practice, but I would rather lay my soul asoak in half a dozen verses all day than I would, as it were, rinse my hand in several chapters.

Oh, to bathe in a text of Scripture, and to let it be sucked up into your very soul, till it saturates your heart! The man who has read many books is not always a learned man; but he is a strong man who has read three or four books over and over till he has mastered them. He knows something. He has a grasp of thoughts and expressions, and these will build up his life. Set your heart upon God's word! It is the only way to know it thoroughly; let your whole nature be plunged into it as cloth into a dye.

The Lord bids us do this toward all that He shall show us. "Set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee!" We are to be impartial in our study of the word, and to be universal in its reception. Brothers and sisters, do you pick over God's Bible? I pray you, give up the habit. I have known professors who would not read certain chapters. Never read another till you have read that passage which now displeases you. Learn to love it; for, if there is a quarrel between you and a Scripture, it is you that is wrong, not the Scripture; and if there is any part of the word of which you can say, "I differ from that," the word will never alter; the party to alter is yourself.

Try to follow the Lord fully, even though it should cause the revision of cherished sentiments, and even the alteration of your denominational connections. "Are we to be so particular in little things?" says one. Ay, it is in little things that loyalty comes out. A loving and obedient child obeys his father without saying, "This is a great thing, and this is a little thing." "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." The habit of trifling with little duties grows very soon into a seared conscience about larger matters. "Oh, but we need not be so particular," says one. Indeed, we must be.

"Why are you so precise?" said one to a Puritan. "Sir," said he, "I serve a very precise God." "The Lord thy God is a jealous God"—mind that; and He would have us to be a jealous people as to all His word, whether of doctrine, or of precept, or of promise. Oh, for grace to be willing and ready to see all that He would have us see, and to hear all that He would have us hear, and to receive into our heart all that He would have us receive.

Thus, I have spoken upon the manifestations which God gives to some of His servants, and the responsibility under which they are placed by them.

III. But now, thirdly, what is the practical design of all this? What is

GOD'S REASON FOR MANIFESTING HIMSELF to His servants?

The object is this: "Declare thou all that thou seest to the house of Israel."

First, see it yourself, hear it yourself, give your heart to it yourself, and then declare it to the house of Israel. I have lately heard of a minister who said in the pulpit, "The doctrine of atonement—I have heard a great deal about it, but I do not understand it." He is going to take a holiday that he may solve some of his doubts. If he does not solve his doubts soon I should recommend him to extend that holiday for the term of his natural life. He who does not understand the doctrine of the atonement should read "The Shorter Catechism," and pray God to enlighten him. That is a book written for the young and ignorant, and it might be useful to many ministers. God grant us grace that we may know what we do know, and not attempt to declare to others anything but that which we have taken into our own hearts.

But that being done, we are to tell the truth to others, especially to those whom it concerns. He had seen the form and vision of a temple and a city; he was to speak of this to the house of Israel. Dear brother, you cannot tell who it may be to whom you are to speak, but this may be your guide: speak about what you have seen and heard to those whom it concerns. Have you been in gloom of mind, and have you been comforted? The first time you meet with a person in that condition, tell out the comfort.

Have you felt a great struggle of soul, and have you found rest? Speak of your conflict to a neighbor who is passing through a like struggle. Has God delivered you in the hour of sorrow? Tell that to the next sorrowing person you meet. There is such a thing as casting pearls before swine; that can easily be done by an imprudent talkativeness; but when you find people who are hungry, give them bread; when you find people that are thirsty, offer them water; when you find that they want a blessing from God, tell them of that which has been precious to your own soul.

Ay, but still this is not all your duty. God has shown us His precious word that we may tell it to the house of Israel. Now, the house of Israel were a stiff-necked people, and when Ezekiel went to them, they cast him aside, they would not listen. Yet he was to go and teach the word to them. We must not say, "I will not speak of Christ to such a one; he would reject it." Do it as a testimony, even if you know he will reject it.

Go you, my brother, and

and recollect that in the parable the sower not only cast a handful on that spot of ground that was all ready for it, but he sowed among thorns and thistles, and he cast seeds even on the highway, from which the birds of the air soon removed it. "Give a portion to seven and also to eight." "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper this or that, or whether it shall be alike good." Do thou go and tell what God tells thee. Remember what we read just now. "What I shall show you in secret, that reveal ye in the light. What I have spoken to you in closets, that reveal ye upon the housetops." "Are we all to be preachers then?" Yes, all that have been taught of God are to teach. "Are we all to stand up in public?" says one. I did not say that; but somewhere or other—perhaps in the pew where you now sit, or on the steps as you go out, or by the roadside, or in the shop to-morrow morning—you can all put in a word edgeways for Jesus Christ.

"I do not know what to say," says some one. Do not say it, then, brother. I would recommend you not to say anything if you do not know what to say; but if you have seen with your eyes and heard with your ears, and received into your heart, then you know what to say, and the first thing that comes to hand will be the best thing to say; for God, who knows the condition of people's minds, knows how to fit you to their condition, and make your experience as a Christian to tally with the experience of the man who wants the aid of your light. Go, and the Lord be with you.

If there are any here who have never seen the Lord, if they have any desire after Him, if they have any sense of sin, if they have any wish for the eternal light, let them remember that gracious word, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out," and that precious invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

May the Holy Spirit bring you to trust in Jesus at once, and to the name of the Lord be the praise forever and ever. Amen.

FRAUDS EXPOSED.

Secret Chambers of Vice—Modern Frauds—Bogus Bankers—Heartless Impositions—A Trap for Clergymen—The Astrologers—$213 for an Old Stair-rod—Medical Frauds—Traps for Blackmail—Obscene Literature—Corruption in the School.

"SURELY in vain," said the wise king, "is the net spread in the sight of any bird." He implied that even the birds would be wise enough, seeing the snare laid, to understand its purpose and avoid it. It would be strange if men were less wise than the birds, yet the newspapers of the day teem with cases of men who have fallen into traps in which they have lost, sometimes property, sometimes character and good name, and too often body and soul also. Society is infested with these hunters, in the employ of him who goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. Their snares look innocent and plausible, and they are baited by crafty men who have rare knowledge of the inclinations of the unwary and credulous.

An effort to strip such schemes of their fair appearance and hold them up in their true colors for the warning of possible victims has been made by Anthony Comstock, the Secretary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, an indefatigable enemy of the men who are justly called "social beasts of prey." In a book recently published by J. Howard Brown, of New York, under the title of "Frauds Exposed," Mr. Comstock lays bare a series of wicked plots which in the course of his arduous labors he has discovered and denounced.

When the prophet Ezekiel was commanded to dig in the wall, and digging came upon a door, which, when opened, revealed creeping things and all manner of abominations, and men there working evil, and saying, "the Lord seeth us not," he must have been astonished and horrified at the things that were done in secret. It is with a similar sense of indignant amazement that the Christian citizen under Mr. Comstock's guidance explores the secret chambers of nineteenth century life, and sees in their hideous features the devices now practised to plunder, ruin, and debauch mankind. Such an exposure is appalling, for Mr. Comstock has made it his business to unearth these dens of vice, and he strips away their fair exterior with practised hand, and shows how vile and loathsome are the creatures that deceive society by their specious pretences and their hypocritical deportment.

THE BOGUS BANKERS

who advertise in respectable journals, schemes for making large fortunes, engage Mr. Comstock's attention first. One remarkably successful scheme will serve as an illustration of many others described, and which differ only in details. It is that of a firm doing business in New York who invited small investors to intrust them with money for speculation in stocks and shares. They explained that by a system of pooling the capital of their clients they were able to operate largely in the markets, and to secure immense profits. Some speculations would necessarily involve a loss; but when the general account was balanced, and the profit divided among the investors, it would be found that even the subscriber of five dollars had realized a profit on the scale of those of colossal operators like Jay Gould and W. H. Vanderbilt. It was in effect an offer of partnership in a huge stock-broking firm conducted by men of skill and experience.

The snare thus baited entrapped many victims. Not a cent remitted to the firm was returned, and the investors instead of receiving profits, lost all the money sent to the firm. Widows invested the money received from the life-insurance policies of their deceased husbands; aged tradesmen who had retired from business, sent the hard-earned savings of their lives; teachers, seamstresses, clerks, and servants, and even members of the higher professions were among the forty thousand investors in this fraudulent firm. Some idea of the sum filched from the public by this scheme may be obtained by the fact that the share of one of the wicked plotters for one month was $22,833.33.

Other schemes of a similar nature exposed by Mr. Comstock are marginal operators, bogus mining companies, bogus lotteries, and watch and jewelry swindles. A Fraud on Clergymen of a peculiarly ingenious character, perpetrated in 1877, was the offer of a splendid work gorgeously bound in Turkey morocco with five hundred pages, thirty illustrations, and twelve maps, for one dollar. This book the advertiser falsely asserted was recommended by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. The proceeds of the sale were moreover to be distributed in charity. It is needless to say that though many dollars were sent, no books were forwarded.

An amusing incident is one related of a pretended astrologer having his headquarters in New York who advertised his power "to read destiny, cure disease, and reveal secrets." This man actually extracted from a villager in New England $213 for an article he called "a divining rod," which proved to be an old brass stair-rod having a glass tube in its centre partially filled wth mercury.

BOGUS MEDICAL INSTITUTES,

advertising freely, and professing to cure obstinate diseases, are another species of fraud exposed by Mr. Comstock. In one of the numerous instances given, it was discovered that one of the proprietors netted in one year a profit of over $30,000, in return for which he had supplied medicines of one kind only for all cases, and that of the most worthless description. The real design was to obtain a knowledge of the secrets of patients applying for treatment, and then making the knowledge a means of extortion and blackmail. Other swindling medical agencies exist, the object of which, as described, is of the vilest description, and their appeals to the public are couched in language intended to convey the impression that the advertisers are prompted to their enterprise by religious and philanthropic motives. A number of these mentioned by Mr. Comstock, with copies of their advertisements, show to how low a depth of degradation it is possible for men to sink.

OBSCENE LITERATURE, and the history of the fight Mr. Comstock has waged during many years against its transmission through the mails, occupies a prominent place in his work. It would be impossible to give in this place any idea of the villainous trade which is being carried on, and by which the morals of even children in schools are being corrupted. Circulars and advertisements are surreptitiously conveyed into educational institutions and circulated among the inmates. Parents are astounded at learning that their daughters and sons have received offers to supply them with foul publications and obscene pictures; but in far too many cases parents hear nothing about it.

Temptations thus offered are frequently successful; the imagination of youth is corrupted and the spirit debased by suggestions conveyed at a time when the memory is vigorous and retentive. As Mr. Comstock justly says, "This traffic has made rakes and libertines in society, skeletons in many a household. The family is polluted, home desecrated, and each generation born into the world is more and more cursed by the inherited weaknesses, the harvest of this seed-sowing of the evil one." Against this traffic, as against other forms of vice, Mr. Comstock has waged bitter and relentless war. In his campaign he has learned much of the devices by which society is robbed of money, and what is dearer than money, of virtue and character. He has now made a public exposure of these villainies, and in doing so has added to the obligations for which the public is already indebted to him, for he has shown how the net is spread for the birds—the treasured birds which God has given for parents to train up for His glory.

Swallowing a Butcher's Shop.—The Following testimony was recently given by a butcher at Sheffield, England. "I used to be a great drunkard. I swallowed a butcher's shop and all my tools; then left my wife for six weeks, she not knowing where I was. I used to be very fond of gambling, and was a miserable wretch till the Gospel made me tremble as I sat in my seat. At last I yielded, and cried to the Lord for mercy, and He pardoned all my sins, and made me happy; and I have thrown up the tobacco and the beer, and all the bag of tricks, and now I mean to fight for God."

BETSY TROLLOPE'S JUG.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

IF any of my readers should ever be introduced to Betsy Trollope, the first thing which would strike them would be her littleness. She was not an ordinary-sized woman. Indeed, so much below the average was she that to distinguish her from the other Trollopes of the place she was known as "the little Mrs. Trollope;" while some irreverent little boys, of whom there were a good many about, did not scruple to call her "the little 'un."

There was a time with Betsy when this smallness of stature was such a sore point that she preferred having it taken for granted without any mention of it. But since her marriage with Joe Trollope, who was as big as she was little, she ceased to think anything more about it, the two making up between them the stature of an average couple.

Another point also which would not escape notice in a survey of Betsy, was her exceeding neatness. Nobody ever saw her with a ragged dress or a dirty face. From morning till night you would never see Mrs. Trollope anything but trim, neat, and tidy. Young Mrs. Trollope was in fact the exact counterpart of her old mother, who was still clinging to life, although according to human calculation she ought to have gone long ago. But, although so old and feeble, the old lady would insist on being kept in order. So you will perceive that Betsy's neatness was inherited.

A third striking point about Betsy Trollope was her quietness. Some women couldn't be quiet if they tried. They couldn't whisper for the life of them. Even though you are but a few feet away, they must shout at the top of their voice. Now Mrs. Betsy was never noisy. She worked softly. She moved about softly. And she spoke softly. In fact she did everything in the most respectable, genteel, and quiet manner.

Another feature which, although not so striking as the ones already mentioned, is well worthy of attention, was Betsy's shawl. In summer and winter, in darkness and daylight, did she wear the shawl. It was a black shawl, not over large, and somewhat threadbare, although spotlessly clean.

And, lastly, if you should happen to be in any way intimate with Betsy Trollope, you could not fail to be struck with the fact that she had her half pint of beer every day at eleven o'clock, a half pint for her dinner, and another half pint for her supper. I say "a half pint," because this was Betsy's own account of the exact measure.

Now whether it was that Betsy was so little and had such small eyes that she was unable to see more than a half pint at a time, or whether she thought it a genteel thing to say that it was only a half pint she took, or whether her memory failed her as to the quantity she did take, or, lastly, whether she was ashamed of herself, I should not like to say; but sure I am that Betsy Trollope's half pint, duly and conscientiously measured by some impartial judge, would be found to be nearer a pint. And sorry as I am to say it of such a neat, clean, and quiet woman, yet it must be confessed that Betsy was sometimes known to have her half pint for breakfast.

Betsy was undoubtedly fond of her beer, and without forcing the fact upon people's notice, or behaving in any violent way, did really take more than was good for her. It is disappointing, to say the least of it after having been able to say so much in Betsy's favor, to be obliged to draw public attention to such a big and ugly blot on her character as this; but, as my story hinges upon it, what can I do?

THE JUG OUTSIDE THE SHAWL.

Betsy Trollope was not one of those who consumed their beer on the premises. She made a point of enlightening folk's minds on that point. Off the premises, remember, dear reader, it was Betsy's constant practice to consume her liquor.

Neither was Betsy Trollope in the habit of sending other people for her beer. I may as well, however, say that she never claimed any credit for that. And for fear any should give her credit for what she did not deserve, let me give the reason for it. Although the public-house she favored was not very far, it unfortunately lay round the corner. Now nobody can see round a corner, be his eyesight of the strongest; consequently he has to trust his messenger pretty considerably. But Betsy, for very good reasons, could not do this.

It appears that once upon a time she did send for her beer, but she received so much less than her proper measure—it had dropped a clear inch and a half for some reason or other—that she made up her mind that it would not pay to send for it any more. She would not have minded her next-door neighbor, who was a teetotaler, fetching it. Once indeed she had proposed it, but the indignant, "What next!" with which it was greeted, and the bit of her neighbor's mind she then received were so unpleasant that she decided to think twice before she again ventured to put such a proposal to a teetotaler.

Now the great point I wish to insist upon in this chapter is, that Betsy Trollope was in nowise ashamed of fetching her beer, much less of drinking it. At the time of which I am writing you could not have failed to see her, were you at all near, armed with a large jug—a white one it was, with blue spots—and holding it out to the public gaze without the slightest approach to shame. She did not mind chatting with a neighbor at the corner of the street, or even at the very public-house door. And she had even been seen to take a bold sip in the open street. I believe she was then a quarter of an hour past her usual time, which will of course account satisfactorily for such an occurrence.

"There's nought to be ashamed of, as I knows on," she was wont to say. "Beer's a very good thing, and does a woman as works hard a deal of good. It freshens a poor frail woman up a bit; and as beer's a good friend to me, I ain't a going to turn my back on it, and hide the jug, not I. There ain't no law in the country, as I knows on, against folks carrying their beer in daylight; and if there's some as don't like to see it, let 'em close their eyes, that's all."

Once when Betsy was found fault with in a more violent way than usual, instead of saying anything in return—for she was a very quiet woman—she adopted an ingenious way of entering her protest. The very next time she fetched the beer, she carried the largest jug—also white with blue spots—she had in her possession. And not content with this, held it up and out with marked ostentation.

Of course this conduct of Betsy's drew forth many unpleasant remarks from the passers-by. One would say:

"Hullo! I say, a little woman like you can't stow away that jug full. Let's help 'ee out."

Another would say:

"Don't she look tired? She'll fall down and break her jug if she don't get somebody to lend her a hand."

While a third would say:

"Betsy's going to give a party, don't yer see? She's a fetching the swipes for 'em."

And to give one more specimen of the unsolicited remarks on her, the conduct of some small boys was very noticeable.

"I say, if Betsy was to break that there jug, what a swim we'd have!"

And suiting the action to the word, there was a general strike-out all round, and a puffing and blowing as though each small boy were swimming for dear life.

How did Betsy Trollope receive these remarks?

"Mind yer own business, and I'll mind mine," she would say; at the same time holding up the jug more defiantly than ever. "Let them be ashamed as need to be. Betsy Trollope ain't a bit."

THE JUG UNDER THE SHAWL.

Besides being very fond of beer, Mrs. Trollope was also very fond of meetings. So fond of them indeed was she, that of all who attended the Oatfield Mission Room, she would most certainly have taken the foremost place both for punctuality and for regularity of attendance. Sundays and weekdays, in rain or in sunshine, a rare event it was for Betsy Trollope to be absent,

Now among the meetings held at these particular rooms was a temperance meeting. When this meeting was first started there was a sore conflict in Betsy's heart whether or not she should honor it with her presence, and for some time Betsy's chair was empty. But after a time, not feeling quite comfortable in her mind as to her desertion of the old ship, and feeling that she might perhaps be doing good to some of the many drunkards about by putting in an appearance, she could hold out no longer, and went.

BALM IN GILEAD.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

"Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of My people recovered?"—JEREMIAH 8 : 22.

A Universal Malady—The Sick Daughter—I. The Fact of Universal Disease—1. Health a Great Question—2. Spiritual Health, a Solemn Consideration—The "Gospel of Industry"—The Fall Ignored—II. A Divine Remedy—1. The Cure Complete—2. The Physician Omnipotent—The Sinner's Only Hope—III. Why the Remedy Fails—1. Many will not Admit Themselves Ill—2. Some Seek Elsewhere for Healing—3. Neglect of the Physician's Prescriptions—A Cemetery of Dead Souls.

BRETHREN, the spiritual malady, under which all mankind are groaning, is presented in the Bible as making the whole head sick and the whole heart faint. It will not be improper for us, therefore, to apply the inquiry in the text as the plaintive and earnest solicitude of a minister for his people's welfare. If he be faithful, their interests will press upon him with absorbing anxiety, and with fatherly tenderness will he yearn for their conversion to God. This seems to be the idea, indeed, which the prophet has brought before us—the anxiety of a father for a daughter in failing health, "For the hurt of the daughter of my people I am hurt. I am black; astonishment hath taken hold on me." There you see the picture. It is very definitely and graphically described—you can call it up before the eye of the mind.

You see the gentle maid, dearly loved and delicately nurtured in that rare beauty which is the father's pride, but which Death, the covetous, envies for his own. Amid her vivacity and loveliness a strange languor seizes her. The cheek blooms proudly, but there is fever and not health in its blush. The eye sparkles with unwonted brightness, but it is lit up with the pale fires of decline. The beauty assumes that transparent radiance which is, alas! but the spirit's preparation for the casting off of its earthly vestments—the first phase of the transition to the sublimities of the spiritual body. And the father's eye, quick with apprehensive affection, marks the change, and mourns it, while yet the child of his deep love knows not of her danger, and queens it, all unconscious of her doom.

Now a father's passionate feeling in that struggle and crisis of history—the struggle between faith in God's great goodness and despair, utter and absolute of all human means—is just the feeling which the prophet has caught and embodied in the language of the text.

I. Brethren, in our meditation upon this subject, the first thing to be established, because it is as the basis of the whole matter, is the fact of

UNIVERSAL DISEASE.

1. The question of health is one of the great questions of the day. Time was when it was otherwise. Time was when a sort of fatalism prevailed among the people, by which the progress of improvement was retarded, and by which the ailing were left to perish. But a quickened activity of beneficence has risen up among us. Men have risen up to vindicate God's great gift of life, and Sanitary Missions, and Boards of Health, and legislative wisdom—all are astir to remove preventable causes of death and disease, and to mitigate the bitterness of the olden curse of death.

And it is grand and cheerful to think of the results which, in spite of many disadvantages, have been already achieved. They are not true philanthropists, they are not true Christians either, who do not rejoice in the physical as well as the moral uplifting of a people. When we think by how many the laws of health are better understood, how sounder ideas have been diffused upon the questions of labor, and exercise, and temperance, and cleanliness, and drainage, and ventilation, and interment; and how years have been added thereby to the average of human life—and all this brought about in a variable and trying clime, against cherished habits, and against invincible prejudice, against fierce competition, against the hindrances of class selfishness—we cannot help thinking that the progress is gratifying and lovely in the sight of the great and good God, who rejoices in the happiness of the creatures He has made.

2. But man is not to be contemplated merely in connection with this world. There are higher affinities in his nature; he is born to inherit immortality. The question of his spiritual health or sickness then becomes a question of immense importance, viewed in connection with the eternal duration of his being. Now it is impossible to look upon man without discovering that his condition is not what it must have been when the "very good" of an approving Creator greeted his entrance into the world. Our ideas of God, if they be worthier than the old Pagan notions of divinities, formed after their own pattern, conceive of Him inherently loathing evil and inherently delighting in all possible good.

When man was created, as the Scriptures tell us, he was created in God's image: he was the perfect product of the Creator's hand—in understanding, in heart, in tendency, in will, pure. But it is not so now. A change has passed upon him which has marred his beauty. If you look through the pages of history you find them

ONE PERPETUAL RECORD OF OPPRESSION.

The pages of history reek with blood—rapine and injustice among the victors, vindictiveness and wrong among the vanquished—"Trampled weak and tyrant strong" are found in all nations, in all ages of mankind, as if the first man born in the world being a murderer, all his descendants had been successively baptized with the baptism of the bloody hand.

If you look through the nations for the just man, the nations have not found him. Through all ages there runs one remarkable uniformity of sin—an ever-present spirit of evil—the spirit of evil present everywhere, irrespective of physiognomical varieties or geographical boundaries—impregnating the universal air, tainting every condition of life.

If, from nations, you descend to the minuter analysis of individuals, you arrive at the same result of impurity. Not only are all men polluted, but the whole of each man is impure. The understanding is vassal to a debasing superstition or many-sided error; the will, haughty and headstrong, follows its own devices, heedless of the restraints or the regulations of law; the affections, recreant to their lawful troth, go out in harlotry after other lords; the imagination revels in the sin it cannot compass, and holds tryst with foul and foolish thoughts in the secret chambers of its abode. Every imagination of the thoughts of the heart is only evil continually.

And further, to account for this widespread depravity, it is not enough that you ascribe it to powerful training, or to the influence of ungodly example. These will instruct in the mysteries of crime; these will harden in the effronteries of rebellion; but in all cases the heart of the child, like the plate of the photographer, has been secretly but perfectly prepared. Under the most favorable circumstances of culture and advantage, you have the same untoward results of evil. There are results which confound all calculations, and which upset all theories.

Samuel may be blameless in life and seer in vision, but that will not prevent his children from perverting judgment and taking bribes. Aaron may be blameless in the inner and in the outer sanctity, but his offspring, nevertheless, may serve the Lord with strange fires. A child may be reared in godly nurture; may be secluded from vicious companionship; may be blessed with a father's counsel; may be baptized with the baptism of a mother's self-denial; and yet, breaking away from human restraint and human affection, you may see him sitting in the seat of the scorner, an evil, foolish child, the heaviness of his mother.

Nay, if it were possible to take life and to preserve it apart from the fellowships of men, to let your child grow up in the wild woodland, with no teacher but the voices of Nature, and with no society but the beasts of the forest, he would probably gibber in the restlessness of idiocy; but if he attained an intelligence and manhood at all, it would be a manhood of passion and of crime—there would be a radical and inborn dislocation of the energy, and of the moral beauty of his life, he would be deceitful and cruel as the tiger with whom he had had companionship and home.

Brethren, I have deemed it necessary to enlarge upon this subject, because there is among us nowadays; "another gospel," not ours; a gospel which is called the gospel of industry. There is a teaching in the midst of us, the more dangerous because its apostles are earnest and noble men—men of ingenious thought and genial sympathy, whose main theses are, the dignity of labor, open-handed charity, and the innate and self-exalting majesty of man.

There is much that is fresh and winsome in this doctrine, and they speak it in racy speech, and commend it by benevolent life; but they ignore the Fall of man; they make light of its entailment of corruption and feebleness; they represent each individual as starting fair as Adam did, with his Eden to cultivate, and with his unbiassed will to evil. They forget that the curse has blighted the loveliness and enfeebled the spirit, that there is a bane as well as a blessing let loose upon the world. Hence, I saw it asserted in a lecture that was, a while ago, delivered on "The Rationale of Health," that all infants who die, die not by God's fault. God's fault! No, surely, but by God's mercy removing them ere they have felt the curse's bitterness.

But there is, couched in this, the opinion that all the deaths that we are accustomed to call premature or early arise from preventable causes; and that the allotment of mortality might be postponed in all cases to the feebleness of extremest age. But surely in this half-truth there lurks a dangerous error. The world is not under a charter merely, it is under a curse. Death is not only a positive, it is a penal enactment, a standing memorial of God's displeasure against sin.

And in the variety of period at which that allotment comes upon us, there is a more impressive exhibition of that displeasure than if the allotment came only upon tottering steps and upon silvered hair; while in the triumph which the dying young have been enabled to manifest over the power of the destroyer, there is a more illustrious display of the grandeur of redemption and of the omnipotence of love.

Brethren, it is our duty to do all we can to lengthen human life. There can be no doubt of that. Work as God's almoners by all means; mitigate suffering in every possible way; spread abroad the appliances of healing; give room for the balmy air and the blessed sun to go into the squalid quarters from which they now flutter as with sickened pinions away. Do these, and all other kindly and gentle things you must and ought; but let it be graven upon your hearts the while, as a condition that is born with you, and which you cannot reverse, that "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

Brethren, this moral sickness is a malady which every one of you inherit; there is not one free from it—however high your station, however refined your taste, however exemplary your morals, however exquisite your sensibilities, you have a leprous nature. It was born with you; it has grown with your growth; and if you have not personally realized the transformation of the Gospel, the leprosy hangs about you still. The cradled death is in your veins to-day; and you are not shut up as other lepers are, just because everybody is a leper around you, and because you live in a plague-swept and leprous world.

(To be concluded.)

Journeying Homeward.

EVELYN took Donald's letter and read it through. As she read it a deep crimson flush came into her pale face, but this faded away and left her as white as death when she had finished reading. Then she rose from the table without speaking a word, left the letter lying beside her plate, and went out of the room.

I was rising to follow her when Sir William said,

"Wait a little, Miss Lindsay; perhaps she will get over it better alone; if she has a good cry it will do her good. Poor child, what a pity she ever took a fancy to that worthless fellow! Read his letter, Miss Lindsay, and tell me what you think of it."

I took it up, and read as follows:

"MY DEAR UNCLE:

"I have no doubt you think that I am in Port Said, though I did contrive to keep out of your way during your short stay in that delightful place.

"But I am not there now, but have removed to a town many miles distant, which I will not name, lest you should feel it your duty to report me in England.

"I should not have troubled you with a letter, but that I wanted to ask you to lend me a trifling sum to start me in business in the town in which I am now living. I have had the offer of a first-rate partnership, which will enable me soon to become a rich man, but it is necessary that I should advance something in the shape of capital. My partner asks for £100, but I think he will be content with £50, if you are not inclined to forward me the larger sum.

"I am sure, dear uncle, you will not refuse to grant this trifling request, when I tell you that I have a wife depending on me, and that unless I can avail myself of this opening (which is really a splendid one) there is nothing but starvation before us both.

"As I am now a married man, there is no chance of my again being an annoyance to you, so I feel sure you will not deny me this small and last favor.

"Please address to 'Monsieur Junot, Post Office, Alexandria.' M. Junot is my wife's brother; she is a French girl, and he will call for the letter, and forward the remittance to me.

"With love to Evelyn and yourself,

"Believe me, dear uncle,

"Your affectionate nephew,

"DONALD TRAFFORD."

"P.S.—You will wonder how I knew you were in Jerusalem. I met a dragoman the other day who was on board the same steamer with you, and he heard that you were to spend a long time in Jerusalem."

"Did you ever hear anything like that?" said Sir William, as I folded up the letter; "is not that a piece of cool impertinence?"

"He does not seem much ashamed of himself," I could not help saying.

"Ashamed of himself! No, indeed! There is not a word about his running off with that money. He is an idle, selfish, good-for-nothing fellow! And he was always the same; it was always a mystery to me what Evelyn could see to like in him. Poor child, I hope it will not make her ill again!"

"Oh no, I think not," I said; "I think she sees now what his real character is."

"I hope so," he said anxiously; "perhaps if you went up-stairs you could say a word or two to comfort her. You know best—do you think we should leave her alone or not?"

"I think I will just go up-stairs and see," I said.

To my astonishment, I found Evelyn sitting in her room busily at work, and looking quite calm and cheerful. I fancied she had been crying a little, but she welcomed me with a smile, and asked me if I had read Donald's letter. I told her that Sir William had wished me to do so, and then she asked me what I thought of it. I did not answer her directly, for I did not like to say what I really thought.

"I will tell you what I think of it," she said, "and I shall tell papa when I go down-stairs. I think it it is a shocking letter. I cannot think how Donald could ever write it! But, May," she said, "please don't think I am troubling about it. I have given up loving Donald some time ago, ever since I found out that he was so very different to what I always thought he was; but I pitied him dreadfully.

"I thought he would be so miserable and wretched, and feel so guilty and ashamed when he thought about his having taken that money. I always pictured him wishing, oh, so much, that he had never done it, and trying very hard to save his money so that he might be able to pay it back again. But now, May, I can do neither; I can neither love him nor pity him; he does not deserve either love or pity, does he?"

"No, he does not," I said; "the only thing for which we can pity him is for his wickedness."

"Just think of his marrying a French girl," she said. "I wonder if it is the one who waited on us in the shop in Port Said. Well, I am glad he wrote that letter; it is far better to know what he really is. I can't think how I could be so much deceived in him. I am afraid I cannot read people's characters very well. But do not let us talk about him any more to-day, May; the trouble has quite gone, it has indeed, but I do not like to talk about it; let us speak of something else."

Sir William was very much relieved to find that Evelyn was in good spirits, and that she took his view of Donald Trafford's conduct. He was still very much ruffled and annoyed by the letter, and was, in consequence, fidgety and impatient with the world in general all day. Not liking to speak about his nephew for fear of distressing Evelyn, he gave vent, instead, to his feelings about Mr. Stanley's disappearance.

"Mr. Stanley evidently did not intend to write now," he said; "it was one of the strangest things he knew, his going off in that way. It just proved what he had always heard, that it does not do to make friends with people whom you meet while travelling. It is impossible to tell what they are, and you may be imposed upon to any extent."

"Oh, papa," said Evelyn, "what do you mean? Surely you do not mean that Mr. Stanley imposed upon us?"

"Well, I don't say that he did," said Sir William; "but I say that we don't know that he did not. You must confess that it was a very suspicious thing, his disappearing so suddenly, and never giving us a hint as to where he was going. I don't like it at all."

I longed to speak, but I felt as if I could hardly trust myself to do so, for I might have said more than I intended, if I had opened my lips. So I left the defense to Evelyn, and she took it up indignantly.

"It is really too bad, papa," she said, "to speak of Mr. Stanley in that way. I think he is one of the nicest and best men I have ever seen."

"So he seemed to be, I grant," said Sir William; "but how do we know who he is, or what he is? We only know it from what he told us himself; and that may be true—I hope it is—or it may be false. That is why it is very foolish ever to be too friendly with people you meet when travelling; they may be all they profess to be, or they may not."

"But Mr. Stanley is a great friend of Lord Moreton, papa," said Evelyn; "I know he is. He told me he was the day Claude and Alice were here."

"Yes, I know, he told you so," said Sir William; "I never heard Lord Moreton mention him."

"Will you not write and ask Lord Moreton, papa? It is quite worth while, and then we shall know one way or the other."

"Yes, perhaps I will," said Sir William; "that will settle the matter anyhow; perhaps Lord Moreton may be able to clear up the mystery."

The next day was the mail day, and Sir William gave me his letters to take to the man who was going to post them. I looked through the addresses as I went down-stairs, but there was none to Lord Moreton; he had forgotten it.

We did not much enjoy our visit to Jerusalem after Mr. Stanley left us. We had very cold and cheerless weather, and the bare stone floors and covered stones were poor substitutes for the richly carpeted rooms and bright blazing fires in Alliston Hall. Then during the cold weather it rained incessantly the whole day, and the rain was far heavier than we ever see it in England.

We were obliged to keep indoors in the hotel, listening to the sound of the water which was rushing down the spouts of the house into the cisterns, in which it was carefully preserved for use during the following summer, and trying to amuse ourselves as best we could with our work, and the few books to be found in the hotel.

Sir William became very impatient, and a great longing came suddenly over him to go homeward. He was tired of foreign travelling, and foreign places, and foreign hotels, he said, and Evelyn seemed so well and strong that he thought there could be no risk in her returning to England. Evelyn and I assented cordially to the proposal, so it was decided to leave Jaffa by the very next steamer. We visited many places in Italy and Germany, and spent a long time on the return journey; for Sir William was afraid, for Evelyn's sake, of arriving in England till the spring had fairly begun. I was very much interested in a great deal that we saw, and yet I did not enjoy it nearly so much as I had always imagined I should enjoy a tour on the Continent. I felt unsettled and restless, and longed to be back in England.

We stayed for some weeks in London before going to Alliston, for Sir William had some business that he was anxious to transact before returning home. London was bright and gay just then, and we enjoyed our visit to it very much. But what gave me more pleasure than anything else was meeting Miss Irvine again. Her home in London was in the next street to the one in which we were staying, and we saw her every day.

We were much interested in hearing of the work for God that Miss Irvine was doing in one of the very poorest and lowest of the London parishes. She spoke very little of it herself, but we found out by degrees that, during the last few months, a most wonderful work, of which she was the centre, had been going on among the poor, lost people who are crowded together in the alleys and courts of that part of London.

While we were there a tea was to be given to the women who attended her mothers' meeting. Their husbands were also invited, for she hoped by this means to be able to reach many whom it was impossible to see or to speak with in any other way.

Miss Irvine asked us, the day before the tea took place, whether we should like to be present. Evelyn accepted her invitation joyfully, but Sir William demurred a little when he heard of it.

"I don't like your going into those low parts of the city, my dear," he said to Evelyn; "in your state of health you ought to be careful. There are sure to be people there just recovering from fever or small-pox, and it can't be good for you to go through those dirty, filthy, close streets."

Evelyn looked very much disappointed.

"I want so very much to see Lilla's poor people, papa," she said.

He was going to answer her, when Miss Irvine said, "Perhaps if Evelyn does not come, you will look in for a few minutes, Sir William? Lord Moreton is going to give them a little address after tea, and he would like to meet you."

Sir William fell into the snare she had laid for him.

"Lord Moreton!" he exclaimed; "how did you get him to come? Why, he is not in town now."

"No, but he is coming up for my tea-party," said Miss Irvine, laughing; "he takes a great interest in my little mission work; indeed, if it had not been for Lord Moreton I could not have carried it on. He supplies the means while I try to find the workers. He hires the room for me in which I have all my meetings, and in which the tea will be given to-morrow night."

"Indeed!" said Sir William; "I had no idea of that. And you say he is going to give you an address?"

"Yes, he has promised to say a few words to the mothers; he has spoken to them before, and they felt it very much. He puts the way of salvation so simply before them that it seems to go straight to their hearts."

"Well, I really think we must go and hear him. Evelyn, my dear, I don't think it will hurt you if you do not dress too warmly; those places are always so close. We will drive there and keep the windows closed so that the foul air of the streets will not come in. What time shall we be ready, Lilla?"

All arrangements were made, and Evelyn and I both looked forward with much pleasure to the following evening.

Miss Irvine's mission-room was a bright, cheerful place, and was very prettily decorated for the festive occasion. Texts cut out in red and in white paper, and wreaths of holly and ivy ornamented the walls; and the long tables, covered with white cloths, were spread with a most beautiful repast, which was arranged as prettily and tastefully as if it had been set out for a wedding breakfast.

The guests had all arrived when we went in, and were sitting at the tables, quietly admiring all around them. Poor tired mothers, many of them with babies in their arms; husbands whose faces bore marks of care and toil, and many of whom showed plainly that drink and sin were bearing them down, and ruining their health and their homes; children with pinched and unchildlike faces, were all gathered round the pretty tea-tables, looking forward to a happy evening in their unhappy lives. Most of the men were in working clothes, for they possessed no others in which to come; but they had all made themselves as clean and tidy as they could, and seemed shyly and quietly happy.

They began to feel more at their ease when a blessing was asked, the tea was poured out, and we all sat down together.

Lord Moreton was there, working busily, looking after the wants of every one of the poor people, and talking pleasantly to them all the time.

JESUS HEALING THE SICK.

S. S. Lesson for February 27th, Luke 5: 12-26. Golden Text, ver. 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"GOD anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil: for God was with Him" (Acts 10: 38). Such was the testimony of Peter to his Lord; "doing good and healing," fit occupations for Him who came to be the Saviour of men. In our subject for to-day, we see Him in His mission: "When he was in a certain city, behold a man full of leprosy; who, seeing Jesus, fell on his face, and besought him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean."

Full of leprosy, and yet "in a certain city!" Was it not written in the law, "The leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean: he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be" (Lev. 13: 45, 46). Why then was this leper at large in the city? We read he was "full of leprosy;" may we not conclude that those words applied to him, "Then the priest shall consider; and if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague; it is all turned white: he is clean" (Lev. 12: 13). No longer infectious, but disfigured, helpless, needing still the great Physician.

Are there not such among us? Men who have entirely given up all attempt to hide their condition, who know well and are not afraid to own that in them, that is, in their flesh, there dwelleth no good thing, that there is "no soundness" in them. Such are not infectious sinners, such need not be retained without the camp, they may come into the city, for the Spirit of God alone has shown them their need, and they of all others are the most anxious for deliverance. "Lord," said this poor man, "if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean."

"Thou canst." Of this he had no doubt. Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people (Matt. 4: 23). How should He, who healed all manner of disease, not be able to heal his disease? "Thou canst," this was a settled point. Dear reader, are you come thus far on the way of faith? You need something from the Saviour; is it power over some besetment of temper, selfishness, or vanity? Do you say, Lord, thou canst make me clean? Do you see that He can do it in an hour, do you almost touch the deliverance because nothing is impossible with Him? Or, is it some physical evil, long-continued sickness, nervous distress, lameness, blindness, deafness, is it paralysis or dropsy? Well, can you look up into the face of the great Healer and say, "Lord, Thou canst make me whole?" Are you sure He can, quite sure, so that you are ready to cast aside all other means and trust Him?

But the man said, "If thou wilt." He looked at himself; he had no claim on Jesus, no worthiness, he had no reward to give Him; he needed some assurance to go upon before he could believe in the willingness of Jesus to heal him. And it was given him. Jesus "put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, 'I will; be thou clean.' And immediately the leprosy departed from him." In order to obtain any deliverance from the Saviour it is absolutely necessary that we should believe in His power and in His willingness, and so believe in it that we can speak to Him about it, and then unreservedly commit ourselves to Him. "Lord, thou canst, thou wilt, thou dost make me clean."

The leper had an excuse for not knowing the will of the Master; we have none. Do we desire to be holy? "He hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him" (Eph. 1: 4). Would we be free from all dominion of sin? He says that "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. 6: 14). Would we also be healed from our sicknesses as they were who came to Jesus of old? "The prayer of faith shall save the sick and the Lord shall raise him up" (James 5: 15). We need not say, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst, but Lord, because thou sayest that thou wilt and canst, I trust thee to make me clean. I come to thee, and him that cometh to thee thou dost in nowise cast out" (John 6: 37).

Jesus charged the leper to tell no man, "but go show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing according as Moses commanded for a testimony unto them." The priests could pronounce a man clean, but they could not make him clean; and the very obedience to the requirements of the law on the part of this cleansed leper, served to show them that a greater power than theirs was at work. Was it the priests or the friends of the cleansed man who made it known? for it is written, "But so much the more went there a fame abroad of him: and a great multitude came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities." He was beginning to be popular.

An evangelist of our day, with a similar experience would think that he must make the most of the occasion, multiply the number of meetings, not on any account absent himself. Jesus, on the contrary, "withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed." Son of God as He was, He had emptied Himself and given Himself to be for His ministry a simple instrument of the Holy Sprit, He acted always under orders, and thus was the pattern for all those who labor for God in our time. One might have said, "But was it right to leave those multitudes of sick and needy and sorrowful ones without the help they craved?" The Lord Jesus received the most intimate direction from His Father, and without this direction, He neither could nor would go forward, and here is the secret of His withdrawing Himself just at the juncture when the work seemed to press most.

Let us not fail to notice that those who came to Him came with two different motives—"to hear and to be healed," and on a certain day in which He was teaching, it is expressly said, "The power of the Lord was present to heal them." It may be that He had prayed for this special power of the Lord when He withdrew Himself from the multitude. Has Jesus risen and glorified the same power? Is the power of the Lord now "present to heal?" God has not limited His promises, has declared that when a sick person sends for the elders to anoint him in the name of the Lord, "the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up," and He never said that this promise was confined to apostolic times. Why, then, do we not see the power of the Lord present to heal among us? Why is His Word not justified, and why do not hearing and healing go together as they did when the church was in her normal state?

It was just at this time that men brought the paralytic to Jesus. The men who brought him must have had faith in the Saviour's power, and their one desire was to bring their suffering friend in contact with Him. This was no experiment. We have heard it said, "I have tried healing by faith, and it did not answer." What is this? putting God's intervention on a par with the inventions of men, no wonder such cases never are healed. We come to God, or bring others to Him to trust Him, not to try Him. These four men (Mark 2: 3) were not to be baffled by little difficulties; they had set their hearts upon obtaining Christ's healing for their friend, and they would allow nothing to stand in their way. "They sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him. And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude, they went upon the house-top, and let him down through the tiling with his couch into the midst before Jesus."

It was a mute appeal, but irresistible. They made no apology, the right place for one who was bound was at the feet of the Deliverer, and they laid him there. In this case we are told nothing of the man himself, all we know is that he let himself be laid at Jesus' feet. "And when he saw their faith, he said unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee." "When he saw their faith." Here we see the power which God has graciously given to intercession. There were those to whom the Lord said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole," but in this case His response was to the faith of others, not that of the paralytic himself.

"To hear and to be healed." What was the first word the poor disabled man heard? "Thy sins are forgiven thee." Just as in James 5, "The Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." But was he not brought there for healing? Yes, but no healing of the body is complete, and none will last, except where the soul is set right and sin put away and overcome. The scribes and Pharisees began to reason. This is always fatal to faith, for reason, when it is exercised in judgment upon Christ or upon His work, takes the place of superiority, and therefore of authority. It is ours to bow before the presence of God, the Word of God, and the work of God, and when we cannot understand, it is for us to wait until He shall make it clear.

They reasoned, "Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone?" They knew not that He whom they were judging read their very thoughts, and they must have been startled when He said to them, "What reason ye in your hearts? Whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins (He saith unto the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, "Arise, and take up thy couch and go unto thine house. And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God." Who dared say that his sins were not forgiven him? He who stood there had taken upon him His sins and his sicknesses (Isa. 53: 6; Matt. 8: 17), none could deny that the sickness was departed, and the man who had lain mute before the Lord, had his tongue loosed to glorify Him because his sins were forgiven him. And others caught up the strain, for "They were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Leaders of the Irish Land League Appear to have been terrified by the attitude of the British Government. They do not know how much information was obtained when Michael Davitt was arrested, but it is known that he was in the habit of carrying about with him, for safe preservation, secret papers, which would, if found, seriously compromise some of the prominent members of the League. It is not known whether Davitt was able to conceal or destroy these papers before he was searched. There appears to be a general suspension of the agitation until, by some act of the Government, it may be inferred whether they are acting on accurate information or striking in the dark. Mr. Parnell left London on February 7th for Paris, where he has remained in consultation with other Land Leaguers. It is rumored that he will sail thence for America, ostensibly to appeal to Irish-Americans for assistance, but in reality to avoid arrest.

The London correspondent of the New York World writes that "in several parts of Ireland the tenants are now beginning to pay rent again, and the Land League, lately active and omnipotent in the matter, no longer interferes. The local agitators know that the police are following their every movement and only awaiting the passage of the Coercion Bill to strike, and this knowledge naturally inspires them with caution."

The Coercion Bill Introduced into the British Parliament by Mr. Forster has proceeded with little opposition toward its final stage in the Lower House, and is expected to pass the Upper House and be ready for the Queen's signature on February 21st. A few unimportant modifications suggested by English members were accepted by the Government, but its most stringent provisions are unaltered. An effort was made to strike out the clause empowering the authorities to make arrests for crimes committed prior to the passing of the bill, but the Government would not consent to any amendment on that point except that a clause should be added limiting the retrospective power to crimes committed subsequent to October 1st, 1880.

It appears certain that when the act comes into operation many arrests will be made, and the Government are preparing to suppress any outbreak which may arise with the object of rescue. Every available regiment has been drafted into Ireland, there being at this moment not less than 27,000 well-drilled soldiers, including a large force of artillery, distributed throughout the provinces of Munster, Leinster, and Connaught. The general opinion is that this large force has been collected on account of information in the possession of the Government not made public. A well-informed journal says: "An armed insurrection was certainly planned in Ireland, the rising to be simultaneous with Fenian outbreaks in various parts of England." It is believed that the papers found upon Davitt's person, and the correspondence addressed to him seized in the mails since his arrest, have disclosed the fact that the plans for an appeal to arms were approaching maturity.

A Crisis in the Spanish Government has Issued in the overthrow of the Cabinet, and the young king, who has shown considerable capacity and administrative ability, has summoned Senor Sagasta and Marshal Campos and intrusted them with the duty of forming a ministry. Senor Sagasta is an experienced statesman fifty-four years of age, who held office under the Republic and under King Amadeus. He aided in bringing in King Alphonso, and has won the confidence of the liberal section of the people. His colleague, Marshal Campos, is a soldier of distinction who fought against the Carlists and won many laurels in the last Cuban campaign. It is a significant fact that the announcement of the new ministry was followed by a rise of Spanish securities in the money markets of the world, thus indicating that the fortunes of Spain are believed to be safe in the hands of the new Cabinet.

The Steamer Bohemian, Bound for Liverpool from Boston, was wrecked on the coast of Ireland on Sunday, February 6th. She belonged to the Leyland line, and sailed from Boston on January 27th with a cargo of produce. The vessel appears to have been lost by a mistake. On Sunday at noon the captain gave orders to keep the ship "two points off." The orders were taken for two points off the wind instead of two points off the shore. In the evening a thick fog prevailed, and soon after passing Calf light, breakers ahead were seen by the man on the lookout. The captain gave the order: "Hard over! hard over!" and then "Full speed astern;" but the ship was going too fast. She struck the island and went down in twenty minutes after striking.

When the ship struck the crew commenced to rush about, but the captain was perfectly cool. Two boats were swung. Six persons got into one but it was broken by the rock. The second was also damaged, owing to the rolling of the vessel. Eighteen got into the port lifeboat. The engineers were waiting to get in, but the line broke and the boat drifted astern. It was being rowed back when the ship keeled over and sunk, stern foremost. Five men were rescued from the damaged boat, but two died before they landed. In all only twenty-two out of a crew of fifty-seven were saved.

The War in South Africa Between the Boers and Great Britain has assumed serious proportions. According to the dispatches received at the British War Office, Sir G. P. Colley, the general in command, won a decisive victory over the Boers on February 8th, but subsequent and more detailed accounts, accompanied by urgent demands for reinforcements, seem to indicate that the battle must have been disastrous to the British. It appears that the general left his camp to restore his communications with Newcastle. On his way he was attacked by the Boers, whom he repulsed after six hours' hard fighting. His position was then extremely critical, as he could not advance nor retire, having lost so large a number of men as to render a renewal of the conflict hazardous. Under cover of the night he at length succeeded in making his escape to his camp, leaving the communications with Newcastle still in the hands of the Boers. A strong force under the command of Sir Evelyn Wood, is being sent to his relief.

The Marriage of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts to Mr. W. S. Ashmead Bartlett took place on Saturday, February 12th, in London. The ceremony was strictly private, the secret being so well kept from the public that nobody was present except invited friends. The bridegroom assumed the name of Burdett-Coutts before the marriage, seeking to comply with the terms of the Duchess of St. Albans' will. It is understood that a bill will be filed in chancery to restrain the trustees under the will of the Duchess of St. Albans from permitting the Baroness to continue to receive the income heretofore paid her, under her life-interest in the property devised by the Duchess, including her share in the profits of Coutts's Bank, worth altogether $500,000 a year. The Baroness has received hitherto not less than $250,000 a year from the bank alone. The suit will probably be contested on the ground that Mr. Bartlett is not an alien but a naturalized subject of British extraction. It is said in legal circles the Baroness is sure to lose her suit, the terms of the will being very explicit; but she intends to carry her appeal to the House of Lords. If the contested property be lost to her the remainder will amount to $10,000,000, all of which will devolve on Mr. Bartlett if he survives the Baroness. The portraits of both bride and bridegroom with a sketch of their lives, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 7th, 1880.

A Child was Drowned in a Paris Sewer, a few weeks ago under very distressing circumstances. The London Daily Telegraph correspondent at Paris says: "A man named Babin was crossing the street with his little girl, ten years of age, when the latter, in order to escape a passing cab, left hold of her father's hand, and in jumping on to the pavement, fell down a large drain-hole which had been opened for the purpose of shooting the snow into the sewers. M. Babin, who was so fond of his daughter that he was in the habit of regularly taking her to and fetching her from school, was with difficulty restrained from following her into the drain, where the mass of water and half-liquid snow was running with great force and speed. Help was quickly procured, and several firemen and workmen descended, on the hopeless errand of endeavoring to save the poor child. The flooded state of the sewers, however, rendered this impossible, and as yet the bereaved parents have not even had the sad satisfaction of seeing the body recovered. Every part of the sewers into which the body could possibly have been carried have been explored, and the engineers of the drainage system are of opinion that it reached the Seine at Asnieres in less than a quarter of an hour after the accident." A calamity so crushing as this, carrying desolation into a home, tests the value of consolation. Infidels, Socialists, and philosophers are powerless to give comfort there; but the Christian, with the story of the cross and the resurrection, could let a ray of light even into that darkened home.

The Maritime Disasters of the Recent severe weather have been very serious. A British journal reports that during the last week of January 133 vessels were sunk, of which 100 were British, the total value of the whole being estimated at 12,000,000*l.*; 9,800,000*l.* being British. No fewer than 143 lives were saved by the exertions of lifeboatmen, some of whom put out a second and even a third time in response to the urgent signals for assistance. The Whitby boat was taken six miles over land through a blinding snowstorm, a gang of men cutting a passage for it through the snow, which in places was six feet deep. When she first put out, the steering oar and six others broke, but returning for a fresh set she put out again, and eventually saved a crew.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Health has, according to latest accounts, improved materially. Under date of January 25th, Mr. Spurgeon writes: "Some of your readers may like to have it under my own hand that though I am extremely weak I am much better. I have no thought of going away to Australia, Mentone, or anywhere else; but if the Lord will permit I hope to preach twice next Sunday, whatever the weather may be."

The Experience of a Hero of Balaklava, who was one of the "Six Hundred," of whom Tennyson wrote his famous lines, illustrates the ingratitude of nations. He lately applied for assistance at a London Police Court, in consequence of the severity of the weather. He had served in the Crimean campaign a quarter of a century ago, and being wounded in five places, he, with others, fell into the hands of the Russians, and was marched up the country under a strong escort of Cossacks, and interned for over twelve months, till the exchange of prisoners took place. He left the army and sought employment at the Cape of Good Hope, where he served in the police as a sergeant. Changes of administration in the colony considerably reducing his salary, he resigned his appointment and went back to England. After being for a long time unable to obtain employment, he got a situation at a London club, but, in consequence of the reduction of the staff of servants, was again thrown out of a situation, and was now destitute. How different the rewards which await the soldiers of the Cross of Christ! They, too, are often wounded in the great fight with their spiritual enemies, and "endure hardness," but for each is laid up a reward of inestimable price.

Vol. III. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1880, with a complete index, is now ready. Price, $3, including postage.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on sale at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at prices so low as to bring them within the reach of every one. Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with portrait of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughman's Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 cents. The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of fifty sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homiletical exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as far as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Book. This popular gift-book contains a suitable passage selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every day in the year, with a blank space opposite for autographs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon appear at their respective birthdays. The book is gorgeously bound, and the price is 75 cents. Remittances should accompany orders.

The Late SIR TITUS SALT, A British Manufacturer, and the Founder of Saltaire.

THE LATE SIR TITUS SALT.

A Notable Incident—Birth and Business Engagements—A New Industry—Relations Between Employer and Employes—Removal of Factory—Care for His Employes' Comfort—Provisions for Intellectual and Religious Need—Munificent Gifts—The Presentation of Peel Park—Honored with a Baronetcy—Illness and Death—Character.

AMONG many circumstances which render the name of Titus Salt a prominent one in Great Britain, is that probably he was the only business man of modern times in that land of whom it may be said: "He went out and builded a city and called it after his own name." Many visitors to England from this side the Atlantic have seen Saltaire, and those who have not seen it have probably noticed occasional references to it in publications and newspapers. The portrait and life of the founder of that city which we this week present to our readers cannot therefore fail to excite their interest.

Titus Salt was born in 1803. His father was a wool-stapler of the old-fashioned kind, who gave his son a grammar-school education at the Heath School, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, England, and afterward took him into partnership in his business of wool-dealing, which he had then just removed from Wakefield to Bradford. At that time Bradford, which is now one of the handsomest of the great towns of England, was a mere manufacturing village.

The chief seat of the woollen trade had been at Wakefield, but the manufacturers there adhered to the old system of home-spinning, while the new factory system of manufacture was established at Bradford. When Daniel Salt and his family migrated thither, the trade in woollen material for ladies' dresses was in its infancy, and the wool-stapler's energetic son was destined to be one of the chief agents in its extension. His first effort was to bring into use new and hitherto intractable materials. A wool called Donskoi, brought from the banks of the Don, in the south-east of Russia, first attracted his notice, and his success in making a useful fabric of this coarse article laid the foundation of his more important enterprise.

In the year 1836 a Liverpool broker of whom he was buying wool showed him some bales of shining hair which had been sent to him and which nobody would look at. They were from the fleeces of an animal which had been brought by the Spaniards from Peru. The fleece looked dirty and unsalable, but young Mr. Salt took home one bale, and soon returned and bought the whole stock, and as much more as Liverpool could supply. He had discovered a method not merely of utilizing the alpaca wool in the manufacture of stuff, but in producing an entirely new substance, which was, in appearance, something between silk and wool; was cheap, and wore well. The new material speedily became a vast article of commerce, and the inventor was rewarded by an immense increase of his business. He had, in fact, increased the resources of the country and brought a new trade to the Yorkshire district where he lived.

In the early days of his prosperity Mr Salt still carried into his business and his relations with the workpeople much of the old-fashioned familiarity which has now become almost a tradition of the past. In those days he was addressed by many of his own hands by his first name, in the manner which seemed so surprising to strangers who were not accustomed to the almost patriarchal character which the head of a great business seemed to hold in England in those times. He was one of the first to exhibit that care for the health and morals of the persons in his employment which is the newer and better form of the industrial relation.

About 1851, when Bradford was still a dirty manufacturing town, with a crowd of curious old-fashioned market-stalls in its only open square, Sir Titus Salt determined to take his works and workpeople into the country. A strip of land was bought at Shipley, near the Midland Railway and the River Aire, and a building was erected on it which was then regarded as the largest and handsomest factory in the world. The whole range of buildings covered nine acres and a half, and the ventilation, the warming, and the sanitary precautions were as perfect as they could be made.

Four thousand workpeople were deriving their support from the works of Sir Titus Salt, and in removing his factory to another locality he did not forget that provision must be made for their accommodation. This duty he resolved to perform in an exemplary manner. The workpeople were housed in good cottages, and the village thus constructed was supplied with park, cricket ground, public institutions, lecture halls, and places of worship by its founder.

In explaining his object, Sir Titus Salt said he hoped to draw around him a population that would enjoy the beauties of the neighborhood, and be well fed, contented, and happy. He had, he said, given instructions to his architects that nothing should be spared to render the dwellings of the operatives a pattern to the country, and he hoped to live to see satisfaction, happiness, and comfort around him.

These hopes were realized.

has long been regarded as a model manufacturing city, though differences between the operatives and their employers have not of late years been entirely kept out. At the census of 1870 it contained 820 houses and 4389 persons, and probably there is no other community which is so young and which has already possessed itself of so many public institutions.

Sir Titus Salt of course left the management of the business more and more in the hands of his partners and successors, but he never lost his interest in the community he founded. One of his latest deeds was the offer of a piece of land for a school. He had previously built a handsome Congregational church, at a cost of $80,000, to which, the next year, a new Sunday-school was added at a cost of $50,000. He had long since provided baths and wash-houses, large school-rooms, and a hospital and infirmary, and he added to these a range of forty-five almshouses for widows and aged couples, with an endowment of ten shillings a week for the latter and seven-and-sixpence for the former.

This care for the welfare of the workpeople who were carrying on his own manufacture did not limit

SIR TITUS SALT'S MUNIFICENCE.

The town of Bradford, which owes so much to his business success, is also indebted to him for some of the improvements which have so completely transformed it. He had been mayor of the town in 1848, two years before the founding of Saltaire, and he took constant interest in its development. He gave a handsome donation toward the purchase of Peel Park, and in 1871 presented the town with a small park of fourteen acres on the banks of the Aire, and between Bradford and Saltaire. In the next year he added to this gift a handsome building as a Club and Institute, with a large library, and ample rooms for evening classes, lectures, and chess.

He had always taken an active part in political movements, and as a Liberal who at that time was regarded as one of the advanced school; and in 1859 he was selected by his friends as a candidate for Parliamentary honors. He stood alone against two Conservatives, and was returned by a majority of about five hundred over Mr. Alfred Harris, Mr. H. W. Wickham heading the poll.

Mr. Salt, however, did not find that Parliamentary work suited him. He was most diligent in his attendance, and most of the division lists of 1859 and 1860 contain his name. In 1861 he resolved not to face the work of another session, and resigned his seat; and in February of that year Mr. Forster, who still represents the borough and is Secretary of State for Ireland, succeeded him without a contest. Mr. Titus Salt's health had suffered somewhat from his attendance in the House of Commons, and in later years he was much troubled with gout, which frequently kept him from taking any part in public matters.

A tall, handsome, energetic Yorkshireman, with a decisive manner, and that sense of self-reliance which is often the product of a successful business career, Mr. Salt was, in his short Parliamentary life, one of the striking figures of the House. He became somewhat bowed and enfeebled in later years; but his intelligent face and flowing beard of gray hair always marked him out as, in appearance, a notable person.

In 1869 he received a baronetcy, and two or three years since a marble statue, which had been presented to the town of Bradford by a large body of subscribers, was unveiled by the Duke of Devonshire at a public ceremonial in the Town Hall. During the latter part of the year 1876 the health of Sir Titus Salt had given much anxiety to his friends. His death, which took place, in the presence of all the members of his family, at a quarter before one o'clock, on December 29th, had been anticipated for some days. He died, as he had lived, a member of the Congregational Church.

The Bradford Observer, in an obituary note, said of his family: "In 1829 Sir Titus married Caroline, daughter of Mr. George Whitlam, of Grimsby, by whom he has had a family of eleven children. Several of his sons have become partners in the firm now known as 'Sir Titus Salt, Bart., Sons & Co.,' and have shown an activity in carrying on the gigantic works at Saltaire, and a zeal in promoting the welfare of the workpeople, that are warmly appreciated."

Sir Titus was an earnest advocate of temperance, and never permitted a single beer-shop within the precincts of Saltaire. Among his benefactions, he gave $25,000 to Bradford Fever Hospital, and $25,000 to Lancaster Lunatic Asylum. Estimating him by the rule, "By their fruits ye shall know them," he was an eminent Christian man, a man not so much of words as of actions. He will long be remembered, not merely for his wonderful ability in the conduct of business, but as a considerate employer, a sincere philanthropist, and a true-hearted Christian.

THE CLOSE OF THE PRESENT AGE.

By the Rev. S. Peacock, of Barrowden, England.

3. The 6000 years from the Creation terminate about 1890.

It has been an old belief that the world would have a week of 6000 years' work, and then a rest of 1000 years—a Millennial Sabbath!

But it may be argued that A.D. 1890 would not be 6000 years, only 5894, if the birth of Christ were in the year of the world 4004, as usually stated in Reference Bibles, because 1890 added to 4004 only amounts to 5894. To this we reply that a great mistake has been discovered, by which it is now admitted that over 100 years were omitted at the time of the Judges; consequently that accounts for the difference.

It may never have occurred to our readers that the passage in 2 Peter 3: 8, "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day," singularly bears out the theory of 6000 years. Thus a day equals 1000 years—6 days equals 6000 years; or, on the other hand, 1000 years equal one day—6000 years equal 6 days, or the world's week.

II. SIGNS OF THE SECOND ADVENT.

There are abundant signs in the political world, the ecclesiastical world, and in the starry heavens of some great event looming in the immediate future.

The following Political Signs will soon occur:

(1) The dissolution of the Ottoman Empire, which, we believe, will become completely disrupted into five fragments—Bulgaria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Turkey around Constantinople, corresponding with ancient Thrace;

(2) The revival of the 10 kingdoms of Cæsar's Roman Empire;

(3) The inevitably predestined legislative separation of Ireland from England;

(4) The impending war between France and Germany, to extend France to the Rhine;

(5) The repossession of Palestine by the Jews;

(6) The return of the Jews to their land;

(7) The rise to governmental power of a Napoleon as the Little Horn of Dan. 7 and 8, after the Ten Horns have appeared. He will eventually become the Antichrist.

(8) His seven years' covenant with the returned Jews. The beginning of Daniel's 70th week;

(9) The re-establishment of Jewish temple and sacrifices in Jerusalem.

(10) The rapture of the living saints, and resurrection of the dead ones, and first act in the Second Advent;

(11) Napoleon's violation of his covenant in the midst of the seven years;

(12) The 3½ years' unparalleled persecution by the Antichrist (a Napoleon), ending with the descent of Christ at the battle of Armageddon.

The above series of events of a political nature are in the immediate future.

b. Ecclesiastical Signs.

(1) The spread of the Gospel, until it is proclaimed in all nations.

This has almost been accomplished, although there are millions that have never heard the Gospel; still there is not a country east, west, north, or south, but what has had some messenger of the Gospel; and at the present time Central Africa is being opened up to the missionaries of the Cross. After the first rapture of the saints (about two years after the seven years' covenant) will take place a great and widespread revival, when, possibly by other means than human, the Gospel will be universally preached, and multitudes be born again (Rev. 14:6).

(2) THE SPREAD OF ROMANISM.

Notwithstanding the preaching of the Gospel, Romanism is increasing at an alarming rate. It is a fact that Cardinal Newman the other day publicly stated that they (the Catholics) were to pray for the "conversion" of England to the Roman Catholic faith. The disestablishment of the English Church, an event not so far off as some people imagine, but very much nearer than any one might be disposed to believe, we venture to think, will be the opportunity embraced by the Romish Church to put forth its claims for supremacy, and, we fear, will only be too successful. That Britain is destined to once more become a vassal to Rome is the persistent belief of many, if not all, writers of prophetic truths, and is also our own long-held opinion.

(3) THE SPREAD OF RITUALISM.

This is but a stepping-stone toward Rome, and many who first commenced as Ritualists have now become full-blown Romanists of the most pronounced type, and zealous propagators of their new faith. The incompetency to deal with these false prophets in the Established Church is a notorious fact, and deeply humiliating to the Protestant members of that Establishment.

(4) THE SPREAD OF INFIDELITY.

We call ourselves a Christian nation, but we fear it is only so in name. A very small proportion of the population of our country attend even the outward forms of religion. While there are those who are constantly engaged in advocating Atheistic views, and one of these anti-Christian and Atheistic teachers (a prominent one) is thought to be a fit and proper person to represent a constituency in Parliament! Alas! how few Christian people live up to their privileges; by their coldness, indifference to the morning services of God's house, their worldliness and inconsistent conduct, they are actually increasing infidelity itself.

(5) THE SPREAD OF WICKEDNESS.

The tide of wickedness, by which we mean crimes of all kinds, murders of unheard-of atrocity, and sins of every description, is rising higher and higher, until the whole earth is covered with violence, and the harvest ripe for the sickle. The Coming of Christ will be the destruction of "ungodly men for all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed." So wrote Jude, and quoted the words of the prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam.

III. SIGNS CELESTIAL.

Now in the last place we have to notice what are the signs of the heavens in relation to the near approach of the Son of Man (see Luke 21:25, etc.).

(1) The perihelia of the four great planets.

The meaning of the word perihelia is "the nearest approach to the sun of a planet." The perihelian passage of the four planets is as follows: Jupiter, September, 1880; Neptune, 1881; Uranus, 1882; and Saturn, 1885. Also, about May, 1881, Mars will be in the perihelian point of his orbit.

The effect of this perihelia upon our earth has been made known by various professors of astronomy and others, from whom we gather the following facts—(a) That in history the greatest plague periods have been those of the perihelia; (b) That never in the Christian era has there occurred a like period as what this is expected to be; (c) The effects will be an almost universal plague, a carnival of death, fearful earthquakes, wars, electric commotions such as we can scarcely conceive of. It appears that the hosts of heaven are marshalling their forces, and that shortly will begin the literal execution of the plagues of Almighty wrath, described under the Seals, Trumpets, and Vials, upon the guilty inhabitants of this sin-stricken world.

(2) The disappearance of the sun spots.

This is another remarkable phenomenon. It is believed that the effect of this will be a very great increase of heat on the earth, and resulting at no distant date in the partial conflagration of the world.

(3) The star of Bethlehem.

This is also predicted to be seen in 1887. It will shine the whole year or more, and surely it is not too much to say it will be an accompaniment of the approach of the Messiah. It may, in fact, constitute the sign of the Son of Man (Matt. 24:30).

We have now concluded our inquiry, and we trust that if what we have stated does not carry conviction to every reader of its truth, at least, if it leads them to "search the Scriptures" themselves to see whether these things are so or not, we shall not have written in vain.

In conclusion, we would say, in the words of the poet, and may every true child of God realize its truth and deep significance—

"Lord, 'tis for Thee and for Thy Coming we wait,
The sky, not the grave, is our goal;
Oh, trump of the angel! Oh, voice of the Lord!
Blessed hope! blessed rest of my soul!"

"Even so, come, Lord Jesus, COME QUICKLY."

GEORGE RUSSELL'S DISGRACE.

"GEORGE," said Mr. Falconer to his nephew, as they sat together at the table of the latter, who was a wealthy English merchant, "it's no use asking me to assist you further. You have had far greater advantages than I had at the outset of life, and the more I help you the more you seem to need help. I hear you have been speculating again, and I cannot tell you how mortified I was to learn the other night that you had been the worse for drink." As these last words were dropped George Russell changed color, looking one moment red as fire, and the next almost white as his waistcoat.

"Well, as to the speculating, uncle," said he, "it's only what nearly all business men do; and as to the drinking, don't think me uncivil if I say that your table at this moment is not very like the table of an ascetic. I know you never take too much; but without being a sot, it is very easy when one gets into company, and is off one's guard, to take rather more than one ought."

Mr. Falconer felt the rebuke rather implied than expressed in his nephew's words, and simply added, "Well, George, all I can say is, don't let it occur again. You know you have my good wishes, and, for the sake of your father and mother, I shall always be glad to do you a good turn when I can; but it seems to me there is far too much of the 'fast' man about you at present."

George Russell continued his plea for present assistance, for his necessities were pressing, and he knew his uncle's resources were far enough from being overtaxed. At length his uncle said, "I'll try you once more, George," and getting out his check-book he made out a check for $5000. Highly delighted, George expressed many cordial thanks, and left the room on exceedingly good terms with himself and with all mankind. The next day he started with two friends for Paris, and forgetting all his promises to his uncle, plunged into a round of dissipations in that gay capital. One evil, however, he was determined to avoid. He had been reduced to such straits by gambling that, come what would, he declared no one should tempt him to folly of that kind again. This resolution he kept as long as he remained strictly sober, which, unhappily, was not long. He yielded once more to the seductions of wine, and when he had drunk three or four glasses was far too great a man not to do as others did, and his companions were gamblers. He plunged headlong into their favorite pursuit, and, after a week in Paris, returned home with less than half the amount his uncle had so generously handed to him.

Shortly after his return it happened to reach Mr. Falconer's ears that his nephew had not paid the debt for the discharge of which the check had been advanced. Disappointed and angry at such an abuse of his kindness, Mr. Falconer sent for his nephew at once. Charles Russell received his uncle's note, and felt that he could not face the friend of whose confidence he had shown himself so utterly unworthy. Wretched beyond expression, he left home that day, and was not heard of again by his friends for two years, during which time he led a fast life in different American cities. At last his address, which was that of an obscure lodging in New York, reached his uncle, and in reply to a kind letter, assuring him that all should be forgiven and forgotten if he returned, he wrote as follows:

"MY DEAR UNCLE: But for your very kind letter I should never have dared to write you again. Bad as I have been, I must ask you to believe that your money would never have been squandered if it had not been for drink. I fully intended to have made an honorable use of it, and it was not until wine had stolen away my senses, and put my conscience to sleep, that I was guilty of the heartless wrong that drove me from home."

Great as was the pain of mind and the sense of disgrace which George Russell suffered, it scarcely exceeded the sufferings of his uncle. He had solemnly promised George's dying father to do everything in his power to make goodness attractive and sin hateful to his nephew, and he could not help feeling in thoughtful moments that he was partly responsible for that young man's downward course. He recalled the cutting remark of George at their last interview, about the wine on the table, and resolved that, for his part, he would discontinue the use of it altogether rather than lend any countenance by his example to a custom which had well-nigh ruined his nephew in body and soul.

In due time that unhappy young man arrived once more at Mr. Falconer's house, and received such a welcome as only a deep-seated affection could have given. "George," said that gentleman, "I do not intend to say one word about the past, except this: drink has been your curse. I have given it up altogether, and have only one thing to ask of you now, and that is that you will give it up too, and ask God to give you a new heart and a right spirit." With many tears George declared that he would be only too glad to do anything to show his deep sorrow for the wrong he had done so true a friend.

"George," said Mr. Falconer, "the wrong you have done to me is nothing to the wrong you have done to God, and if I have not been the direct cause of your fall, at least I have not done all I might to prevent it; I feel I ought, with you, to confess before God my sin and shame."

Fastening the door, he then knelt down with his nephew, and after thanking God for preserving the wanderer, made full confession of his own sin, and fervently asked God to help George to carry out the resolutions he had that day made, and keep away from every form of temptation.

Believing that for intemperance, as for all other evils, the love of Christ is the sovereign cure, Mr. Falconer gladly took the opportunity of setting before his nephew the true way of salvation, through faith, in a crucified and risen Redeemer. That old, old story which has proved the power of God unto the salvation of millions touched the heart and met the wants of George Russell. He became a converted man, and lived to lead many of his old companions to Christ.

BOOKS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, February 13, 1881.

"Of making many books there is no end."—ECCLESIASTES 12 : 12.

Ancient Books—An Estate Sacrificed for a Book—The Mightiest Agency on Earth—The Types as a Weapon—The Market Flooded with Bad Books—Should Novels be Read?—The Mission of the Novel—Illustrious Examples—Infallible Tests of Literature—I. Avoid Misleading Books—A Romance-Reading Lady—II. Books Partly Good and Partly Bad—More Burrs than Blackberries—Books like Smallpox Hospitals—A Man Attacked by a Black Leopard—III. Unclean Pictorials—The Banquet of the Queen of Death—The Story of a Bad Book's Work—The Assize of the Books—A Gay Woman's Strange Death?

THIS was written centuries before the art of printing was invented, and in ages of the world when books were chiselled in stone, and baked in clay and impressed in wax, and scratched on the bark of trees, and written on parchment. It was no unusual thing for a man to walk a hundred miles to read a book. We are told of volumes that were chained to pillars and to walls in order that men might make long pilgrimages and read them, and not be tempted to carry them away.

A Sicilian scholar parted with his entire estate to get one copy of Livy; Jerome ruined himself financially in buying the works of Origen, and if in those ages of the world Solomon was amazed at the vast literature abroad, and said in his time, "of making many books there is no end," what would he say if he could now descend and make the tour of our American and English publishing houses? Books on all subjects. Books of all styles. Books of all places. Books. Books. "Of making many books there is no end." The printing-press is for good or evil. The position of a minister of religion standing in his pulpit is a responsible position, but it does not seem to me so responsible a position as that of the editor and the publisher. At what distant point of time, at what distant cycle of eternity, will cease the influence of the four great departed editors of New York—Henry J. Raymond, Horace Greeley, James Gordon Bennett, and William Cullen Bryant? Men die, but the literary influences they project go on forever.

Taking into consideration the fact that there are now New York and Brooklyn dailies with a circulation of over five hundred thousand copies, and taking into consideration that there are three weekly periodicals with about one million of circulation, I want you to sit down and cipher out, if you can, how far up, and how far down, and how far out reaches the influence of the American printing-press. I believe that God has made the printing-press to be the chief agent in the world's correction and evangelization, and that the great final battle of the world will be fought, not with guns and swords, but with types and presses, a gospelized and purified literature triumphing over and trampling under foot and crushing out a corrupt literature. God speed the cylinders of an honest, intelligent, aggressive, Christian printing-press!

I put to you to-day, and to your families, the stupendous question,

WHAT BOOKS AND NEWSPAPERS SHALL WE READ?

You see I group them together. A newspaper is a book in swifter and more portable shape, and the rule that applies to books will apply to newspapers. The best way to overcome a bad book is by publishing a good one. The best way to overcome pernicious journalism is by scattering abroad healthful newspapers.

Now, shall we make our minds the receptacle of everything that bad authors have a mind to write? Shall we make no distinction between the tree of life and the tree of death? Shall we stoop down and drink out of the trough which the wickedness of men has filled with pollution and shame? Shall we chase the fantastic will-o'-the-wisps across the swamp, and mire in impurity when we may walk in the blooming gardens of God? You and I must decide for our present welfare and our everlasting happiness what we shall read, and we cannot afford to make a mistake. God help me this morning, and help you, that I may present the right theory, and that we may all be enabled to adopt it.

Standing as we do chin deep in the fictitious literature of the day, the question is asked us, What novels shall we read, if we read any? Shall we read any? What advice shall we give to our young people in regard to

FICTITIOUS LITERATURE?

There are good, pure, honest, Christian novels—those that elevate the heart and purify the life. A novel is history and poetry combined—the history of things around us, with the licenses and the assumed names of poetry. The world will never be able to pay the debt of obligation it owes to such fictitious writers as Hawthorne, and M'Kenzie, and Landor, and Hunt, and Arthur, and Marion Harland, and others whose names easily occur to you. No one has ever better set forth the follies of high life than did Miss Edgeworth. No one has ever more faithfully embalmed the memories of the past than has Walter Scott. Cooper's novels are healthy with the breath of seaweed and the air of the American forest. Charles Kingsley has done wonders in curing the morbidity of the world, and showing the poetry of strong muscle and good health and fresh air. Thackeray has brought the world under obligation by his caricature of the pretenders to gentility and high blood. Charles Dickens has built his monument in his own books, which are an everlasting plea for the poor and an anathema against injustice.

Now, it is certain that this style of books rightly read and read in right proportion with other books, will have an elevating and purifying and ennobling and enlarging influence; but I have to deplore, as you will deplore, the fact that there is setting in in this country. It is coming in like a freshet overflowing all the banks of decency and common-sense. Some of the most reputable publishing houses of the country are printing them. Some of the religious papers are commending them. You find them in the school-girl's desk, in the young man's trunk, in the steamboat cabin, on the table of the reception-room.

You see a light in your child's room late at night. You go in and say, "What are you doing?" The boy says, "I am reading." You say, "What are you reading?" "Reading a book." "Well, what is the book?" You take hold of the book, and you see it is a bad book, and you say, "Where did you get this book?" "Oh," he says, "I borrowed it!" There is always some one glad to loan a bad book to your boy. Pernicious literature everywhere. I charge upon it the destruction of tens of thousands of immortal souls, and I bid you wake up to this tremendous evil.

I am going this morning to gather all the books together, novels good and bad, travels true and false, histories faithful and inaccurate, legends beautiful and monstrous—all catalogues, all chronicles, all family, city, state, and national libraries, and I will pile them up in one great pyramid of literature, and bring to bear upon it certain grand, glorious, unmistakable, and so that instead of going away saying, I recommend this, or denounce that, every man and every woman with an awakened conscience will be able to decide for himself and for herself.

I. In the first place, I counsel you to avoid all those books which give false portraiture of human life. Life is neither a tragedy nor a farce, men are not all knaves or heroes, women are neither angels nor furies, and yet much of the literature of the day would seem to give you the idea that instead of life being an earnest, practical thing, it is a fantastic and extravagant thing.

How are that young man and that young woman prepared for the duties of the day who by reading romances last night waded through stories of magnificent knavery and wickedness? an indiscriminate reader of novels is inane, useless, and a nuisance, unfit for store, bank, office, factory, street, home—anywhere. A woman who is an indiscriminate reader of novels is unfitted for her duty as wife, mother, sister, daughter. There she is at midnight, bending over the romance. Hair dishevelled, countenance vacant, hand tremulous, cheek pale, bursting into tears at the story of an unfortunate lover!

There she is, by day, when she ought to be busy, gazing for one long hour at—nothing! Biting her finger-nails into the quick. The carpets that were plain before on the floor of the home, will be plainer, now that in the romance she has been walking through tessellated halls of castles, beside plumed princesses, or lounging in the arbor with polished desperado. Oh, these indiscriminate readers of fiction they are unfitted for this life which is a tremendous discipline, they are unfitted for the furnaces of trial through which they have to pass, they are unfitted for this life where all we gain is achieved by hard, long-continued, exhaustive and tremendous work!

II. Again: I counsel you to avoid all those books which while they have good in them have also a large admixture of evil. What has been your history in the reading of books which were

PARTLY GOOD AND PARTLY BAD?

Which stuck the longest, the good or the bad? The bad. Most human intellects are so fashioned that they allow the small particles of good like a sieve to fall through, and hold the great cinders. There is here and there an intellect, which, like a load-stone plunged amid steel and brass filings gathers up the steel and repels the brass filings; but it is the exception.

The best man that ever lived cannot afford to read a bad book, unless you read it for professional purposes, for the purpose of making the world better, just as a doctor may go through a small-pox hospital, or through a lazaretto studying disease that he may go forth and benefit the world with his theories in regard to health and in regard to sickness. But you go into a bad book to get the good out of it and you will make a terrible mistake. You will plunge through a hedge of burrs to get one blackberry, and you will get more burrs than blackberries.

You say the evil in the book is so insignificant it will not amount to anything. I tell you that the scratch of a pin has sometimes produced lock-jaw. You go out of curiosity prying into a bad book, and you are making as dangerous an experiment as the man who should take a lighted torch into a gunpowder mill to find out whether really there is any danger of its blowing up. He will find out, but the experiment will never be of any advantage to anybody.

Years ago there was on exhibition in New York a black leopard, a very dangerous animal, but very beautiful. A gentleman stood looking through the bars of the cage at the black leopard. It seemed so mild, so quiet, so beautiful he felt as if he would like to stroke the sleek hide. He stood a little while considering whether it would be safe. Everything seemed safe and he put his hand through the bars of the cage and stroked the sleek and beautiful hide of the black leopard; but no sooner had he touched it than it sprang upon him, and he pulled forth his arm and his hand mauled and bleeding, and ready for amputation. Look out how you toy with iniquity. It may be very beautiful, very attractive, and seem very placid; but you attempt to stroke it and you may pull forth your soul torn and bleeding under the clutch of the black leopard.

You say, "How are we to find out what books are good or bad without reading them?" Every bad book has something suspicious about it. There is something suspicious in the index or in the engraving. You take any book to any intelligent man, and in five minutes by shuffling the leaves and looking at the index he can tell you whether it is a good book or a bad one, and out of a thousand attempts he will not make one mistake. This reptile of bad literature carries a warning rattle.

III. Again: I counsel you to avoid all

BOOKS THAT CORRUPT THE IMAGINATION

and arouse the base passions. I do not refer now to the bad book the villain has under his arm, standing at the street corner waiting for the school to come out, then looking up and down the street, and finding no police near by, offers the book to your boy on his way home. I do not refer to that, but I refer to literature which evades the law, and is written in polished style, and with acute plot sounds the tocsin that arouses all the baser passions of the soul.

Many years ago, there was a lady who came forth as an authoress under the assumed name of Georges Sand. She smoked cigars. She dressed like a gentleman. She wrote in style ardent and eloquent, mighty in its gloom, terrible in its unchastity, vivid in its portraiture, damnable in its influence, putting forth an evil which has never relaxed, but has hundreds of copyists. So much worse now are many of these French books coming to America than anything Georges Sand ever wrote that if she were alive now she might be thought almost a reformer.

Right under the nostrils of your great cities there is a reeking, unwashed literature enough to poison all the fountains of public virtue and smite your sons and daughters as with the wing of a destroying angel, and it is high time that ministers of religion should blow the trumpet and rally the troops of righteousness, all armed to the teeth in this battle against a corrupt literature.

IV. Again: I remark you are to avoid all

BOOKS WHICH ARE APOLOGETIC FOR CRIME.

It is a deplorable fact that some of the richest bookbindery and the finest rhetoric are brought into the service of sin. Now, sin is loathesome anyhow. It is born in shame and it dies howling in the darkness. In this world it is scourged with a whip of scorpions, and afterward it is pursued by God's thunders of wrath across a boundless desert of ruin and woe.

All those books that represent sin as happy and congratulated, and sin as finally successful, are an insult to God and a blasting influence to the human race. Sin is never happy. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Sin is never finally successful. "The way of the wicked He turneth upside down." Those books that represent the opposite of this, that sin is happy, that sin is finally successful, are slanders on the human race and an outrage on God, who made the human race. If you present carnality, do not present it as looking from behind embroidered curtains, or through the lattice of a royal seraglio, but as writhing in the agonies of a city hospital.

Cursed of God and man be all those books which would try to make impurity decent and iniquity right and hypocrisy honorable! Cursed be all those books swarming with libertines and desperadoes, filling the minds of young people with sin and whirring them into iniquity! Ye authors who write them, ye publishers who print them, ye booksellers who sell them, you will be cut to pieces after a while, if not with the indignation of the community, then with the wrath of that God who will by no means clear the guilty. A mighty responsibility that man undertakes who has anything to do with iniquitous literature.

The hour strikes midnight. She is bending over the depraved romance. The cheeks are flushed with the color that soon dies out. Hot tears fall. Breath is quick and irregular. The hand trembles as though a guardian angel were trying to shake the book out of her grasp. The sweat on the brow is the spray dashed up from the river of death. She laughs; the sound drops dead. Four o'clock in the morning! The day will soon look upon her as though she were a detained spectre of the night. Soon in the madhouse, she will mistake the ringlets for coiling serpents, and she will thrust her white hand through the bars, and smite her head, and push it as though to shove the scalp from the skull, crying, "my brain! my brain!" Mad! Mad!

Oh, stand off from such an accursed literature! Why go sounding among the reefs and the warning buoys of such a dangerous coast when there is a vast ocean where you may voyage all sail set?

V. In this connection I class unclean pictorials doing a tremendous work for death. You find these death-warrants on all the streets. For a good, healthful picture we have great admiration. What a good author may take four hundred pages to present, a good engraver could present on the half side of a pictorial. Costly paintings are the aristocracy of art; engraving is the democracy of art. The best part of a picture that cost $10,000 you may buy for ten cents. I say the best part. So we ought to rejoice in the multiplication of pictures. It is the intense, it is the quick way of presenting a truth.

A man never gets over his love for pictures. The little child is entranced with them; we all are entranced with them. If a book be presented to us, we first look at the pictures. Multiply them. After the children are gathered after the evening repast, put before them the pictures. Nail them to the wall of the nursery—the pictures. Put them on the couch of the invalid. Strew them all through the railroad cars and steamboat cabins to refresh the travellers. Gather pictures in your albums and portfolios. Bless God for pictures and may they multiply all over the earth these messengers of knowledge and of mercy.

But the unclean pictorials are doing a work vast for death and perdition. Many a young man for ten cents buys his everlasting undoing. It poisons his soul, his soul may poison ten other souls, they may poison hundreds, the hundreds thousands, the thousands millions. It will take the measuring line of eternity to tell how far out has gone the influence of that one unclean pictorial. He may unroll it amid the roaring mirth of his comrades; but if they could see the result on that young man's heart and life instead of laughing they would weep.

The queen of death holds a banquet every night, and these unclean pictorials are the printed invitations to the guests. Alas! that the fair brow of American art should be blotched with this plague-spot, and that philanthropists, worried about lesser evils, should give so little time to this calamity. Young men, have nothing to do with these pictures. Do not take the moral strychnine into your soul. Do not take up this nest of coiling adders and put it in your pocket. Do not patronize the news-stand that sells them.

A man is no better than the pictures he loves to look at. I will give you $1000 reward for any young man who remains pure, and yet has the regular habit of buying unclean pictorials—$1000 reward for one specimen Ah, my friends, Satan sometimes failing to get a soul by inducing him to read a bad book captures him by getting him to look at an impure periodical! When Satan goes fishing he does not care whether it is a long line or a short line, if he only hauls his victim in.

GOOD AND BAD RESULTS.

If this morning I have placed before you, fathers, and mothers, and young men, and young women, tests by which you may know what a good newspaper is and what a bad newspaper, what good books, and what bad books, I will have done a work that I will not be ashamed of on that day when God shall try every man's work of what sort it is. Encourage good literature. Do not begrudge the three or five pennies you pay for your morning newspaper. In every possible way, encourage the literature of the world so far as it is pure; so far as it is bad, denounce it. Do not purchase it even out of curiosity. You remember that one column of a good newspaper may save your soul, and that one paragraph of a bad newspaper may damn it.

Benjamin Franklin said that his reading of Cotton Mather's essay "To Do Good" entirely moulded his after-life. The assassin of Lord Russell declared he was led into a life of crime by reading one vicious romance. John Angel James, than whom the world or the Church never produced a purer or better man, declared in time of old age than he had never got over reading for fifteen minutes a bad book in early life. And there are men and women in this house—not exceptional, there are scores of them—who have a tragedy connected with some book. There is some young man in this house, or some man farther on in years, who remembers that his first step astray was the reading of a bad book.

I rememember one infidel book in the possession of my student companion. He said, "De Witt, would you like to read that book?" "Well," said I, "I would like to look at it." I read it a little while. I said to him, "I dare not read that book; you had better destroy it; I give you my advice, you had better destroy it. I dare not read that book. I have read enough of it." "Oh," he said, "haven't you a stronger mind than that? Can't you read a book you don't exactly believe, and not be affected by it?" I said, "You had better destroy it." He kept it.

He read it. He poured over it. He read it and re-read it. He read it until he gave up his Bible. He read it until he gave up his belief in the existence of a God. He read it until he gave up his good morals. He read it until body, mind, and soul were ruined—the body smitten with disease, the mind deranged—and he went into the insane asylum, and the story of that book, that one infidel book, will never be told in this world.

I read too much of it. I read about fifteen or twenty pages of it. I wish I had never read it. It never did me any good; it did me harm. I have often struggled with what I read in that book. I rejected it, I denounced it, I cast it out with infinite scorn, I hated it, yet sometimes it has troubled me. You cannot afford to read a bad book, young man, you cannot afford it.

A BOOK ASSIZE.

Now, go home to your libraries, to-day, fathers, mothers, young men, young women—go to the libraries in your homes, and from shelf to shelf make examination, and by the Gospel tests I have presented this morning try the books. Then, when you are through with the libraries, go to the tables where you have the newspapers and the pictorials. If you find anything either in the library or on the stand that will not endure the tests I have put before you this morning, then take it—do not give it to some one, for that might despoil a soul—do not sell it, for the price of it would be the price of blood; but kindle a fire on your kitchen hearth, or in your back yard, and when it is well kindled drop in the poison, and keep stirring the blaze until all is gone to ashes from preface to appendix.

We must not forget that in addition to all these other things I said, there is an eternity behind us, and there is an eternity before us, and anything that will unfit us for the coming eternity is a very bad investment; and alas! for that man or that woman who, going away this morning resolved to adhere to iniquitous literature or sinful amusement, goes right on in that way. The Lord will stop you after a while. The day is coming.

A GAY WOMAN'S DEATH.

A woman who had gone the whole round of gayety, and who had dived into all sorts of literature, came to her last day on earth, and she said in the morning, "At six o'clock to-night I am going to die; my day of grace is ended, and I will be lost." "Why," they said, "you are not sick; why do you talk in this way?" "Well," she said, "my day of grace is ended, and at six o'clock to-night, I shall depart, and my soul will be lost."

Noonday came. They insisted upon calling in medical advice. "Oh, no," she said, "it is all settled with me!" Four o'clock came, and five o'clock, and she said: "Destroyed spirits, it is five o'clock, not six—it is five o'clock, not six. You have me not yet: it is five o'clock, not six." Then the shadows of the evening began to gather, and the clock struck six, and while it was striking six her soul sped away into the next world.

I cannot tell at what time you and I will have to go. It may be six o'clock this evening, it may be three o'clock this afternoon, it may be one, it may be this moment. What will be our destiny? Eternity behind us. Eternity before us. What has been my influence? What has been your influence? What have we read? What have we talked? What have we said? How have we preached? Oh, that God in the closing moments of this service might roll over on this audience the importance of the theme that I have this morning presented, that at the last we may not be put to confusion! It may be to-morrow. It may be now. Will we be ready?

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The House of Prayer on Fire—What to do to an Enemy—In the Rectory—The Clergyman's Daughter—"What is a Prayer-Meeting?"—Who Wears the Surplice?—The Gardener's Explanation.

IN the mean time the pipe lightings thrown by the men on the wall of the room where the prayer-meeting had been held had done their work. The wood of the shed smouldered on for some time, until a column of smoke began to rise, and a flame forked out its angry tongue.

Then the smoke, and flame, and crackle, and roar awoke an old woman who lived in one room of a cottage not very far off. Shrieking with terror, she emitted her night-capped head as far as it could protrude from her bedroom window, and raising her shrillest of voices to its very highest pitch, she invoked the aid of the police; interlarding her cries with remarks such as these:

"Pleece! Pleece! The place is afire. Come quick, quick, quick! or we shall all be burnt to our deaths. Come here, you good-for-nothing old slow-coaches, you! You ain't worth your salt—you ain't. Come h—e—r—e!" she shrieked in prolonged screams.

But no sooner did she behold the policemen flying to the scene of action at the most rapid pace that their heavy feet could carry them, than her vituperations knew no bounds.

"You rascals, you! I'll warm ye! I'll teach ye to come when ye're called! You rogues! You battle-axes!" (she thought the latter was a very bad name, though haply it was as innocent as it was original). "You old kettledrums!" This was addressed to one of the firemen, who, running at a rapid trot, was preceding his fire-engine, which after a time he had valiantly ordered to be brought forth.

So saying, she emptied over the head of her most valiant protector a large jug of cold water from the window—which she usually kept reserved for boiling in her kettle, with a view to tea. Her excitement was so great that she unfortunately needed a vent for it, and still more unfortunately found the vent on the head of the valiant fireman. No one could have been more surprised than he was at this sudden and unexpected douche.

He raised his helmeted head toward the window, contented himself with shaking his fist at the little white nightcap above him, and proceeded on his way, his ardor decidedly cooled. By this time happily the fire had begun to die out, and its few remaining threats were quickly extinguished by an accession to the police force of excited neighbors, who threw unlimited pails of water over the ruins until the last spark was extinct.

"That comes of praying too much," said the old woman, as she retired under the sheets again.

"It is the burning of Jerusalem," said Mike in all gravity, when to his woe he beheld the scene of wreck the next morning. "An enemy hath done this," he added in an undertone, soliloquizing after a pause, "Whatever shall we do?" and then answering, "We'll find him out and love him. That's what the Master says."

"Everybody" was talking about the fire. "Who did it?" "How did it happen?" "Where was it?" These were the questions that passed down the electric line of local curiosity that morning, answers being provided according to the imagination or information of the referee.

The rector's child was coming down the broad carpeted staircase to breakfast, when she saw her father in front of her in the hall.

"Papa," she called out, "there's been a fire! It was in the night, and a great roaring flame came up over the tops of the houses."

"A fire, my child!" said her father, stooping down to bestow his good-morning kiss. "How did you hear that?"

"Hopkins told Anne, and Anne told Julia, and Julia told me," she replied, following him into the dining-room. Here a pile of letters lay on the snowy tablecloth, which set off to advantage the china and silver that lay ready placed for the morning meal.

A stout old lady with gray curls was attending to her teapot duties at one end of the table.

"Good-morning!" said the rector, as he entered. She was his maiden sister, who had kept house for him since his wife's death some years ago.

"Good-morning, my dear," said the aunt to the child, thus economizing her greetings, as waste of words was a thing she considered quite as culpable as any other kind of waste; and she generally thus addressed the two in one at this particular hour of the day.

"Have you heard that there was a fire in the town last night?" she asked.

"Yes," Mr. Habershon answered, "so this young person has just told me. Come here, Aleth," and he sat down in his chair, extending an arm into which the child instantly folded herself.

At this moment a servant entered with a tray containing the principal elements of the rector's breakfast. There were eggs ready boiled, a couple of hot dishes, and some toast. As he placed these on the table, his master said:

"Hopkins, what is this about a fire?"

"It was down in the Black Alley, near South End, sir," replied Hopkins; "so they say."

"Was there any mischief done?" the rector inquired, adding, "I am glad it wasn't close by."

"Why, papa?" asked Aleth innocently.

"The wood-yard and the haystacks," he replied, parenthetically, while he looked up for Hopkins' answer.

"It was an old shed, I believe, sir," answered the butler. "There wasn't any more damage done, as I could hear of. The people living thereabouts was a good deal frightened, I fancy."

A funny twinkle flashed into Mr. Habershon's eyes as he heard this, and when the man went out of the room he released Aleth, bursting into a most hearty fit of laughing, and rolling about in his arm-chair.

"Papa, what is the matter?" asked Aleth, gazing upon him. Then, quite infected with the fun, she laughed too.

"I was just wondering," he said, looking across the table to his sister, "whether by any possibility it could be that tumble-down place where those old fools 'go to prayer-meetin',' as they call it. It really would be a lucky thing if it were. Ha! ha! ha!" and he went off again into fits of laughing.

"What's prayer-meetin'?" asked the child.

"Oh, do be quiet, child. You don't understand anything about it," said her aunt. Then addressing her brother, she remarked, "A kind of low Dissenters, aren't they?"

"I'm sure I don't know what you call them," replied the rector. "They come to the church almost every Sunday, but they are not content with the ordinances there provided apparently, it would seem; for in a singularly independent spirit, they must needs conduct in solitude their midnight devotions, and in a building that can scarcely be called ecclesiastical." His own joke was too much for him, and he collapsed again, greatly to Aleth's delight, who shouted and clapped her hands as he laughed once more.

"Don't!" said her aunt. "A righteous judgment I should call it."

* * * * * * * *

When Aleth went up-stairs, she said to her nurse while she took off her smart pinafore and clothed her in a school-room one:

"Nursie, what is a prayer-meetin', and judgment, and 'zastical, and 'dependent'?"

"Dearie me!" said the nurse, holding up her hands. "Did you ever! Whatever has the child got hold of? I am sure I don't know, my dear. You shouldn't be getting hold of things like that."

"But I want to know, nurse," repeated the child. "I think I'll ask Mr. Hutton when I go out."

Hutton was the gardener, who, if the truth were known, was rather a friend and confidant of Miss Aleth's.

Accordingly, when she had done her lessons with the daily governess, who usually arrived at ten o'clock, and instructed her till twelve, when she had either a walk, or a scamper on her pony, or a ramble about the garden, she sallied forth in her gray gypsy hat tied under her chin with red ribbons, and soft warm jacket trimmed with fur.

First, she went to the study-window, peered in at her father, as he sat by the great study-table full of drawers, writing his letters, tapped on the window-pane, kissed her hand to him, and then she proceeded along the narrow path between the massive brier hedge that concealed the "back regions" from public view and the piece of ground that was generally denominated the old kitchen garden. This path brought her to the fowl-house. Here she searched for eggs, found some fresh ones, placed them in her tiny basket, carried them back to the Hall, where on a sort of oak settle she carefully deposited them.

Then she returned to the lawn, where she was met by a woolly poodle, who capered about on his hind legs in front of her. Her delighted pats on his soft back were interspersed by grave admonitions as to his unfortunate tendency for black and muddy paws, whereas, as she continually reminded him, he "ought to be white all over."

At this moment a broad-shouldered, stooping figure, with loose brown coat, that always depended deeply at the pockets, was seen in the distance threading his way amid the empty flower-beds and toward the glass houses.

"Gardener! gardener! Mr. Hutton!" she called out, running toward him.

"Good-morning, Miss Aleth," said the man. "I've got a tiny little fern for you. Look! here it is in a pot, all ready waiting."

So saying, he opened the greenhouse door, and showed it to her.

Aleth's joy over this acquisition was so great, and her chatter on the various subjects of interest between them so merry, that the time flew as she ran and returned, and prattled, and romped with Fido, and searched for old nests in the laurels, and helped to weed, and helped to tie up the plants. Suddenly she remembered "the fire" which had formed the subject of her father's morning conversation and amusement. So she inquired:

"What's a prayer-meetin', Mr. Hutton?"

"Well, Miss Aleth, it's just a lot of people coming together to pray."

"Oh! like church," said Aleth.

"Well, my dear—no, Miss Aleth, it ain't exactly like that. But it's something the same too."

"What do they do?" said Aleth.

"They prays to God, and reads in His word, and talks to one another a bit," Hutton explained as best he could.

"Prays to God!" said Aleth, opening her brown eyes; "and does Mr. Long go?"

Mr. Long was the curate.

"Oh, my dear, no!" said the gardener.

"And who wears the surplice?" asked Aleth.

"Really, Miss Aleth, I don't know what you mean, or what you are talking about at all," responded the unfortunate and puzzled Mr. Hutton.

"You know Hopkins said there was a fire last night somewhere in the town, and then he said something about a shed; and papa laughed so very much and said something about a prayer-meetin'."

"Well, Miss Aleth, you know it says in the Bible, 'Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them.' That's why some of us likes to go and pray together. Old Bateman, he always comes, and some more besides."

"And does Bateman have the surplice?"

This idea was too comic even for the grave Hutton to resist, and his thoughtful features widened into a smile.

"No, Miss Aleth, there's no surplices in heaven—leastways not that I can hear tell of; and there's none down at the praying-place. Poor old shed!" he said to himself more than to her, "it's all burnt now!"

"What a pity!" said Aleth, sympathizingly. "But that wasn't funny. It must have been something else." She pondered for a moment, and then, as if a bright idea had struck her, she suddenly put her gypsy hat under his grave face, as he stooped over a flower-pot, and said, "Perhaps it was something else. What does 'zastical mean? Can you tell me?"

Happily for the bewildered brains of the gardener, at this moment the luncheon bell was heard in full operation at the garden door, ringing for Miss Aleth's express benefit, as she was the only person likely to be gamboling about at that hour of the day in those sedate precincts.

BALM IN GILEAD.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

"Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of My people recovered?"—JEREMIAH 8 : 22.

II. The blessing of

A DIVINE REMEDY.

Seeing, then, the disease, the question comes now to be asked, "Why is not the health of the daughter of My people recovered?"

1. And now, in the first place, I say that whatever the reason is, it is not because there is no cure. There is a remedy—sovereign, specific, universal. Balm there is in Gilead; there is a dexterous and infallible Physician there. There are many diseases, you know, which baffle all human healers, and oftentimes remedies are only partially successful; or, in their action, they develop a latent weakness in another part, and so become means of injury rather than of benefit; and the sadness of the wounded spirit many a time beclouds the dying hope, and with a smart no words can tell, the eye looks to the vacant place in the chair, and the open grave in the cemetery, and there is in the heart a void, a void of most unutterable aching.

2. Ah! but there need be no mistrust of this kind, no dark, fearful bodings of this kind in spiritual maladies, if there be only a timely appliance to the Physician of souls. His "Ephphatha" can cause any blind to see; His anointing can ravish any deadened soul with celestial music; a touch from this King of Salem—not fabled, but in fact—can charm the deadliest ulcer away; a word from this Healer can bring life unto the very dead. To dilate upon the disease, upon its terrible loathsomeness, upon its rapid spread, were useless, it were cruel, if we had not a remedy—a remedy commensurate in extent, a remedy which has never been known to fail, and that remedy is here, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

Sinner, here is your hope, your only hope, but your all-sufficient hope. Your disease may be very malignant, but it can be healed; you may but recently have become conscious of its ravages, but it can be healed. You imagine it too innate, too deeply ingrained in your nature to be cured, but it can be healed. It may be of long standing, it may be of angry type, it may be of rapid spread, it may be of acute pain, but it can be healed: apply the balm. Come now to the dexterous Physician; have faith in Jesus; He can heal thee, heal thee thoroughly, heal thee now; and if thou sincerely comest to Him He will.

There is no complication of disorder which He is powerless to heal, there is no solitary sinner—surely God has sent me with this message to some heart in His presence—there is no solitary sinner, however foul and loathsome and self-abhorred; there is no solitary sinner out of hell, whom His blood cannot subdue and save. If the health of the daughter of My people is not recovered, then it is not because there is no Physician. Let us look into some of the reasons by which the recovery is retarded. I take it that if there be an infallible specific, and if there be a dexterous and kind Physician, and if still the people die, the fault must be in themselves.

III. Reasons

WHY THE REMEDY FAILS.

There are three reasons which strike me as the principal reasons why, with all these unfailing appliances of cure, the health of the daughter of My people is not recovered.

1. In the first place, there are many among us who will not admit themselves ill; many among us who will not admit they have need of the Healer at all. There are physical maladies, you know, that are insidious in their approach—the sappers of the great destroyer's army, who work on in darkness, and seize the heart's citadel, or ever the watchers are aware. Tell such individuals that they are in danger, impress upon them the necessity of watchfulness and attention if they would preserve their health, and their only answer is a look of wonderful incredulity, or perhaps a careless laugh, which bodes not of the coming peril. What! I, I in danger? Why, life is all before me. "Youth is at the prow, and pleasure at the helm." "There are roses on my cheek; my imagination leaps up in many a bounding dream. I sing of summers and not of sepulchres, and of the triumph, not of the struggle: don't talk of danger to me; go and tell such things to the weary, and the ruined, and the desolate!"

There are multitudes who speak to us thus when we tell them of their spiritual danger, and when we urge them to decision for Christ. So thick is the veil of darkness around the heart of the unconverted man, that there are many, not only among the aliens, but among those whom education has brought into the temple, until the temple has become a necessity to them, who are deluded as to their real condition before God. They join in the confession of the worshippers; they tell the Lord, Sabbath after Sabbath, that they will not dissemble nor cloak their sins before Him, but they have no feeling about the words, they have but a dim and very transient sense of the meaning of the expressions they use; they are not convinced of sin.

Oh! it is terrible to think of the carelessness with which men put away from themselves all that is personal and searching in the truth: and the arrows fall blunted from the conscience that is thus seared as with a hot iron. Oh, it is terrible that men can talk fluently of the peril of other people while the plague is in their own bodies, and, shorn of their own strength, they are just ready to die.

Brethren, it is to you I speak—rich, but destitute of real penitence before God; or poor, and smitten into a deeper poverty because of your heart's hardness and rebellion — you, with your heart unbroken; you that in your own conceit fancy yourselves secure; of understanding wilfully blind, it is no wonder that publicans and harlots, whose sin has been opened, and whose confession was wrung from them in the agony of remorse, should pass into the kingdom of God before you. The first need of your spirit is conviction of sin. You must fall contrite before the Saviour. Oh, may the hammer of the Word break your hearts to-day!

2. And then there is another class. There are men who will acknowledge that they are guilty, that they are diseased, but who vainly seek elsewhere for the remedy.

Here, we have not so much an analogy as a contrast. In the maladies of the body it is perfectly legitimate to choose one's own physician; and, amid the world of opinion around us, there is so much uncertainty, and

and so much empiricism, even in the soundest medical science, that the remedy which is approved curative in one case, will be absolutely destructive in another; and the same remedy may be a benefit or an injury to the same person suffering from the same disease, only in a different physiological condition of body.

But in the cure of the soul's ailment, there is but one balm, there is but one Physician; that cure of the wound original if permitted at all is of the free grace of God. God was not bound to allow it; He would have been just, inflexibly just, if He had abided by the Adamic covenant, which made no provision for recovery after lapse and loss had occurred. All our rights were forfeited to the justice of God. But He has foregone His claim; He has declared that the sinner shall have another chance, that the wickedness of the wicked shall not at once destroy him; and surely to Him alone belongs the prescription of the terms by which the salvation shall be offered unto the sinner. He has offered these terms: the sprinkling of the blood, the balm of Gilead, the dexterous Physician. He has proclaimed that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby they can be saved.

All other physicians are physicians of no value. Like the enchanters of Egypt, they are skilful to multiply plagues, but they are powerless to remedy them. They may mask the horror, they may numb the sensibilities, but they cannot heal the wound, they cannot recover the plague. It is not in natural contemplation, it is not in scientific research, it is not in outward reformation, it is not in rigid rubrics that the soul can save itself. It is in Christ, the law's victim; it is in Christ, the soul's virtue; it is in Christ, the world's only Substitute and the world's only Saviour. Brethren, need I impress upon you that there is no other salvation but in Jesus? All efforts to obtain pardon, and purity, or heaven, apart from Christ, must be utterly, absolutely in vain.

3. Then there is another class, a class who feel their danger, who come to the remedy, but who do not obey which the Physician has given. It is common enough, you know, in ordinary life, to consult a physician, from aroused fear or from the anxiety of friends; but to hold his opinion lightly, and to suspend his treatment after a very brief and imperfect trial.

Alas! are there not multitudes who, under the influence of some roused anxiety or of some precious impression, manifest a desire for spiritual teaching, and thrill the hearts of the godly with hopefulness and promise; but the morning cloud vanishes, and the early dew is exhaled by the fierce heat of the world's brilliant summer. Oh, it would be a melancholy narrative if I could come down from the pulpit and converse with individuals among you that are yet unsaved; what would the record be?

A CEMETERY OF DEAD SOULS.

Will you tell me the biography, the memories of your dead impressions of religion? Dare you go into that cemetery? Dare you walk amid those graves? Some of them have no tombstones; you have no cherished recollections of them; you would rather that they would die out in oblivion and decay. Some of them have inscriptions upon them: "Died of lingering decline;" "Slain by some sudden onslaught of temptation." Drowned, alas! alas! in the ocean of intemperance. Smitten suddenly after years of wasting, by ossification of the heart—until, sickened with weeping, we turn away from our pilgrimage in this necropolis of souls.

Oh, in reference to many of you, would it not be yours, to have to borrow the title of a work of modern times, "Passages from the History of a Wasted Life?" You began in the Spirit, why did you end in the flesh? You did run well—why, oh, why did you linger? You were not far from the kingdom of God—why, oh, why are you not in? Christ waiteth to be gracious. He will not upbraid you, and if you will come to Him you may be healed of whatsoever disease you have.

Brethren, the invitation is very solemn indeed to you. There are those here now to whom it applies, conscious of disease, deeply feeling the wound of the Spirit, and not yet restored by the power of the balm of Gilead.

Why, if you want health—why is it that you delay? Is it to gaze upon your wound, marking its festering, looking at the corruption, seeing how the livid blueness passes across and spreads along your frame, while, all the while that death is busy with you, close by your side, uplifted, there is the brazen serpent, upon which whosoever looks may live? Why, oh, why do you delay? Until you are better? Until you are worse? Until you can merit salvation? Until you can share with the Redeemer? Oh, vain and profitless hope—a hope which, like that of the hypocrite, shall perish! Why do you delay? Until you are worse? Until the last gasp comes? Until the great and terrible danger approaches? Until the film of the mortal darkness gathers upon the eye? Until the cheek is pale with the last struggle, with the last enemy? Surely you will not wait till then!

Now, in my Master's name, and with solemnity and affection of spirit for the salvation of you all, now I invite you. I invite you, without money and without price, to come unto this Physician that you may live. May God help you to come, and save you. Amen.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate has Rejected the Amendment to the Refunding Bill, by which the Finance Committee fixed the rate at three and a half per cent. The vote was taken on Thursday, February 17th, when 22 votes were cast for the amendment and 34 against it. The bill is now practically in the same condition as when it left the House. Rumors were current last week that the President would veto it, but well-informed persons denied the report, believing that Mr. Hayes would prefer to allow the decision of Congress to be fairly tested in the money markets.

If capitalists will lend their money to the government for three per cent it is obviously unnecessary to pay a higher rate, but should it be found that they are unwilling to do so, a heavy loss will be entailed on the nation, as the present high rate must be paid until the new bonds are substituted for those now in circulation. The risk is manifestly serious, for money may be readily employed in many ways so as to produce a higher return than three per cent, and although many lenders prefer lending to the government in preference to other borrowers, an inconsiderable portion of them are disposed to sacrifice much money for the privilege.

The question, therefore, is, Will a sufficient sum for refundng purposes be offered at the rate fixed? Mr. Sherman, Senators Bayard, Thurman, Davis, of Illinois, Edmunds, and Allison, and Comptroller Knox believe that the bonds will not be taken at that rate, and they are men of both parties who have given considerable attention to financial questions. The majority of both the Senate and the House are of a different opinion, and the responsibility therefore has devolved upon them. The result will show which opinion correctly indicated the state of the market.

The House of Representatives Passed the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill on Thursday last without material amendment. The final vote was 163 to 84. Many members who voted for the bill did so, admitting that it contained many appropriations to which they were opposed, but feeling that it would be a national calamity if no appropriations for the purpose were made, and believing that the present bill was the best it was possible to pass the House as it is now constituted. It is expected that alterations will be made on it in the Senate even if it is not rejected altogether.

The House Committee on Indian Affairs had under consideration on Friday the Ponca question, and decided, owing to the lateness of the session, not to report a bill to the House for their relief. It is obvious that unless persistent agitation is made, and public opinion clearly and forcibly expressed, the wrongs of the Poncas will still go unredressed.

In a letter on the subject by the Washington correspondent of a New York journal, there is quoted the opinion of a prominent official in the Indian Bureau, who said: "I gave up thinking of the Indian question years ago, for its abuses and horrors are so sickening and hopeless. I remember when those poor Poncas had their home in Iowa. Think of the moving they have had to do, between that place and the Indian Reservation. I have known Indian agent after Indian agent who, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars a year, in an incredibly short space of time amassed a fortune of hundreds of thousands of dollars. All out of the Indians, of course. I had an Indian friend, who said, referring to a new Indian agent 'A good man. He take only half' (measuring it on his fingers), 'only half for himself; the other half he gives the Indians. He good man.' Of another he said, 'he is a bad man. He gave only so much to Indian' (measuring his finger-nail). 'Took all the rest himself.' The point is that all belonged to the Indian. The man who robbed him of but half, by comparison, was the Indian's 'good man.'"

The Bill to Regulate and Improve the Civil Service which was introduced by Senator Pendleton, was reported back without amendment on February 16th by the Civil Service Committee. As already explained in this journal, it provides for a commission of five persons to have general control of examinations and appointments in the Civil Service, within certain limits laid down in the bill.

A society has been organized in Boston to agitate for Civil Service reform, of which the first meeting was held on February 18th. The leading principles are similar to those of the New York society and are as stated on the society's platform: "That while certain officers of the government should be in sympathy with the policy of the administration, the routine business should be conducted on business principles; that officers should be appointed on account of fitness for the work to be done, and should be continued in office as long as they do that work well; that offices should not be used for partisan purposes.

The Neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama and the independence of the United States of Colombia have again been the subject of diplomatic arrangement on the basis of the treaty of 1846. The protocol now signed determines the way in which the United States Government shall interfere to guarantee the independence of Colombia and the neutrality of the projected canal. One of the conditions of such interference is that Colombia must first ask for it, and that without such request or demand the United States shall not intervene. The promoters of the Lesseps scheme consider this protocol favorable to the success of their plans.

The Results of the Census have been Tabulated by the Census Bureau, which announces the following approximate distribution of the total population of the country among the several classes: Males, 25,520,582; females, 24,632,284: natives of the United States, 43,475,506; foreign born, 6,677,360; whites, 43,404,877; colored, 6,577,151; Indians and half breeds not in tribal relations on reservations under the care of the government, 65,122; Chinese, 105,463; other Asiatics, 255. The number of colored persons to each 100,000 whites is 15,153, against 14,528 in 1870. The number of females to every 100,000 males is 96,519, against 97,801 in 1870. The number of foreign born persons to every 100,000 natives is 15,359, against 16,875 in 1870.

The Death of Fernando Wood at Hot Springs, Ark., on February 13th, removes from the political sphere a figure which has been very prominent there for over forty years. Mr. Wood was first elected to Congress in 1840, as one of the four members-at-large for New York. After serving one term he devoted his energies to private business, and succeeded in amassing a considerable fortune. In 1854 Mr. Wood was elected Mayor of New York, and on two subsequent occasions was again elected to the same office. In 1862 he was elected to Congress, and has sat in every Congress except one since that time. During the last session his health was observed to have broken down, and he was urged to take temporary rest; but he was interested in the refunding question, and would not leave Washington until the bill was through the House. His persistent refusal to take the advice of his physicians is believed to have hastened his death.

An interesting incident in Mr. Wood's Congressional life is that when Professor Morse was leaving Washington, disappointed by his failure to induce Congress to adopt his invention, Mr. Wood met him and took up his case. He persuaded the House to allow a wire to be laid to the Senate Chamber to test the invention, and that test demonstrating its value the success of the enterprise was assured.

Mr. Wood was a clever man, bold and unscrupulous, with an active and vigorous constitution. He was very popular among certain classes in New York whose confidence is not easily gained, but whom he swayed at his will by his ready and magnetic eloquence. He was in his 69th year.

Gov. Murray, of Utah, in the course of a recent interview, expressed his fear of the social and political danger to be dreaded from the spread of Mormonism. He said: "It overshadows everything. It is capable of accomplishing its purposes, whatever they may be, by means of the extension of the suffrage to married women. Under the alien laws of the United States a man must be a resident of the country for a certain number of years and have attained a certain age before he is entitled to citizenship and to the franchise. Under the laws of Utah a man, the next day after naturalization, may marry as many wives as he chooses, and then they may all vote. He may, for instance, marry a Chinese girl twelve years old, who hasn't been in the country a month, and the act will entitle her to vote."

Accounts of a Wholesale Lynching come from Springfield, Tenn. A party of about two hundred armed men, well disciplined, waited outside a court room on February 18th, while five negroes were being tried for murder. The judge's charge to the jury was concluded, and the prisoners were brought out by the sheriff for conveyance to the jail to await the verdict of the jury, when the mob surrounded them, and taking the five prisoners from the custody of the sheriff hurried them to an upper story of the court-house and hanged them from the veranda. The lynchers remained on guard until they were satisfied that all the men were dead. Two men had previously been lynched for the same crime, and since then two others have met the same fate, and one man died in jail from injuries received at the hands of the mob. Thus ten men have been killed for the murder. The crime for which they suffered was a murder of sickening barbarity, but the action of the mob in a community in which law and justice reign is an insult to civilization which ought not to go unpunished.

The Fight of the People against Rings and bosses has been successful in Philadelphia, where as in New York the interests of the many were being sacrificed for the benefit of the few. The election held last week resulted in the defeat of the ring by a large majority. The remarkable feature of the contest was that the defeated candidates were all good men who, had the election turned on their merits, would have been elected, but an organized effort had been made to break the power of the ring, and it was believed that the nomination of unexceptionable candidates this year was only a device to allay opposition and perpetuate ring rule.

Chief Joseph, who Translated the New Testament into the Iroquois language, died a few days ago after a short illness. One of his last acts was to revise the proofs of an Iroquois edition of Moody and Sankey's Hymns. His work of translating was chiefly performed in prison. The priests of the Roman Catholic Seminary of St. Sulpice claimed possession of certain lands which the Oka Indians contended had been granted to the priests in trust for the Indians. Chief Joseph's imprisonments were occasioned by his entering these lands, for which he was arrested and charged with trespass. He was able when not in prison to engage in active Christian work among his people and the kindred tribe of Caughnawaga Indians.

A Deputation from the Society for the Suppression of vice waited on Mayor Grace of New York last week to call his attention to the numerous haunts of vice with which the city is infested. Mr. Whitney told the mayor that the city was overrun with gambling-houses and other places of crime. The police made no attempts to enforce the law, although their attention had been frequently directed to the matter. Mr. Whitney himself had given a long list of gambling-houses to one of the inspectors, but nothing had been done. The Excise law was continually being violated on Sundays, and not only did the police fail to enforce the law, but he had often seen policemen standing in front of open drinking resorts on Sunday talking with the proprietors. A detailed list of gambling-houses had recently been sent to the Police Commissioners, but they paid no attention to it. The society, therefore, asked the mayor to do what he could to have the law enforced. Mayor Grace said he was heartily in sympathy with every attempt to put down gambling and other vices. His powers were limited, but he would do what he could. He must have something tangible to act upon, and asked that a copy of the gambling-house list sent to the Police Commissioners be sent to him. Dr. Crosby promised to comply with this request.

The Fatal Results of Carelessness in Small matters were seen in New York on February 12th, when two young ladies were found dead in their bed from suffocation. An examination of the room in which they died showed the cause of their death. There were two gas-burners in the room, one of which had been turned on all night, but had not been lighted. It was evident that when the girls went to their room the preceding evening, both taps had been turned, and in a moment of forgetfulness one only had been lighted. On their retiring to rest, that had been extinguished and the other had been left open, and the escaping gas had done its fatal work. Constant care and watchfulness are necessary in all the affairs of our lives, not less in our spiritual than in our physical concerns, lest evil come upon us.

A Living Register of Ownership was Discovered near Augusta, Ga., a few days ago. A civil engineer was marking the lines of a lot of land below the city, and used as assistance a deed to the property drawn one hundred and twenty-one years ago. In one section of the deed it is recorded that the line touches a certain point where stands a beech-tree, and upon which a cross-mark had been made with an axe. The engineer ran his line to an old beech tree, and, concluding that this was the point in question, looked for the mark, but could not find it. Taking an axe he cut into the tree at a point he thought the mark might be, and, to his surprise, after cutting into the tree, he chipped out a block, and there was the identical mark referred to in the ancient document of one hundred and twenty-one years ago. The mark was perfect, but had been covered up. The rough testimony thus borne for more than a century by the old tree with its mark of the cross is an illustration of the Christian's life. When, in the "Pilgrim's Progress," Christian saw the cross his burden rolled off his shoulders: it was the boundary-mark in his life, it was the turning-point when an indelible mark of ownership was made to be borne not for a century only, but throughout the ages of eternity.

A Letter from the Winnebagoes to their Presidential "Father" in Washington, quoted in the Independent evinces the desires of this Indian tribe, and shows how deep is the responsibility now resting on the government, the churches, and all Christian citizens. The letter signed by thirty-eight chiefs of the tribe presents the following quaintly worded petitions: "Father, some years ago, when we had our home on Turkey River, we had a school for our children, where many of them learned to read and write, and work like white people, and we were happy.

"Father, many years have passed since our school was broken up. We have no such schools among us, and our children are growing up in ignorance of those things that should render them industrious, prosperous, and happy, and we are sorry. Father, it is our earnest wish to be so situated no longer. It is our sincere desire to have again established among us such a school as we see in operation among your Omaha children. Father, as soon as you find a permanent home for us, will you not do this for us? And we would like our children taught the Christian religion."

Thirty-Six Hours Under a Log.—Near Lake George, N. Y., a man, while cutting wood in the mountains, was knocked down, and a log twenty inches thick rolled upon one leg, securely holding him to the ground. The weather was intensely cold, and he was miles from any human being. His leg froze, and he suffered greatly from his cramped position. He worked until dark and all through the night endeavoring to cut the log in two with his pocket knife. After thirty-six hours' hard work, with his hands blistered and bleeding, he was found and liberated. In a similar manner do sinners often make strenuous efforts to effect their own salvation, but after all their labor have to be saved by the Saviour. Those are most happy who turn at once to the Saviour, who is never far off, and who receives them no matter how great their sin is.

An Apple-tree that Never Blossoms is Described by the Times, of Hartford, Conn. It is called by the villagers the "No-blow apple-tree." It is on a farm at Harwinton, Conn. The tree derived its queer name from the fact that it always fruited but never blossomed. The fruit had a sweet flavor, though the size was below the average, and when fully matured was sufficiently open at the blossom end so that the seeds might be easily shaken out. In the autumn the fruit buds set similar to the surrounding trees. In the spring the bud swelled, and threw out its feelers; but what we recognize as blossom was minus, and it took close observation and a studied acquaintance with its habits to detect anything even in the matured bud that would foreshadow fruitage. The tree is one of Nature's eccentricities and probably is unique in its characteristics; but in spiritual matters a similar peculiarity is often met with. The opening of the divine life in some souls differs so widely from the usual course that doubts arise in the mind of the subject and of other Christians as to the genuineness of the life itself, but if it bears the fruits of the Spirit there need be no doubt of its origin (Matt. 7: 16).

A Beard Valued at Five Thousand Dollars is the subject of a law-suit in Vermont. A man named Cox was committed to prison at Rutland for an offence under the liquor law, and according to the rules of the prison was shaved on his admission. He had worn his beard for fifteen years, and it was a very full one. Being suddenly deprived of it he caught a sore throat and his life was endangered, and he is now suing the superintendent of the prison for five thousand dollars damages. Owing to an alleged technical irregularity it is thought probable that Cox will recover that sum. The estimate thus placed on the value of a beard is a novel one, but there are many cases in which the loss of a limb are as highly appraised. It is remarkable that while men thus value their bodies they appear from their actions to attach a very trivial value to their souls, which in value outweigh all earthly things and which Christ died to save.

At a Meeting, held in Tremont Temple, Boston, on Sunday, February 13th, of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, the Rev. H. L. Morehouse, D.D., of New York, said that $300,000 would be needed this year in order to enable the society to prosecute its work in the forty-one States and Territories in which it has missionaries. This money would, if received, be distributed as follows: $150,000 for enlarged missionary operations; $50,000 in grants to 150 feeble societies in the West for the erection of meeting-houses; $45,000 for educational work among the freedmen and Indians; $50,000 for additional school buildings and improvements; $5000 for poor freedmen and Indians who are studying for the ministry. The society now supports 10 schools among the freedmen and one among the Indians, with 52 teachers and 1500 pupils. The total number of missionaries and teachers is 281.

SILVER SOCKETS;

OR,

REDEMPTION THE FOUNDATION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

TEXTS, EXODUS 30: 11-16 and 38: 26, 27.

The Half Shekel Redemption Money—An Emblem—Must be Brought Individually—No Exceptions—In Standard Money—Its Assured Efficacy—What Became of It—A Foundation for the Tabernacle—The Half Shekel a Type—I. Of God's Relation to Man—Necessary to Meeting—To Abiding—To Communion—To Accepted Service—II. Of Christ's Divine Person—As Redeemer—The View from the Cross-Foot—A Precious Foundation—The Mercantile Idea—III. Of the Church—The Foundation Safe—Invariable—This Sensible Century—Microscopic Faith—IV. Of the Gospel—Practical Divinity—Personal Hope.

WILL you kindly first open your Bibles at Exodus 30, for I must commence my discourse by expounding that passage. When the account was taken of the number of the children of Israel, the Lord commanded that every male over twenty years of age should pay half a shekel as redemption money, confessing that he deserved to die, owning that he was in debt to God, and bringing the sum demanded as a type of a great redemption which would by and by be paid for the souls of the sons of men. The truth was thus taught that God's people are a redeemed people; they are elsewhere called "the redeemed of the Lord." If men reject the redemption which He ordains, then are they not His people; for of all His chosen it may be said, "The Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he."

Whenever we attempt to number up the people of God it is absolutely needful that we count only those who at least profess to have brought the redemption price in their hands, and so to have taken part in the atonement of Christ Jesus. David, when he numbered the people, did not gather from them the redemption money, and hence a plague broke out among them. He had failed in obedience to the Lord's ordinance, and counted his subjects, not as redeemed people, but merely as so many heads. Let us always beware of estimating the number of Christians by the number of the population of the countries called Christian; for the only true Christians in the world are those who are redeemed from iniquity by the blood of the Lamb, and have personally accepted the ransom which the Lord has provided, personally brought their redemption money in their hands by taking Christ to be theirs and presenting Him by an act of faith to the great Father.

THE TYPE.

Observe that this redemption, without which no man might rightly be numbered among the children of Israel lest a plague should break out among them, must be personal and individual. There was not a lump sum to be paid for the nation, or twelve amounts for the twelve tribes; but each man must bring his own half shekel for himself. So there is no redemption that will be of any use to any of you unless it is personally accepted and brought before God by faith.

It was absolutely essential that each one should bring the half shekel of redemption money; for redemption is the only way in which you and I can be accepted of God. If birth could have done it, they had the privilege beyond all doubt; for they had Abraham to their father: they were lineally descended from the three great patriarchs, and they might have said, "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man." Nay, but salvation is not of blood, nor of birth, nor of the will of the flesh: salvation is by redemption, and even the true child of Abraham must bring his redemption money.

So must you, you child of godly parents, find salvation by the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, or be lost forever. Do not believe the falsehood of certain modern divines, that you children of godly parents do not need to be converted because you are born so nobly and brought up so tenderly by your parents. You are by nature heirs of wrath even as others. "Ye must be born again," and ye must be personally redeemed as well as heathen children, or else you will perish, though the blood of ministers, martyrs, and apostles should be running in your veins.

There were many, no doubt, in the camp of Israel who were men of station and substance; but they must bring the ransom money, or die amid their wealth. Others were wise-hearted and skilful in the arts, yet must they be redeemed or die. Rank could not save the princes, nor office spare the elders: every man of Israel must be redeemed, and no man could pass the muster-roll without his half shekel, whatever he might say, or do, or be.

Note well that every Israelitish man must be alike redeemed, and redeemed with the like, nay, with the same redemption. "The rich shall not give more and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel." Every man requires redemption, the one as well as the other. Kings on their thrones must be redeemed as well as prisoners in their dungeons; the philosopher must be redeemed as well as the peasant; the preacher as much as the profligate, and the moralist as certainly as the prostitute or the thief. The redemption money for every person must be the same, for all have sinned and are in like condemnation.

And it must be a redemption that meets the divine demand, because, you see, the Lord not only says that they must each bring half a shekel, no more, no less, but it must be "the shekel of the sanctuary"—not the shekel of commerce, which might be debased in quality or diminished by wear and tear, but the coin must be according to the standard shekel laid up in the holy place. To make sure of it Moses defines exactly how much a shekel was worth, and what its weight was—"A shekel is twenty gerahs." So you must bring to God the redemption which He has appointed—the blood and righteousness of Christ—nothing more, nothing less. The ransom of Christ is perfection, and from it there must be no varying. The price must satisfy the Divine demand, and that to the full.

Note that the price appointed did effectually redeem so far as the type could go. Some rejoice in a redemption which does not redeem; for the general redemption by which all men are supposed to be redeemed leaves multitudes in bondage, and they go to hell despite this kind of redemption. Therefore do we preach a particular and special redemption of God's own chosen and believing people: these are effectually and really ransomed, and the precious price once paid for them has set them free, neither shall any plague of vengeance smite them, for the redemption money has procured them eternal deliverance.

This type is full of instruction: the more it is studied the richer will it appear. Every man that is numbered among the children of Israel, and permitted to serve God by going out to war, or to take upon him the duties of citizenship, must, as he is numbered, be redeemed. So must every one of us, if we are truly God's people and God's servants, find our right to be so in the fact of our redemption by Christ Jesus our Lord. This is the joy and glory of each one of us: "Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."

Now we turn to the second of our texts, and there we learn a very remarkable fact. In the thirty-eighth chapter, verse twenty-five, we find that this mass of silver which was paid, whereby six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men were redeemed, each one paying his half shekel, came to

A GREAT WEIGHT OF SILVER.

It must have weighed something over four tons, and this was dedicated to the use of the tabernacle: the special application of the precious metal was to make sockets into which the boards which made the walls of the tabernacle should be placed. The mass of silver made up one hundred talents, and these upheld the fifty boards of the holy place.

They were in a wilderness, constantly moving, and continually shifting the tabernacle. Now, they might have dug out a foundation in the sand, or on coming to a piece of rock where they could not dig, they might have cut out foundations with great toil; but the Lord appointed that they should carry the foundation of the tabernacle with them. A talent of silver, weighing, I suppose, close upon one hundred pounds, was either formed into the shape of a wedge, so as to be driven into the soil, or else made into a solid square plate to lie upon it. In the wedge or plate were made mortises into which the tenons of the boards could be readily fitted. These plates of silver fitted the one into the other, tenon and mortise wise, and thus they made a compact parallelogram, strengthened at the corners with double plates, and formed one foundation, movable when taken to pieces, yet very secure as a whole. This foundation was made of the redemption money.

See the instructive emblem! The foundation of the worship of Israel was redemption. The dwelling-place of the Lord their God was founded on atonement. All the boards of incorruptible wood and precious gold stood upon the redemption price, and the curtains of fine linen, and the veil of matchless workmanship, and the whole structure rested on nothing else but the solid mass of silver which had been paid as the redemption money of the people. There was only one exception, and that was at the door where was the entrance to the holy place. There the pillars were set upon sockets of brass, perhaps because, as there was much going in and out of the priests, it was not meet that they should tread upon the token of redemption.

I do not for a moment bring before you the type of the text as a proof of doctrine, but I intend to use it simply as an illustration. It seems to me to be a very striking, full, and suggestive emblem, setting forth most clearly certain precious truths. I feel I am quite safe in using this illustration, because it is one among a group of acknowledged types, and could not have been given without a reason. I do not see why they could not have made the foundation sockets of iron, or why they could not have been content with tent-pins and cords as in other cases of tent building: I see no reason in the necessity of the case why they must be sockets of silver; there must have been another reason. Why was that particular silver prescribed? Why must the redemption money be used, and nothing else? Surely there is teaching here if we will but see it.

I. First, I want you to view this illustration as teaching us something about

GOD IN RELATION TO MAN.

The tent in the wilderness was typical of God's coming down to man to hold intercourse with him: the fiery cloudy pillar visible outside, and the bright light of the shekinah, visible to him who was called to enter once a year into the innermost sanctuary, shining over the mercy-seat—these were the tokens of the special presence of the Deity in the centre of the camp of Israel. The Lord seems to teach us, in relation to His dealing with men, that He will meet man in the way of grace only on the footing of redemption. He treats with man concerning love and grace within His holy shrine; but the basis of that shrine must be atonement.

Rest assured, dear friends, that there is no meeting with God on our part except through Jesus Christ our Redeemer. I am of Luther's mind when he said, "I will have nothing to do with an absolute God." God out of Christ is a terror to us. Even in Christ, remember, He is a consuming fire, for even "our God is a consuming fire;" but what He must be out of Christ may none of us ever know.

> "Till God in human flesh I see,
> My thoughts no comfort find;
> The holy, just, and sacred Three
> Are terrors to my mind.
>
> "But if Immanuel's face appear,
> My hope, my joy begins;
> His name forbids my slavish fear,
> His grace removes my sins."

There can be no coming of God to man on terms of peace except through the one great sacrifice: that must be the foundation of it all.

Nay, and not only God's coming to us, but God's abiding with us is upon the same foundation; for the tabernacle was, so to speak, the house of God—the place where God especially dwelt among His people, as He said; "I will dwell in them, and walk in them." But He never dwelt among them in anything but in a tent that was based upon the silver of the redemption money; and you, dear friend, if you have ever walked with God, can only maintain your fellowship by resting where you did at first, as a poor sinner redeemed by your Saviour.

They have asked me to rise sometimes to a higher platform, and come to God as a sanctified person. Yes, but a rock, though it may be lower than the little wooden stage which some erect upon it, is safer to stand upon; and I do believe that those who walk with God, according to their attainments and imaginary perfections, have climbed up to a rotten stage, which will fall under them ere long. I know no mode of standing before God to-day but that which I had at first. The Lord will only abide with us in that tabernacle whose every board is resting upon the silver foundation of redemption by His own dear Son.

There can, beloved, be no sort of communion between God and us except through the atonement. Do you want to pray? You cannot speak with God except through Jesus Christ. Do you wish to praise? You cannot bring the censer full of smoking incense except through Christ. It is only within those foundations of silver that you can speak to God, or hear Him speak comfortably with you. Would you hear a voice out of the excellent glory? Do you pray that the great Father would speak with you as with His dear children? Expect it through Jesus Christ, for "through Him we have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Even unto the Father, though we be children, we have no access except through Jesus. The tabernacle of communion even to him that lives nearest to God must be built upon the redemption price. Free grace and dying love must be the golden bells which ring upon our garments when we go into the holy place to speak with the Most High.

The tabernacle was the place of holy service, where the priests all day long offered sacrifices of one kind and another unto the Most High. And you and I serve God as priests, for He has made us a royal priesthood. But how and where can we exercise our priesthood? Everywhere as to the world; but before God, the foundation of the temple wherein we stand, and the ground of the acceptance of our priesthood, is redemption. The priests offered their sacrifice not in groves of man's planting, or on high hills, which were the natural strength of the land, but within the space marked out by the silver slabs of atonement money; and so must we worship and serve within redemption lines. If we come under the idea of legal merit and suppose that there is a natural goodness in our prayers, or in our praises, in our observance of Christian ceremonies, or in almsgiving, or in zealous testimony, we make a great mistake, and we shall never be so accepted.

II. I think we may, in the second place, apply this illustration to CHRIST IN HIS DIVINE PERSON.

The tabernacle was the type of our Lord Jesus Christ, for God dwells among men in Christ. "He tabernacled among us, and we beheld His glory," says the apostle. God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, that is to say, of this building; but the Temple of God is Christ Jesus, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

Our Lord is thus the Tabernacle which the Lord hath pitched and not man; and our first and fundamental idea of Him must be in His character as Redeemer. Our Lord does come to us in other characters, and in them all He is right glorious; but unless we receive Him as Redeemer we have missed the essence of His character, the foundation idea of Him. As the tent in the wilderness was founded upon the redemption money, so our idea and conception of Christ must be first of all that "He is the propitiation for our sins;" and I say this, though it may seem unnecessary to say it, because Satan is very crafty, and he leads many from plain truth by subtle means.

I remember a sister, who had been a member of a certain denomination, who was converted to God in this place, though she had been a professed Christian for years. She said to me, "I have hitherto believed only in Christ crucified: I worshipped Him as about to come in the second Avent to reign with His people, but I never had a sense of guilt, neither did I go to Him as putting away my sin; and hence I was not saved." When she began to see herself as a sinner she found her need of a Redeemer. Atonement must enter into our first and chief idea of the Lord Jesus. "We preach Christ crucified;" we preach Him glorified, and delight to do so; but still the main point upon which the eye of a sinner must rest, if he would have peace with God, must be Christ crucified for sin.

Some say they admire Christ as an example, and well they may; they can never find a better: but Jesus Christ will never be truly known and followed if He be viewed only as an example, for He is infinitely more than that. Neither can any man carry out the project of being like Christ unless he first knows Him as making atonement for sin, and as giving power to overcome sin through His blood. Some writers have looked upon Christ from one point of view and some from another, and there is no book that is more likely to sell than a life of Christ, but the most essential view of Him is to be had from the cross-foot.

Let this then be your

BASIS IDEA OF CHRIST:

"He has redeemed us from the curse of the law." Indeed, in reference to Christ, we must regard His redemption as the basis of His triumphs and His glory—"the sufferings of Christ and the glory that shall follow." We cannot understand any work that He has performed unless we understand His vicarious sacrifice. Christ is a lock without a key, He is a labyrinth without a clue, until you know Him as the Redeemer. You have spilt the letters on the floor, and you cannot make out the character of the Wonderful till first you have learned to spell the words—atonement by blood. This is the deepest joy of earth and the grandest song in heaven. "For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us unto God by Thy blood."

I beg you to observe, in connection with our text, that as the foundation of the tabernacle was very valuable, so our Lord Jesus as our Redeemer is exceedingly precious to us. His redemption is made with His precious blood. The redemption money was of pure and precious metal, a metal that does not lose weight in the fire. "The redemption of the soul is precious." What a redemption price hath Christ given for us; yea, what a redemption price He is! Well did Peter say, "Unto you that believe He is precious:" silver and gold are not to be mentioned in comparison with Him.

To me it is very instructive that the Israelites should have been redeemed with silver in the form of half-shekels, because there are many who say, "These old-fashioned divines believe in the mercantile idea of the atonement." Exactly so: we always did and always shall use a metaphor which is so expressive as to be abhorred by the enemies of the truth. The mercantile idea of the atonement is the Biblical idea of the atonement. These people were redeemed, not with lumps of uncoined silver, but with money used in commerce. Paul saith, "Ye are not your own: ye are bought"—listen—"with a price"—to give us the mercantile idea beyond all question. "Bought with a price" is doubly mercantile. What say you to this, ye wise refiners, who would refine the meaning out of the word of the Lord?

III. Time fails me, and yet I have now a third thought to lay before you very briefly. The tabernacle was a type of

as the place of divine indwelling. What and where is the church of God? The true church is founded upon redemption. Every board of shittim-wood was tenoned and mortised into the sockets of silver made of the redemption money, and every man that is in the church of God is united to Christ, rests upon Christ, and cannot be separated from Him. If that is not true of you, my dear hearer, you are not in the church of God. You may be in the church of England or of Rome, you may be in this church or some other; but unless you are joined to Christ, and He is the sole foundation upon which you rest, you are not in the church of God. You may be in no visible church whatever, and yet, if you are resting upon Christ, you are a part of the true house of God on earth.

Christ is a sure foundation for the church; for the tabernacle was never blown down. It had no foundation but the talents of silver; and yet it braved every desert storm. The wilderness is a place of rough winds—it is called a howling wilderness; but the sockets of silver held the boards upright, and the holy tent defied the rage of the elements. To be united to Christ by faith is to be built on a sure foundation. His church will never be overthrown, let the devil send what hurricanes he may.

And it was an invariable foundation, for the tabernacle always had the same basis wherever it was placed. One day it was pitched on the sand, another on a good piece of arable ground, a third time on a grass-plot, and to-morrow on a bare rock; but it always had the same foundation. The bearers of the holy furniture never left the silver sockets behind.

Now, the learned tell us that the nineteenth century requires "advanced thought." I wish the nineteenth century was over; I have heard it bragged about so much that I am sick of the nineteenth century. We are told that this is too sensible a century to need or accept the same gospel as the first, second, and third centuries. Yet these were the centuries of martyrs, the centuries of heroes, the centuries that conquered all the gods of Greece and Rome, the centuries of holy glory, and all this because they were the centuries of the gospel; but now we are so enlightened that our ears ache for something fresh, and under the influence of another gospel, which is not another, our beliefs are dwindling down from alps to anthills, and we ourselves from giants to pigmies. You will want a microscope soon to see Christian faith in the land, it is getting to be so small and scarce.

IV. Fourthly, and lastly, I think this tabernacle in the wilderness may be viewed as for the gospel is the revelation of God to man. The tent in the wilderness was the gospel according to Moses. Now, as that old gospel in the wilderness was, such must ours be, and I want to say just two or three things very plainly, and have done.

Redemption, atonement in the mercantile idea, must be the foundation of our theology—doctrinal, practical, and experimental. As to doctrine, they say a fish stinks first at the head, and men first go astray in their brains. When once there is anything wrong in your belief as to redemption you are wrong all through. I believe in the old rhyme:

"What think you of Christ? is the test
To try both your state and your scheme,
You cannot be right in the rest
Unless you think rightly of HIM."

If you get wrong on atonement you have turned a switch which will run the whole train of your thoughts upon the wrong line. You must know Christ as the Redeemer of His people, and their substitute, or your teaching will give an uncertain sound.

As redemption must be the foundation of doctrinal divinity, so it must of practical divinity. "Ye are not your own: ye are bought with a price," must be the source of holiness, and the reason for consecration. The man that does not feel himself to be specially "redeemed from among men" will see no reason for being different from other men.

Certainly redemption must be the foundation of experimental theology; for what is an experience worth that does not make us every day prize more and more the redeeming blood? Oh, my dear friends, I never knew, though I had some idea of it, what a fool I was till of late years. I tell you that those dreadful pains, which may even make you long for death, will empty you right out, and not only empty you, but make you judge yourself to be a hollow sham, and cause you to loathe yourself, and then it is that you cling to Christ.

Nothing but the atoning sacrifice will satisfy me. I have read plenty of books of modern theology, but none of them can heal so much as a pin's prick in the conscience. When a man gets sick in body and heavy in spirit he wants the old-fashioned puritanical theology, the gospel of Calvin, the gospel of Augustine, the gospel of Paul, the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Our theology as a matter of experience must be based upon redemption.

Ah, brethren, and not only our theology, but our personal hope. The only gospel that I have to preach is that which I rest upon myself: "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree;" "for the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed;" "He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Oh, dear hearers, build on that and you will never fail; but if you do not take Christ's redemption as the foundation of your hope—I do not care who you are—you may be very learned, but you know nothing at all. The Lord make you to know that you know nothing, and then you will know something: and when you have learned as much as that, may He teach you the redemption of His Son, and reveal Christ in you.

This, beloved, is henceforth the burden of our service, and the glory of our life. Those silver sockets were very precious, but very weighty. I dare say the men who had to move them sometimes thought so. Four tons and more of silver make up a great load. O blessed, blissful draught, to have to put the shoulder to the collar to draw the burden of the Lord—the glorious weight of redemption! You, young brethren that preach, mind you always carry your four tons of silver: preach a full and rich redemption all of you. You who go to the Sunday-school, do not let the children have a place to live in that has no foundation: the first wind will blow it over, and where will they be? Left naked under the ruins of that in which they had hoped. Lay Christ for a foundation. You cannot do better, for God Himself has said, "Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious." Lay this silver foundation wherever you are.

Ay, but though the ingots were heavy to carry, every Israelite felt proud to think that that tabernacle had a foundation of silver. You Amalekites out there cannot see the silver footing of it all; you Moabites cannot perceive it. All you can see is the badger-skins outside—the rough exterior of the tent. You say, "That tent is a poor place to be a temple: that gospel is a very simple affair." No doubt it is to you, but you never saw the golden boards, you never saw the glory of the inside of the place lit up by the seven branched candlesticks, and glorious with the presence of God. Brethren, redemption is our honor and delight.

"In the cross of Christ I glory
Towering o'er the wrecks of time:
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime."

This the first and this the last: the bleeding Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world, and yet living and reigning when earth's foundations shall dissolve. That blessed Lamb of God is in the midst of the throne, and His people shall all be with Him, forever triumphant. He is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, the foundation and the headstone. O Saviour of sinners, glory be to Thy name! Amen and amen.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

BETSY TROLLOPE'S JUG.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER II.

NOT that Betsy expected to be done good to, oh dear, no! She didn't want any enlightenment on the subject of strong drink. For a man or a woman who didn't know where to stop, a temperance meeting was the very thing. And she hoped from the very bottom of her soul that some of these folks who did take too much, would just see the error of their ways, and turn sober.

With these and other like thoughts Betsy listened and applauded time after time; the thumping of her umbrella after a good speech or a well-rendered song being especially noticeable.

Never was Betsy so benevolently inclined as at a temperance meeting. It was astonishing how many of her neighbors came in for her good wishes on these nights.

"I hope Tom Trotter won't forget that," she would say to herself at one remark.

After another—"That's a wipe for Mary Tubbs. I trust it'll do her good."

After a third—"Poor Susie Tripp, that's you to the life. How I pity you."

While after a fourth, she would indignantly remark, "Them poor children! Shame on you, Bill Stocker, shame on you Mary Stocker, drinking away the dear little things' wittels."

Do not think, my readers, from Betsy Trollope's behavior that she always came away as she went. There were times when Betsy was hit like the rest, and hit hard too; and when in spite of her benevolent wishes toward the naughty people around her, she could not help feeling that there might be a very little to blame in her own conduct. Not that she ever gave shape to her feelings, or put them into words. Nobody would have known from Betsy's speech or even her looks that she was wounded. "How then do you know?" I think I hear some curious reader ask. I will tell you how. Let me sketch a little word-picture by way of explanation.

Place—Betsy Trollope's kitchen.

Time—Five minutes to eleven in the morning.

Person—Betsy herself.

Attitude—Betsy thoughtfully gazing at the white jug with blue spots in a state of great perplexity. The clock strikes eleven; Betsy still gazing. Five minutes past eleven; a hesitating movement on the part of Betsy's hand, as she reaches to take down the white jug with blue spots. And lastly, Betsy's vanishing form, and—the jug under the shawl.

That is the picture; and if it does not speak volumes to my readers it is because they must be deficient somewhere.

See Betsy Trollope's form as she moves quickly along. Mark that. She used to walk slowly and deliberately. See Betsy's sharp look, first up and then down the street, as though if she espied anybody she knew she would have darted into the milk-shop opposite, instead of into the public. Mark that. Betsy used to stand on the public-house step. See the bunch under Betsy Trollope's shawl as she moves to and fro. There was a time when the jug was outside. Mark that too.

Well done, temperance meeting! If you have done nothing else, there is one thing you can be proud of: you have put the jug under Betsy Trollope's shawl.

THE JUG ON THE SHELF.

Why, what ever can be the matter with Betsy Trollope? She seems to have lost all spirit, and goes about the house in a sad, weary way, as though she cared to live no longer. Though never given to much talking she is more silent than ever. Everything seems an effort to her. And to see her throw herself upon a chair, and look straight upon the ground as though she were too miserable either to stand up or look up, was sad indeed.

Instead of getting better she seems to get worse. Her face becomes whiter and sadder every day. And now when she casts herself down upon a chair, after doing a little household work, she lifts her apron to her eyes and sobs as though her heart were breaking. Poor Betsy! Poor Betsy!

And more than this, she has lost much of her old relish for her beer; and, although fetching the same quantity at the same old time, was even known to have left some at the bottom of her jug. There must be something very wrong with Betsy for such an unheard-of thing as this to happen. There was something very wrong. And not only was, but had been for a long time past; and Betsy had just begun to find it out. And it was because she was finding it out more and more, that she got sadder and sadder every day. What was it? Why, simply her sins.

Time was when Betsy Trollope had an extra good opinion of herself, and as she said, "Could lift her head with the best of 'em."

"She didn't do anybody any harm. She could keep a quiet tongue in her head. She was ready to do a neighbor a good turn; and she went to the services at the Mission Room with scarcely a miss for years. And if that wasn't enough to give a soul a good chance when they came to die, she should like to know what would."

It was at one of the temperance meetings that she began to see her true self.

It may be as well to say here, that the temperance meetings at the Oatfield Mission Room were not like a great many, mere entertainments. Not a speaker but pressed home the Gospel; not a song but set forth some spiritual fact. And while bright and lively, there was never a meeting without a downright effort to lead poor sinners to Christ, and to make the weak ones strong in strength not their own.

Betsy Trollope was one of the fruits of it. One of the speakers drew a bow at a venture, and the Holy Spirit sent the arrow into Betsy's heart, where it rankled for days. And now she saw that not only had she been a sinner in the matter of strong drink, but in a thousand other ways besides. And the more she looked at herself, the more she grew out of love to herself, until she began to loathe herself as a wicked wretch who deserved to be lost forever.

I have often referred to Betsy's silence, and I now refer to it again. In one way she was still true to her nature, for she told none of her trouble, although she often longed to do so. But in another way she was not true to it; she was not silent to God.

One day, when she was sitting over her Bible, hardly able at times to see the words for the tears that would run down, she found her attention fastened to the words, "Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out."

"Is that true?" asked Betsy of herself. "It must be, because Jesus said it. "Then if it's true," she continued, "surely it's true for me."

For a few moments the very thought of its being true for her made her heart beat and bound furiously. Her mind was in such a whirl that she could scarcely think at all. Then she said,

"Lord Jesus, I'm a poor sinner, and you did die for me. You said you did, and now I'm come."

And Betsy did come. And the tears flowed faster and faster, and the heart beat quicker and quicker, and the head bent lower and lower. But the tears were tears of joy now; the heart was beating with delight now; and the head was bent, that in lowliest adoration her praises might stream forth. Betsy had come to Jesus, and He, true to His word, had not cast her out.

Leaning back in her chair, Betsy Trollope gave herself up to her happy thoughts. Saved; forgiven; God's child; heaven her home; no fear of the judgment; how beautiful! how beautiful!

While so thinking, the clock struck out the hour of eleven. Betsy started. She always heard the clock strike eleven; that was the time for her beer. Jumping to her feet she approached the dresser, and took down the white jug with blue spots. Pouring out some hot water she immersed the jug in it, turning it round and round with great energy. Betsy had never washed a piece of crockery with such pains and care before. After rubbing it briskly inside and out with a towel, she smelled it. Apparently the smell was not altogether satisfactory, for, beginning again, she gave it another washing and another rubbing. This time it was quite satisfactory.

What next?

Taking up the white jug with blue spots—she hung it up again. And from that time forward that jug had a wonderfully easy time of it. There it hung, day after day, as idle a piece of crockery as was ever made. Before, it was always being taken down and hung up again. It had no rest. If it had been at all sensitive Betsy would have worried its life out; but all this was past now, for Betsy had got something better than beer. She had learned to trust and love her Saviour, and had within her "a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

But if Betsy did not worry the jug, the jug worried Betsy. For don't think, dear reader, that Betsy Trollope hadn't to fight to keep her hand from taking down that white jug with blue spots. It sometimes itched to do it. But at such times, if you had been by, you would have seen Betsy's eyes close, and her hands go together, and her lips open with a "Jesus, help me." Indeed, had it not been for this course of action, Betsy Trollope would have been off to the public times out of number. Her "Jesus, help me," and her belief that He would help her, did it.

OTHER PEOPLE'S JUGS.

It will doubtless be remembered in Betsy Trollope's history that one of her most indignant protests against the interference of others was, "You mind your business, and I'll mind mine." Betsy preferred not being meddled with. She only wanted to be permitted to carry her jug to the public-house without any insulting remarks being made thereon.

When, however, she had been led to hang her jug upon the shelf, and had determined that strong drink should never again stain it, a revolution immediately took place in her views of the subject of interference and meddling. Betsy herself became one of the most interfering, meddling women that ever lived. What did she meddle with?

Other people's jugs.

Not offensively, however. Not with bitterness. Sharp words were no weapons of Betsy's. No, nor sharp looks either. Betsy Trollope's religion taught her that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God."

No, when Betsy interfered, it was with great kindness and gentleness; for she remembered the time, not so very long before, when either outside or inside her shawl she was wont to carry the white jug with blue spots.

Wonderfully keen was Betsy in finding out the offenders. Some women are so sharp in concealing their jug that it requires a very old hand to detect it.

"Bless your heart!" Betsy would explain to her husband, who doubted the existence of a jug at all under a particular woman's shawl, "d'ye think I don't know? What if it don't bulge out? What if the shawl does fall all natural like? Bless your heart, you can't take Betsy Trollope in like that."

But while Betsy pleaded with such women to give it all up, and to hang their jug on the shelf, she never failed to tell them too what a glorious Saviour she was trusting in.

"Taste of His love, my dear," she would say, "and you won't want to taste anything else. Only try Him now. Give Him your heart, and if you don't give up the jug, my name's not Betsy Trollope."

A Revival of Religion is in Progress, of which Surrey Chapel, London, is the centre. An English journal says twenty-three services are being held in the chapel every week, and some of the worst characters in South London have been saved. The special open-air meetings, held every evening, are made a great blessing to the neighborhood. A picture of this chapel and a portrait of its pastor appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 20th.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK,

February 18, 1881.

Cabinet-Making—Politics a Heart-Breaking Profession—The Political Light-houses—St. Valentine's Day—The Festival Cannot be Spared—The Joy of Youth—A Reserve of Vitality—The Uses of the Valentine—A Slander on the Festival—Marriage not a Lottery—The Control of Divine Goodness—Whence a Good Wife Comes—Spiritual Awakening—People Awaiting the Simple Gospel Call—The Old-Fashioned Revival—Work for Laymen—One Universal Panacea.

FOR three or four years I have on Friday nights been discussing the events of the week, learning lessons of more or less importance. I think the whole tendency of such discussion has been to make one more observant of the occurrences of every-day life, and to make us better acquainted with the meaning of God's Providences.

This has been a great week for

PRESIDENTIAL CABINET-MAKING.

People rushing to and fro. The whole nation wondering, hoping, guessing. Tens of thousands of people on the verge of political disappointment. For each position innumerable applicants. The most popular time in General Garfield's life will be the next two weeks. After the 4th of March look out for anathemas.

Blessed is the man who expects no political preferment. No life on earth is so full of perturbation as the politician's life. More changeable than the wind are the prospects of such an one. Better get an industrious occupation or trade, and stick to it. The most illustrious politicians that this country ever saw, all died of broken hearts—Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, William H. Seward.

The vast majority of successful men in politics are accidents. The great lighthouses of American statesmanship merely show others the way into the harbor, while they themselves get no nearer the wharf than Barnegat. Yet how many men doing well in other occupations are hankering after politics as a trade. They gradually absent themselves from their law office of successful practice, and from the storehouse of profitable traffic, and give themselves up to wirepulling and caucuses and lounging around political headquarters, pick up a few crumbs of political reward, and drop into dissipation, and a life that ought to have been grandly rounded ends a dead failure. While we must have the ship of state manned with a skilful crew, and some have had enough integrity and strength to bear the stress, my advice to you is to keep out of politics.

This week has had what is known all the world over as established in honor of a bishop who lost his head, a festal observed on both sides the sea, admired and denounced, arousal of sport and implement of disgust. It was celebrated long before we were born, and will be observed long after we are dead. Though different from all other holidays, it has its practical uses. Fourth of July for patriotism, Thanksgiving Day for review of national mercies, Christmas celebration of the great advent, but 14th of February administrative of tenderest sentiment and crackling fun.

I hail it not so much because I care particularly about the bishop in whose honor it started, but because it stirs our youthful populations with such wild glee. All the door-bells ringing. Mysterious postmen vanishing down the steps before you have time to recognize them. About six million valentines fluttering in the excited grasp, and thirty million people wondering where they came from.

Do not allow your interest in this annual holiday to lessen. We cannot spare it from the calendar. You may have cultured your taste until nothing short of a Bierstadt, or a Kensett, or a Raphael can please you, but you are to remember that one hundred thousand dollars' worth of such paintings would not please the children so well as two or three grotesque pictures. Mirth above one's capacity is no mirth at all. There can come no harm to the childish mind from the caricatures that enter your house in such celebration. The doggerel which they read with such boisterous gyrations will not hinder in their future poetic taste. Let the missives fly, and let all our cities resound with the laughter.

The more joy our children have before ten or fifteen years of age, the better will they be able to stand the pressure of severe life when it comes upon them. They who begin the hard work of the world without having back of them seventeen years of merriment, begin under a disadvantage from which they will never recover. Alas! for those whose life is a sweltering August day, preceded by no May time of blossoms.

St. Valentine's Day has its uses in expression of higher and very tender sentiment. There comes a time between eighteen and twenty-five years of age when one does not know exactly what is the matter. You get dreaming. You sit looking at the figure in the carpet for half an hour, as though you had never seen it before. You dare not write a letter expressive of your feelings, for you do not want to commit yourself, and at just that time are

THE USES OF THE VALENTINE.

The selection is made reckless of expense, and with glistening eye and throbbing heart, which the merchant understands, and of which he says nothing. In that purchase good poetry takes the place of doggerel, and the design is suggestive of hearts in various stages of surrender. At such crises of feeling the valentine is a necessity. The old bishop, who in founding this day lost his head, becomes a great service to those who have lost their heart.

But some say that Valentine's Day, instead of being commemorative of a bishop, is only the carrying out of a custom prevalent in ancient Rome at the festival of the Lupurcalia, where the names of young women were placed in a box, from which they were taken by young men as chance directed. That I take to be a slander on St. Valentine's day by some one who wanted to intimate that marriage was a lottery, and that any one who proposes it only puts his hand in a box, from which he may chance to draw a fortune or a misery. There is no lottery about it. In the vast majority of cases, those are affianced who ought to be affianced. You denounce some marital engagement as unfit because the parties are unlike. That is the very way it ought to be. If one is sanguine, the other needs to be lymphatic; if one is frivolous, the other needs to be gay; the one poetry, the other prose.

Most wonderfully does God set the solitary in families. I see no more the goodness of God in anything than in the fact that the vast majority of domestic arrangements are the very best arrangements that could have been made. It is not putting your hand in a box where there are a thousand ballots, but in most cases a matter of divine selection. It appears to just happen so that they met on some excursion or in some parlor, or in some street, or in some church; but there was nothing accidental in that meeting. By eternal goodness the whole affair was arranged. If God controls the smaller affairs of our life, will He leave hap-hazard the most important affair?

If you think it is all a lottery, the selection of one's chief companion, you pay but a poor compliment to your own home. The Bible says a good wife is from the Lord. If you got yours through a lottery, I am very sorry. I violently reject the idea suggested by some that St. Valentine's Day was the prolongation of the Roman festival where the names of young women were placed in a box to be drawn forth by young men in chance. Rather I refer this celebration to the old bishop distinguished for love and charity.

So let St. Valentine's Day be observed from century to century, and a hundred years after we are dead, and the world is brighter than it is now, children's voices will greet its coming and young men and maidens will sit looking from the adorned and reticular missive to the meaning beyond. Let your holidays be multiplied rather than decreased until the jubilee of nations shall whelm all lesser joys in the oceanic gladness of a world redeemed.

The religious event of the week is the

in many churches. All over the land there seems a readiness for Gospel influence. In those churches where especial services have been held there have been marked awakenings. Last Sabbath night about a hundred rose for prayers in this building, and in the especial meetings Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, souls were saved.

The fact is, there are in this country hundreds of thousands of people ready to accept the simple Gospel call. They will not hear the voice of dogma or didactics, but warm-hearted invitation will do the work. The Church of God needs to get down off its stilts. Among the mightiest obstacles of the Gospel are the metaphysics and the fastidiousness, and the namby-pambyism of the Church of God. Let our Christian laymen go forth in earnest commendation of our glorious religion.

The only way this work will ever be done, will be by spontaneous and widespreading old-fashioned revival of religion—meetings in which the rhetoric and the conventionalities of the church shall not be allowed to freeze out the spirit—meetings in which the prayers shall be all aflame, and the exhortations as earnest as those of men and women escaping from a foundering steamer into a manned lifeboat.

I have

for all political, social, domestic, and individual needs, revivals that shall sweep all before them, the surges overriding house-top, and City Hall, and Capitolean buildings, and the nation—revivals that will set the continent to praying—revivals like that of 1857 multiplied by twenty, opening theatres for religious worship, turning storehouses into anxious seats, making the telegraphy of business information halt for messages of salvation from city to city, the Lord Almighty doing by one sweep of His hand more work than all the churches as yet have done in a century.

From what we have seen during the past few days, we know God is willing to open the flood gates of saving mercy. Let all obstacles be heaved out of the way. Come, O north wind! and blow thou south upon this garden of God. While in some places ministers of religion are assembling to discuss the low state of religion in the country, I am glad that there are many Christian pastors who, looking over the flock that God has given them, and the field the Lord has called them to culture have cause for great rejoicings because of the evidence that God presents by His grace to save. Let us all arouse a work for each one to do. No one able to do that work for you or for me and a very short time in which to accomplish it. Eternity behind us, Eternity before us, and God all around us.

A Missionary's Camp Life in Buenos Ayres is thus described by Mr. Harry Smith, from Mr. Guinness' Missionary Institute in England:

"The most joyful portion of my life in the missionary service has now commenced. At Mate Grande I met, and in the surrounding neighborhood visited, a great many Englishmen, the majority of them being educated men, university men, sons of clergymen, etc. What a contrast camp life is to the life they have been accustomed to lead at home! To maintain a Christian life out here is no easy task. I am appalled at the fearful amount of open sin all over the camp. Cheating, lying, and robbing are quite the order of the day; nor are cases of stabbing, or even murder, few or far between. Brother Fletcher and myself retire about dusk every night to the monte (wood) for prayer. The houses are built of mud, with mud floors. The rule is two meals a day in the camp: breakfast about eleven or twelve, dinner at six. I breakfasted with a native the other day, in a mud hut, about fourteen feet square, with a hole for a doorway each side, a horse-skin serving as a door, being suspended whichever side the wind blew; an iron pot (such as gypsies use at home) in the centre, cooking the breakfast (the room meantime, of course, full of smoke, which makes the eyes smart so much that I have great difficulty in bearing it). Furniture there is none; we seat ourselves round the iron pot on boxes or anything; my seat was an inverted sheep-trough."

Mr. Stanley's Disappearance Explained.

LORD MORETON was a tall man, and I thought him very handsome indeed, in spite of the slight cast in his eye of which Evelyn had complained so much. But it was so very slight that it was not at all unpleasant, and I wondered that she had considered it such a drawback to his face.

He came up to us as soon as we entered the room, and seemed very pleased to meet Sir William and Evelyn. But we had little time for conversation till the work of the evening was over.

After tea came Lord Moreton's address. It was very simple and very much to the point, and I could see that the poor people felt it. He spoke to them of the love of Jesus, and how He was longing and yearning to save them; how He was following them like the shepherd after the lost sheep, seeking them by night, seeking them by day, seeking them in sickness, seeking them in health, seeking them in their sin and trouble and misery, ever seeking them, ever longing for them to turn round and let Him find them.

And then Lord Moreton begged them to turn round to Him that very night, to leave drink behind, to leave sin behind, to leave shame behind, to turn their back on Satan and all his ways, to turn round to the Good Shepherd, and to say to Him, "Lord Jesus, save me."

There were very few dry eyes when Lord Moreton had finished. He did not show his nervousness at all when he was speaking. I fancied that his hand trembled a little but his voice was clear and steady, and he spoke so naturally and unaffectedly that you forgot the man altogether, and became engrossed only with what he was saying. There was something in his quiet, persuasive, pleading manner which it would require a hard heart to withstand. I could see that Evelyn felt it very much, though she made no remark upon it afterward.

When the poor people had left, and only the helpers remained in the room, we had more time for conversation. Then, for the first time, I saw that Lord Moreton was indeed a very nervous man. He was so shy and reserved when he first came up to us, that I could hardly believe he was the man who had spoken so easily and naturally to the poor people.

But Sir William soon set him at ease, by telling him of our journey to the East and of some of our adventures while we were there.

"You met a friend of mine in Jerusalem, I think," Lord Moreton said.

"Oh, yes, you mean Mr. Stanley," said Sir William, as if he had never doubted, for a moment, Mr. Stanley's friendship with Lord Moreton. "He proved a capital guide to us; we were sorry he had to leave so abruptly."

"Yes, poor fellow," said Lord Moreton; "it was a very great shock to him."

"What was a great shock to him?" asked Sir William; "we never heard why he left Jerusalem so suddenly."

"Oh, did you not?" said Lord Moreton; "he told me that he had written to you, and I think he was a little disappointed that he did not get an answer. It was on account of his father's illness. I sent him a telegram to tell him how dangerously ill his father was, and he left Jerusalem immediately he received it. But he was too late; his father had been dead some days when he arrived. Poor fellow, it was a terrible time for him!"

"I am really very sorry," said Sir William; "I had no idea that he was in such trouble; it seemed strange to us, as you may imagine, his disappearing so suddenly, and without any reason, so far as we knew."

"Yes, of course it would," said Lord Moreton; "he will be very vexed when he finds his letter did not reach you. He is such a nice fellow; he is just like a brother to me. The Stanleys' place is close to ours, so we see a great deal of each other, and of course we shall be more than ever together now that Howard has come into the property; for he will be still more at home now."

"I am very sorry to hear of his father's death," said Sir William again.

"Yes," answered Lord Moreton; "and you would have felt it very much if you had seen his grief when he arrived, and I had to tell him that his father was gone; it was very sad. His mother died a few years ago, and there were no other children, so he and his father have been all in all to each other. Howard was very unwilling to go abroad this year, for he fancied his father was failing a little; but the old man insisted on his going, for Howard had a severe illness just this time last year, and the doctors said he would not be strong again until he had had a complete change. It was very sad, was it not, that it ended as it did?"

"Poor fellow!" said Sir William; "can you give me his address? I should like to write to him, and express my sympathy, and explain why I did not write before."

"Yes, I will give it to you at once," said Lord Moreton, as he took a leaf from his pocket-book, wrote the address, and handed it to Sir William. "Stanley is very busy now, of course, settling his affairs, but in a month's time I have persuaded him to go with me for a run in the Highlands; I am sure it will do him good."

"In the Highlands!" said Sir William; "then you will, of course, come to us on the way, both of you. And remember, we shall not be content with a three days' visit; you must spare us a week or ten days at least."

"Oh, thank you," said Lord Moreton; "that will be very nice!"

"I will write to Mr. Stanley about it to-morrow; just name your own day when your plans are formed; we are expecting no visitors at present."

So it was all settled, and Lord Moreton said good-by to us, for he was to leave town by the early train the next day.

"Well, papa," said Evelyn, as we drove home, "Mr. Stanley was not an escaped convict, after all."

"I never said he was, my dear; I always thought him a remarkably nice fellow; only, of course, his sudden disappearance was a little puzzling and somewhat mysterious. If we had only got his letter it would have been all right!"

Then Sir William changed the subject, by complimenting Miss Irvine on the success of her entertainment, and speaking very highly of Lord Moreton's forcible address.

We went back to Alliston the following week, and, to my great joy, Sir William proposed that I should go at once to the old Manor House at Branston to see Maggie. The aunts were delighted to have me, so I went there the day after I had received their letter. I found everything in the house and around it just the same as when I had left it. The same neatness and order and punctuality and regularity reigned everywhere, and the same kindly feeling pervaded the whole place.

My dear little Maggie was on the platform to welcome me, and John and the comfortable horses were waiting for me at the entrance to the station. The sisters received me with open arms, and with tears in their eyes, and Miss Jane returned thanks at family prayers that night, "for the marvellous escapes, and wonderful preservation in the midst of many and great dangers, which had been vouchsafed to one of their number, during her residence in the land of the infidel and the heretic."

I had much to tell and they had much to hear, and the fortnight passed away all too quickly.

During the second week Maggie and I went for a two days' visit to the Parsonage at Acton. Miss Richards was very anxious to see us again, and wrote me a very touching letter, saying, that if we would not mind spending a quiet day or two with her she would feel it a real kindness, and it would be a great cheer and comfort to her. She did not think her time on earth would be very long, she said; the doctor had told her that she might linger for a few months, but that she was suffering from a complaint which must end in death. "So he says, my dear," wrote the good old lady; "but I would rather say, it must end in life—life in His presence, where alone is fulness of joy."

We found Miss Richard very much altered, weak and ill, and fearfully thin; yet still able to go about a little, to look after her housekeeping, and to sit in her easy chair in the garden, with her work or her book.

We had many quiet, happy talks together, and I felt it a great privilege to be speaking to one who was, as it were, close on the threshold of heaven itself.

Mr. Ellis was very much aged, and looked careworn and depressed. He was exceedingly kind to us; but he seemed as if a heavy weight were resting on him, which he could not shake off.

While we were at Acton, Maggie and I went and peeped through the gate of our old home. It looked just the same; it was not altered at all. The rabbits were nibbling the grass on the lawn, the stream was trickling peacefully along, and every bush, and tree, and flower-bed looked just as they had done on that memorable day when I had sat by my bedroom window with Claude's unanswered letter in my hand.

But the home was no longer ours, and even as we looked at it little children's faces appeared at the window of my old room and reminded me of this.

I thought of Miss Irvine's words as I turned away: "What a comfort that there is one home where there will be no parting, and no going away."

That evening, after Maggie was in bed, Miss Richards called me into her room and spoke to me about Claude.

"May, dear, you remember our last talk together before you went away," she said; "you were indeed right, and I was wrong. I would not have you Claude's wife now for the world. You had, indeed, a very happy escape."

"I think I told you we met them in Jerusalem, Miss Richards."

"Yes, and they are still abroad, spending what money they have. It will all be gone soon, and then they will be obliged to return home, and the crash will come."

"What do you mean, Miss Richards?" I asked; "I thought they were very rich."

"So we thought, my dear, and so they thought; but Alice's money has proved a mere bubble. Her father has speculated a great deal, and the whole of her money has gone now, every penny of it. They did not know that when you saw them in Jerusalem; it has come out since. And Claude, you know, has not very much money of his own. It would have been a nice little sum yearly if he had been careful.

"But, oh, the bills, my dear! Scores of them are waiting for him; they send a great many here to be forwarded. I believe that is why he does not come home. But he must come, some time or other; and then his father thinks that more than the whole of Claude's capital will be swallowed up in order to pay his debts. And what will they do then, my dear?"

"I am very sorry to hear it," I said.

"Yes," said Miss Richards, "and this trouble is just crushing the life out of his poor father. I try to comfort him; and I tell him that I hope this trial will be the means, by God's blessing, of bringing Claude to the Saviour. But, though I tell Mr. Ellis so, my dear, I feel very doubtful about it, for Claude has so hardened his heart against all religion, and has so shut his eyes and refused to believe the truth, that I am very much afraid there is not much hope for him. I don't tell his father so; but I have great fears myself that even this trouble will not bring him any nearer to God."

"I was afraid his views were the same," I said, "when I met them in Jerusalem."

"Oh, yes, they are even more pronounced," said Miss Richards; "and he has made his poor little wife almost as great a doubter as himself. She is a nice little thing, very affectionate and good to me; and I feel for her terribly in this trouble. I am afraid it will make great unhappiness between them. I quite dread their coming home."

That was the last time I ever saw Miss Richards. She took a loving farewell of me the next morning, and we both of us knew that, when next we met, it would be in the land where partings are unknown.

I heard of her death, or rather of her entrance into life, only a few weeks after our visit to Acton.

Maggie's aunts were very anxious that I should spend another week with them, before going back to Alliston Hall; but Evelyn had written to me, saying that Lord Moreton and Mr. Stanley were expected on the very day that I had already fixed to return, and she hoped that I should not fail to appear, as she wanted us all to have a good talk together about Jerusalem and our adventures there. I told Maggie and the aunts that I did not like to disappoint Evelyn, but felt that as she wished it I ought to go back at once. I did not say anything of my own feelings in the matter.

I arrived at Alliston Hall just as Evelyn was dressing for dinner. She welcomed me with great joy, and told me that the visitors had arrived, and that I must get ready with all haste, as the gong would soon sound for dinner.

When I was dressed I went into the library, thinking that I was late, and that every one would have assembled, but I found no one there except Mr. Stanley.

I do not know how it was, but I suddenly turned very shy and nervous, and, after shaking hands with him, I was on the point of making an excuse about wanting to get my work, and by this means leaving the room, when he began to ask me many questions about Jerusalem, and I was obliged to stay.

"So I was put down as a suspicious character," he said, smiling, "when I disappeared so suddenly."

"Sir William thought it very strange," I said; "and he began to doubt a little if you were what you said you were." Mr. Stanley laughed.

"And you?" he asked.

"Oh, I knew it would be all right."

"You did not doubt me then?"

"No, not at all," I said.

"Thank you."

There was a pause after this, and then he said gravely, "The chisel has been very busy since I saw you last."

(To be continued.)

WITNESS OF JESUS TO JOHN.

S. S. Lesson for March 6th, Luke 7:19-30. Golden Text, John 5:35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR blessed Lord continued His mission of teaching and healing. In Capernaum He had healed the servant of the centurion without even needing to be present with him; the next day, in the city of Nain, when His disciples were with Him, "and much people," He had raised the widow's son from the dead. "And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and that God hath visited his people." Everywhere the report spread, everywhere men spoke of these wonderful works and of Him who had wrought them, and lips which had long been silent in praise were forced to glorify God; the fallen glory of Israel seemed to be returning, and a great and wide impression was made upon the people.

There was one, however, to whom the cause of God was dearer than life, and yet he was held back from rejoicing with the multitude. John the Baptist had testified of Jesus, "There standeth One among you, whom ye know not. He it is who, coming after me, is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." (John 1:26, 27, 29, 30). How comes it, then, that when his disciples came to him in the prison where Herod had thrown him, to tell him of the works of Jesus, that he sent two of them to Him, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? How could it be that the faith which had been so strong was now wavering?

Probably John began to reason, "If this were the Christ, He could not be in ignorance of my faithful testimony, He is all powerful, He can do works which I have never done, and His first thought would be to liberate and unite with Him in His work the one who has His cause so much at heart; surely this is a great Prophet, but not the Christ." O how mistaken we may be, when we judge of our Lord by our own experience, when we make our experience the criterion of His faithfulness! It is only as we renounce ourselves and put ourselves out of the question that we can understand the heart of our God. He cares for us even to numbering the very hairs of our heads, but the moment we recommence to care for ourselves, our consciousness of His care, and our experience of it fails, we are like a railway engine run off the rails, and until we are replaced in our true position of nothingness in ourselves, and of being all in Christ, nothing can go well with us.

"When the men were come unto him [Jesus], they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? And in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits; and unto many that were blind he gave sight. Then Jesus, answering, said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; now that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached. And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me." It had been written, "Be strong, fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart; and the tongue of the dumb sing" (Isa. 35:4-6). It was for John to judge whether the credentials of Christ in the works which he did were sufficient to identify Him as the expected Messiah. But how explain the burden which lay upon John's heart that the Lord Jesus passed him over, and seemed, in the exercise of His power, to ignore his case? Jesus gave but one hint, "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me." As though to say, "Trust on John, even though it is in the dark, only give place to no doubt whatever thou doest, be not offended in me."

John's mission was completed. He came to prepare the way of the Lord, not to share His ministry. He said himself, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30). And now the bitter school of suffering through which he was passing was fitting God's precious instrument for service in another world. It is a blessed thing to serve God, to go hither or thither, "bound in the Spirit" (Acts 20:22), to do a work to which God calls us, but when He no longer has need of us in that special line of service, it is good to know when to draw back, and to be the nothing before men that we know we are before God. He will still employ us, perhaps in a less visible way, perhaps in the ministry of prayer. Any way, let us be at His disposal to do or not to do, and never be offended in Him, because His way for us does not tally with our preconceived plans or ideas.

No sooner were the messengers of John departed, and out of hearing than Jesus "began to speak unto the multitude concerning John. What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind?" There was no feebleness or vacillation about the strong man who stood in the desert with the axe of the Spirit of God, in the midst of a bowed multitude who were constrained by an irresistible impulse to confess their sins; who hewed down with relentless hand the pretensions of all whose hearts were not right with God, and who did not bring forth fruits of repentance; he was no reed shaken with every blast. "But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately are in kings' houses." One might have gone to many kings' courts in vain to find the Baptist, he was no courtier. "The same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey" (Matt. 3:4).

"But what went ye out for to see" continued our blessed Lord, a "prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. This is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face which shall prepare thy way before thee" (Mal. 3:1). "For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women, there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the Kingdom of God is greater than he." Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Elijah, Daniel, none of these were greater than John the Baptist; the Lord's forerunner takes a first place among the saints of the old covenant.

What, then, does it mean, that he which is least in the Kingdom of God is greater than he? It cannot mean that salvation is more safe, or the forgiveness of sins more sure under the New Testament than under the Old. "The just shall live by his faith," is the teaching of both covenants (Hab. 2:4; Heb. 10:38). The forgiveness of sins, because they are not imputed unto us, is as clear in Ps. 32:2, "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord will not impute sin," as in 2 Cor. 5:19, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." Only in the latter passage the light is clearer on the work of Christ, but the superiority of the Christian dispensation does not lie in the forgiveness of sins. In the New Testament we read of "being made partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1:4), of being begotten and born of God (1 John, 3:9; 5:1, 18), of living not unto ourselves, but unto Him which died for us and rose again (2 Cor. 5:15), of fellowship with His sufferings, of being conformed to the image of Christ, of being crucified with Christ of living, "yet not I but Christ liveth in me." He who knows these things by blessed experience lives in the light and power of the Kingdom of God, and he is greater than John the Baptist.

Alas, instead of humbling themselves before God that they might learn the lesson which the Lord would teach them, we see that although "all the people that heard him and the publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John," yet the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves (or in themselves). not being baptized of him." Not having submitted themselves unto the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, they would not receive any testimony of God which condemned them. In fact, they would justify themselves at the cost of God's truth, and would reject every doctrine and every witness for God, with which or with whom they had not had personally to do. Oh, how many do thus in our days, measuring every truth and every preacher by their own limited experience! How unwilling is human pride to humble itself and to acknowledge its ignorance, how few there are who love God's truth for its own sake, or rather for His glory's sake, and make themselves an offering and a sacrifice for it!

"The Lord said, Whereunto, then, shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like? They are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not wept. For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil. The Son of man is come, eating and drinking, and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners." The resources of God Himself were exhausted in the appeals which He had made to such as would not come unto Him that they might have life. Every message was met with an excuse, every messenger received with criticism, there was no bowing of the heart before God, no recognition of the relative positions, which He and His creatures should bear to one another. The holy asceticism of John was attributed to the devil, and when the Lord Jesus was not equally ascetic they blamed Him for not being so, and stigmatized the love which caused Him to enter into the usual habits of men around Him, as being gluttony and drunkenness. And meanwhile their own doom was creeping slowly forward; by every word of reproach against Christ and against His forerunner, they were making more inevitable that casting out into outer darkness which is the portion of those who will not have Christ to reign over them. "But Wisdom is justified of all her children." Wisdom in the Book of Proverbs is but a name for Christ, the children of Wisdom are His disciples. And "if any man be in Christ he is a new creature, old things have passed away, behold, all things are become new."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Profound Sensation in Ireland has been produced by a manifesto issued by Mr. Shaw, who was formerly the leader of the Home Rule party, and is Member of Parliament for Cork County. Mr. Shaw is also the head of a banking firm largely trusted by Irish farmers, and is known to be a far-sighted and sagacious patriot. The manifesto he has issued, calls the attention of Irishmen to the situation produced by Mr. Parnell's management, and the disastrous results which it has effected. He points out that the agitation Mr. Parnell and his lieutenants stirred up, alarmed the English people, and caused the introduction of a Coercion bill more stringent than any legislative act ever passed; that at a time when, owing to the recent distress in Ireland, an opportunity occurred for obtaining valuable concessions from England in a really good Land bill, Mr. Parnell's conduct, in preventing the payment of rents and intimidating the people, irritated the English upper classes, whose consent and aid were necessary to the enactment of such a measure; and finally when a government was in office composed of statesmen more anxious to do justice to Ireland than any politicians ever in power, Mr. Parnell has done his best to embarrass them and discredit their efforts on behalf of Ireland.

While thus mercilessly exposing the mischievous effects of Mr. Parnell's tactics, Mr. Shaw also gives the Irish people sound practical advice. He earnestly desires the same results Mr. Parnell professes to be seeking, and he indicates the course he believes best adapted to secure them. He advises that all illegal acts should be discontinued out of Parliament, and that in Parliament obstruction should cease, and every effort be concentrated on making the Land bill to be introduced, a really beneficial measure. That secured, he would commence an agitation for further reforms, and proceed by gradual steps toward gaining for Ireland complete legislative independence. Whatever may be thought of the object aimed at, and whether it would, if attained, really be beneficial to Ireland, it is clear that Mr. Shaw's plan has in it more wisdom and less hazard than the course pursued by Mr. Parnell.

The Speech of the Emperor of Germany to the new Reichstag dealt principally with the Socialist agitation. The Emperor said the remedy for Socialist excesses must be sought not only in repression, but equally in a positive attempt to promote the welfare of the laboring classes. His Majesty expressed the hope that a measure devised in the interest of mechanics, and called the Workmen's Accident Insurance Bill would be welcomed by the Reichstag as a complement to the legislation against social democracy. In the same category is a bill to regulate the constitution of trade guilds by affording means for organizing the isolated powers of persons engaged in the same trade, thus raising their economic capacity and social and moral efficiency. The attention of the governments of the whole world is directed to movements which like Socialism in Germany, Communism in France, and Fenianism in Ireland, threaten the overturn of society, and are a conspicuous sign of the nearing approach of the end of the present age.

The Pope and James Stephens the Fenian Head Centre, two authorities popularly supposed to exercise a potent influence in Ireland, have both expressed unmitigated disapproval of Mr. Parnell's procedure. Mr. Parnell has offended the Pope by seeking the alliance of M. Victor Hugo, M. Rochefort, and the French Communists and anti-clericals. It appears that the Roman Catholic bishops have represented to the Pope that the Land Leaguers are the only true patriots, and are therefore entitled to his sympathy. When, however, the Pope heard of Mr. Parnell's overtures to the Communists of Paris, he obtained a clearer idea of the real principles of the Land League, and expressed "his indignation."

The Fenian chief disapproves of the conduct of the Land League leader on other grounds. He considers "the obstructionist manœuvres in the House of Commons as unworthy of an Irish party, undignified, impolitic, and calculated to alienate rather than to attract the sympathies of the people. He thought that, having consented to become members of the House, it was their duty to conform to the ordinary rules and not to get up an obstructive opposition which could do no practical good to the Irish cause, nor prevent the ultimate action of the government."

Stephens is right in his criticism, but when he proceeded to develop his scheme for the advancement of Ireland he displayed his folly. He expressed his conviction that no benefit will ever be gained from the British Parliament, and that the only remedy for Irish woe was in "a stand-up fight."

Ireland is suffering now, and has suffered for many years, under heavy grievances and national misfortunes, but not the least among these evils are the men who are perpetually agitating for the adoption of impracticable schemes, and rendering her people impatient and discontented.

The British Forces in South Africa have been reinforced by the regiments sent out under Sir Evelyn Wood; but it has been decided not to advance farther into the country until the arrival of other troops expected daily from Cape Town. Hopes are entertained that the war may soon be ended, as the British government is disposed to grant the principal demands put forward by the Boers. Mr. Bright and the Radical members of the cabinet are known to chafe under the charges of inconsistency brought against them by their supporters; both ministers before they took office having denounced the annexation of the Transvaal. The more aristocratic members of the cabinet, on the other hand, insist that the credit of British arms must be retrieved before negotiations for peace can be entertained. The propositions put forward as a basis for negotiation, are that the part of the Transvaal to which the Boers have a fair claim be declared independent, and the remaining and larger part continue to be governed by British administration, and that a British resident be appointed at the capital of the Boers.

Queen Victoria is understood to be strongly opposed to the peace negotiations, and is said to have telegraphed to Sir George Colley, urging him to prompt action. A sudden visit of Mr. Gladstone to her Majesty is believed to have been made with the object of remonstrating with her on the subject.

Rumors of War come From Afghanistan, where the new Ameer is threatened by an armed rebellion under the ex-Ameer Ayoob Khan. It appears that the intention the British Government expressed to abandon Candahar, combined with the successes achieved by the Russian army at Geok Tepe and the advance of the Russian general toward Merv, have been interpreted by the Afghans as an evidence that the power of Great Britain is waning. Ayoob Khan won some popularity by defeating the British troops under General Burrows last year, and his followers have encouraged him to take up arms. He has seized Maimund, and in his alarm the ameer has sent an urgent dispatch to the British government, whose assistance it is supposed he solicits. That disastrous results would probably follow the evacuation of Candahar by the British was foreseen by Lord Napier, who warned the Government that by the act England "would throw the district open to competition, and in case of the return of Ayoob Khan, the nucleus of an opposition to Abdurrahman would be formed and the settlement of the Cabul Government very possibly overturned." The intelligence prompts the opinion that if England proposes to interfere at all in Afghan affairs, she will be obliged to annex the country and hold it by the sword.

A Deadly Foe.—The Rev. W. Taylor was sitting at the table of an Irish merchant in Sligo some time ago. He had eight beautiful children. He had his wine and brandy on the table, and of course asked his guest to drink, and he had to assign his reasons for declining. In the course of his reply, he made the remark: "I would like to see the man who could truthfully say, 'No relative or friend of mine ever fell through intemperance.'" Mr. Taylor saw that this had startled the gentleman, for he remained silent for some seconds.

"Well," said he at length, "I am not that man. My first Sunday-school superintendent was a man of genial spirit and noble mien. He went into the wine-trade, and died a drunkard before he was forty. My first class-leader, I believe, was a good, intelligent, and useful man; but he, too, yielded to the habit of intemperance, and died a drunkard. My own father also suffered through intemperance."

An Outbreak of Turkish Fanaticism is Reported from Beyrout in Syria under date of February 16th, as follows: A Turk murdered a Christian on Sunday last, and a number of Christians thereupon left town and went to their villages, where they were met by Turks, and ten persons were killed in a fight which ensued. There was reewed fighting on Monday, but the result at present is unknown. Business in Beyrout is suspended and the bazaars are closed.

Some Curious Financial Arrangements have been disclosed by an inquiry raised in the British Parliament about the Pension list. It appears that pensions are still being paid to the heirs of persons, who many years ago established a claim on the government. Among others, the descendants of William Penn are entitled to an annual pension of $20,000, in compensation for the loss of their proprietary rights in Pennsylvania; and the daughter of the Attorney-General of Florida drew up to last year a pension in compensation for her father's loss of office when the colony was ceded nearly a century ago. The representatives of the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Marlborough, and other distinguished generals, also draw large pensions in recognition of the services of their ancestors.

Canadian Prosperity, according to a Lecture delivered in London last week by Sir Alexander Galt, a member of the Canadian High Commission appears to be advancing rapidly. He said that the correct imports were equivalent to $87,500,000, the exports, $90,000,000, and that the debt of Canada, on the 30th of June, 1880, was $200,000,000.

A Convicted Counterfeit Coiner was One Day kindly accosted by a well-known London philanthropist in a prison ward, who handed him a tract to read. The convict held down his head as though ashamed, and said, "I knew your voice as soon as I heard you, sir; I have heard you before to-day, sir." "After a few words of explanation, says the gentleman, "I found that we had been at one time members of the same congregaton, and had sat under the same faithful ministry. I anxiously inquired how it was that he had fallen so low as to become an inmate of a prison. 'A glass of ale, sir, was my ruin, he replied. 'How could that be?' I inquired. 'I was at one period of my life, sir, very intemperate, but was happily led to give up drinking entirely, although I did not sign any pledge, which I now lament. I became a regular attendant at a place of worship, and went on very happily for some years, until one evening I was returning from home, when I met with some friends from Hull. They prevailed upon me to go to the public house to have but one glass. Conscience reproved me; but having entered upon the enchanted ground I was readily induced to take more liquor, until I became overcome by it. The next morning I was ashamed to show myself, and left home for Leeds. My old appetite for drink had been rekindled. I became reckless, and joined a set of counterfeit coiners. We were discovered, and now I am about to be transported. Oh, that I had never touched that one glass!"

Dr. TAIT, Archbishop of Canterbury—The late Dean ALFORD—Canterbury Cathedral, England.

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Born in 1811—College and University Career—The "Oxford Union Society"—His Opposition to the "Tracts for the Times"—Appointed to Succeed Dr. Arnold—His Marriage—Accepts the Deanery of Carlisle—Reminiscence of Carlisle—Bishop of London—Archbishop of Canterbury.

Dr. Archibald Campbell Tait, the chief ecclesiastical dignitary of Great Britain, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece, is the youngest son of the late Crawford Tait, Esq., Writer to the Scotch Signet. He was born in Edinburgh, on December 22, 1811, and is therefore in his seventieth year.

He was first placed at the famous Edinburgh Academy, and subsequently at the High School, where he showed an aptitude for study beyond the majority of his fellows. In 1827 he went to the University of Glasgow, and by close application, gained an exhibition to Balliol College, Oxford. A number of young men annually proceed from the Scottish to the English universities. There is especially a close connection between Balliol College and Glasgow University. The Glasgow professors have in their gift ten wealthy exhibitions to Oxford; each exhibition is sufficient for a fair academical subsistence, and is tenable for an unusual number of years. These exhibitions have been the means of recruiting Oxford with some of its best scholars, and of introducing into public life many able and celebrated men. The Glasgow career of Mr. Tait was remarkable for its industry, and the success with which that industry was rewarded.

His Oxford course was equally brilliant. He became "scholar" of Balliol, graduated "First Class" in honors, and in due course became Fellow, College tutor, and public examiner. He took his B.A. degree in 1833, and M.A. in 1836. He also for some time became a member of a third university, that of Bonn, on the Rhine. During his residence at Oxford Mr. Tait was one of the most prominent members of that famous institution, the "Oxford Union Society," where, in common with many illustrious statesmen, he gained a clear, accurate, forcible debating style, which has ever since characterized him on the platform and in Parliament.

At the close of his university studies he was ordained, and for a time discharged the duties of the curacy of Baldon, near Oxford.

When the famous "Tracts for the Times" threw all Oxford, and the whole country, into commotion, and excited the apprehension that many clergymen were abandoning the good old paths, and bending their steps toward the bondage of Rome, Mr. Tait came courteously but fearlessly into the conflict. He was one of the "four Oxford tutors" who drew the attention of the university to "Tract 90," and procured the condemnation of its doctrines. The author of that Romanizing Tract was John Henry Newman, now a cardinal, who, by his own perversion, and the perversion of many, through his efforts and example, proved that there was unhappily reason for the fears entertained.

In the midsummer of 1842, on the death of the great and good Dr. Arnold, the Headmaster of Rugby School, Mr. Tait was appointed to succeed him. He continued in this important sphere for seven years, and fully maintained and confirmed the exceptional reputation to which this great public school had attained through the beneficial influence of his predecessor. It was while at Rugby that he married Catherine, daughter of the late Archdeacon Spooner, and a cousin of Bishop Wilberforce, an estimable lady, who until her death, two years ago, entered into the ardorous duties of her husband with zeal, and pursued her multitude of good works for the poor and ignorant with unostentatious generosity.

In the year 1849 Mr. Tait was seized with a severe illness, and resigned the Headmastership of Rugby. In the same year he was appointed by Lord John Russell, who was then premier, to

THE DEANERY OF CARLISLE.

The parting from Rugby took place with many manifestations of affection and honor. The headmaster took his leave of the school by publishing a volume of sermons which he had preached in the chapel, entitled "Lessons for School Life." In it he said: "The chief reason for my publishing the sermons is that I may leave some memorial of my teaching to those for whose training, during so long a time, I know that I must be called to account. . . . For all connected with the school I can scarcely have a better prayer than that they may be enabled to love Christ, and truth, and goodness with the simplicity of Dr. Arnold."

Whatever a deanery may be to some deans, it was certainly no sinecure to the new Dean of Carlisle. His successor, Dr. Close, afterward declared that he found it hard work to keep pace with all that Dr. Tait did in Carlisle. A dean's chief ostensible duty lies with the fabric of his cathedral. During Dr. Tait's residence there $75,000 was spent in restoring the venerable pile. In delivering a lecture on the subject the dean said: "God knows fine buildings will never compensate for the want of the preaching of the genuine Gospel, and fervent, acceptable prayers may be offered anywhere; but it is not seemly that while great care is taken of our own houses the house of God should be defaced, and speak of ruinous neglect."

The dean and his amiable wife sought to exemplify in their practice the lofty principles which had been indicated in reference to the cathedral. The material fabric of the church was important, but they felt it infinitely more important to build up the living stones of the spiritual Church of Christ. There was a large industrial population at Carlisle, which gave ample scope for evangelistic work. Dean Tait was incessantly among them, praying, exhorting, and preaching with an ardor not excelled by the most laborious parish minister.

Carlisle is associated with the memories of various illustrious dignitaries, such as good Bishop Percy, the friend of Johnson, to whom we owe the "Reliques of Border Minstrelsy," and Archdeacon Paley, whose "Horæ Paulinæ," and "Evidences" opened up the great argument from coincidences, and the holy, learned Usher, the chronologist who, "with his failing eyes, followed the sunset from room to room." The latest memories connected with Carlisle are not unworthy of such associations.

In 1856 Dr. Bloomfield resigned and the Dean of Carlisle was appointed in his stead. The important positions he had already filled so successfully naturally prepared the way for this elevation, while grievous family calamities in the loss of various children by malignant fever (five of his daughters died in five weeks), had obtained for him the sympathies of the Queen and country, and made his appointment peculiarly acceptable. As bishop, Dr. Tait showed great zeal for the better spiritual provision of his diocese, and in ten years the "Bishop of London's Fund," through his perseverance, raised no less than a sum equivalent to five million dollars for building and endowing churches in the metropolis. At the death of Archbishop Longley, in 1868, Bishop Tait was translated to the see of Canterbury, which he now fills.

THE BISHOPRIC OF LONDON,

Of Dr. Tait's work as bishop and archbishop we have no space to enter into detail. In 1858 he delivered his primary charge, which occupied five hours in the delivery, and the scene in the cathedral was a memorable one. One part of it related to the importance of open-air preaching, and, while bishop, he himself repeatedly preached in the open air, sometimes to weavers at Bethnal Green, and at other times to drivers of cabs and omnibuses at Islington.

As a private gentleman, the archbishop is well known to be most courteous, affable, and sincere. While his Grace resided at Fulham Palace, one of the residences of the Metropolitan Bishop, he gained the esteem and affection of very many of the poor in the Parish of Fulham, and in Lambeth he won golden opinions from its rough but well-meaning inhabitants.

The death of his only son, in June, 1878, and of his wife in December, 1878, evoked much sympathy for him in the more than ordinary domestic afflictions that have beset his path through a long and chequered life.

The archbishop is an effective preacher, earnest rather than eloquent, and seems to use, or omit to use, his manuscript at pleasure. He is, according to his own admission, a "moderate" man; and he has had to arbitrate amid many conflicting interests of High, Low, and Broad Church, and to understand many opposite minds. It has always been his tendency to dwell on the points on which men agree rather than those on which they differ, and by a peculiar and happy eclecticism he has been able to sympathize with what is best in men of all shades of theological opinion.

THE LATE DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

Incidents of His Childhood and Youth—Career at Cambridge—First Ministerial Charge—Literary Toils—Narrow Escape—Popularity as a London Preacher—Appointment to the Deanery of Canterbury—Thrilling Incident of Travel—Character as an Author—Death in 1871.

Henry Alford, D.D., the late honored and beloved Dean of Canterbury, was born in London, October 7th, 1810, and died January 12th, 1871, at the deanery, Canterbury, having thus attained the age of sixty years. He had the inestimable advantage of being the son of pious parents, who were themselves descended from a God-fearing ancestry. Henry knew little of his mother,* for she died when he was about four months old, but the testimony of all who knew her is that she was an amiable, accomplished, and exemplary lady. The meditations and prayers found in her journal indicate no ordinary degree of piety. Who shall say how largely the prayers which ascended from that mother's heart influenced the career of her gifted son?

Henry's father, at the time of his son's birth, was a special pleader of considerable eminence, but shortly after the death of his wife he decided to leave the Bar and enter the Church. Young Henry is described as "a tender, delicate plant," of extreme sensibility. When about four years old, while staying with his maternal grandfather, Mr. Paget, at Cumberford Hall, near Tamworth, he had a very narrow escape, to which he often referred in after life. As he was standing on the lawn the scythe of the gardener cut through his little shoe, without touching foot or sock. This shoe was carefully preserved by his aunt as a memento of the providential escape.

Many stories are told of his wonderful precocity as a child. One of his amusements was to make little books, in which, when between five and six years old, he wrote histories or copied texts of Scripture. One of these books was called "The Travels of St. Paul, from his Conversion to his Death, with a Book of Plates," containing three drawings of St. Paul, the Stoning of Stephen, and Saul's Conversion. Under the tuition of his father he appears also at an early age to have made considerable progress in Latin and other studies.

In his eighteenth year he matriculated at Cambridge, and at once, as throughout his university course, gave himself with the utmost earnestness to his studies, and in due time took a wranglership. He was, however, keenly alive to the temptations of his position, as appears in one of his letters to a friend in October, 1829. He says: "It is not so much the gross outward temptations of this or any other place that I have to fear; my inmost feelings recoil and turn with disgust from the brutality and sensuality of many men whom I see around; but it is the insidious undermining, if I may say so, which study and literary habits carry on against the work of God in the soul—the pride of intellectual, philosophical or classical acquirements—it is these I have to dread. Oh, the chilling influence of literary pursuits and literary society!" In another letter he says: "What a delightful thing it is, after all the doubts and controversies of science and philosophy to turn to the pure simple truths of Scripture. 'We have all sinned. Jesus died for sinners. Believe and thou shalt be saved.' It is like turning from the flickering and dancing of a meteor to the pure fixed stars that beam forever, and are of a brightness that fails not."

* His mother was aunt of the Rev. M. Baxter, who is, consequently, first cousin to the dean.

On October 27th, 1833, he was ordained in Exeter Cathedral. The feelings with which he entered upon the solemn duties of the ministry, as disclosed in letters to his friends, at this period, and in the entries in his journal, are every way honorable to his heart and to his understanding. Such was his industry that besides attending faithfully to his curacy at Ampton, he found time to instruct a number of pupils, and read for a fellowship at Cambridge, although he regarded the latter as almost hopelessly beyond his reach. His misgivings, however, were not realized. He got his fellowship, and in the following year was presented to the living of Wymeswold, Leicestershire.

Shortly afterward he was married to his cousin, Miss Fanny Alford, to whom he had long been engaged. As the value of the living of Wymeswold at the time of Mr. Alford's appointment was but $550, with an exceedingly poor vicarage, he found it necessary to take pupils and live with every regard to economy.

In February, 1847, he had another

PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.

Travelling to Nottingham on horseback, he had proceeded about six miles on the road from Wymeswold, when the horse, which had been recently bought, stumbled on some loose stones and threw his rider over his head. Though much shaken and disfigured, especially about the face and head, he persisted in his intention to give a lecture which had been announced in that town, and accomplished it, notwithstanding the pain. He was, however, compelled to put himself under medical treatment for several days afterward, and his face bore a mark of the accident for the rest of his life. His idea of comes out in a letter, in which he describes the kind of curate he desired to find, when his increasing duties rendered him no longer capable of doing without help: "I want him to teach and preach Jesus Christ, and not the Church; and to be fully prepared to recognize the pious dissenter as a brother in Christ, and as much a member of the Church as ourselves. . . . Above all, he should be a man of peace, who will quietly do his own work and not breed strife."

Having been appointed in 1853 Incumbent of Quebec Chapel, near Portman Square, Mr. Alford removed with his family to London. Here he won great popularity as a preacher, continuing to attract large congregations by his able, eloquent, and soul-stirring discourses, until 1857, when, upon the death of Dean Lyall, he was appointed by Lord Palmerston

DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

It was felt on all hands that his solid learning, chaste eloquence, unbroken integrity, sound churchmanship, and dignified yet courteous bearing, marked him out as specially fit for high ecclesiastical office. His whole career at Canterbury entirely justified the expectations and hopes of his best friends.

In 1861 he made a tour in Italy, during which occurred, which is thus described in his journal: "After sleeping at Susa, where we arrived from Genoa at midnight, we started at 9 A.M. to cross the mountains. There had been during the night a tremendous hurricane, accompanied at Susa by rain in torrents, and on the mountains by a deep fall of snow. We had five miles in our carriage, winding up by steep ascents, with splendid views of the valley and Susa, to the first relay. A mile or two higher exchanged our carriage for a sledge, as we were now on the edge of the snow. We very soon came to large drifts quite obstructing the road, and in some cases rising twenty or thirty feet above it; the passing over these was certainly formidable enough, the road itself being only a ledge; the precipice cut in zigzags; a great drift had spread itself down over the brow, covering all the zigzags. Along the steep surface of this snow a track had been extemporized, generally sloping considerably outward, and sometimes covering itself by new drifts.

"To keep our sledge from falling over, we had two wild but most efficient fellows from among the Cantoniers of the road to hold us up; and, but for them, we should certainly have been over more than once. At one place just past the barrier at the summit, we hung partly over the edge, and the men showed some anxiety, calling out to warn the postillion, and it was not until they had fastened both traces to one side, and pulled us round sideways, that we got right again. At last we began to descend over great plains of snow and through forests of zigzags, which, with our horses reduced to one, we trotted very rapidly down, and arrived mercifully at Lans Le Bay, where we slept at a nasty inn, glad enough and thankful, especially when we heard that last night's diligence, which preceded us, had got into the worst of the storm, and had been turned over down one of the slopes by the force of the wind. It fell sixty or seventy feet, and then rested on the snow, no one being badly hurt."

Some idea of the extent of Dean Alford's may be gathered from the fact that the mere list of the works he published occupies sixteen pages of the appendix to his "Life" edited by his widow—a volume of 551 pages, published at Rivington's, London. His fame as an author mainly rests, of course, on his "Greek Testament"—anoble monument of consecrated talent and unwearied industry, which he completed in 1860, after eighteen years of research and toil. It is perhaps not generally known that the dean was a gifted poet, and as such received the high encomiums of no less a judge than William Wordsworth.

On January 8, 1871, he preached as usual in Canterbury Cathedral. On the following Monday he presided over a meeting for organizing a relief fund for the poor. On the Tuesday he was attacked by influenza; congestion of the lungs rapidly supervened, and on Thursday, the 12th, his work was done, and he fell quietly asleep in Jesus. The funeral service, which was of a most affecting character, took place on the following Tuesday, the procession being headed by the mayor and corporation of the city, which never witnessed a more largely-attended funeral. His death caused great sorrow in Canterbury, for he was admired and beloved by all denominations of Christians and all classes.

His sudden death called forth expressions of the deepest respect and regret in every rank of life, from the queen, who sent a most kind expression of sympathy with his widow, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, who warmly esteemed him as a friend and fellow-laborer, down to the humblest of those who knew him. A very conspicuous feature in his character was his large-hearted charity toward Christians of other denominations. For Dr. Stoughton, Dr. Allon, Dr. Angus, and other eminent dissenters, he cherished feelings of the most cordial friendship, and lost no opportunity of removing as far as he was able the misunderstandings by which good men of different churches are separated.

THE REVISION OF THE AUTHORIZED VERSION of the Scriptures, of which the New Testament is now completed, was strongly advocated by him. Dean Stanley says "it is largely due to him. He advocated it while it was still deemed rash and premature. He gave himself to it with all his energy when its necessity was recognized. He was, perhaps, of all the members of the Company for the Revision of the New Testament translation the one that could least be spared."

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

Originally Designed by Lanfranc in 1073—St. Martin's Church—History of the See Before the Time of Lanfranc—The Bible Chained up—Thomas a Becket's Shrine—The Reformation.

THIS splendid edifice as depicted on our frontispiece, was in its present form designed by Archbishop Lanfranc, a learned monk of Milan, in the year 1073. Its nave is 514 feet in length, and its transept 130 feet. It has been conjectured that a Christian church stood on the site of the present cathedral during the time that the city was under the dominion of the Romans, and was frequented by such of the soldiery as had embraced the Christian religion; and that St. Augustine, on his arrival in 596, found the edifice standing near the palace of King Ethelbert.

The church, which is called

ST. MARTIN'S,

is represented between the two portraits of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the late Dean Alford, on the upper portion of our frontispiece. Its original appearance is not materially altered. It still has a great number of Roman bricks incorporated in its walls, but the interior has been restored, and stained-glass windows have been inserted. It contains a stone coffin or sarcophagus, in which it is said Queen Bertha, wife of Ethelbert, lies; and the font—of which the tradition is that in it King Ethelbert was baptized—is a marvellously preserved specimen of Saxon antiquity, surrounded with sculpture.

The interior of the cathedral is most striking—the lofty vaulted nave; the long vista of columns lining the aisles; the simple magnificence and vast extent of the Anglo-Norman choir; and the rich effect of the stained-glass windows, filled with the records of prophets, saints and martyrs, and embellished with heraldic emblazonings of princes, priests, and nobles—benefactors to the church—cannot fail to produce feelings of an exalted and sublime nature.

For three hundred years after the consecration of this fabric nothing material is recorded of it, except that the revenues had gradually increased by the successive donations of princes and nobles. The invasion of England by the Danes involved both its civil and ecclesiastical affairs in confusion, and during this period the cathedral fell into decay, for in 934, when Archbishop Odo succeeded to the see, many parts of the building and the surrounding walls were in a ruinous state. Three years were occupied by this ecclesiastic in repairing the edifice. In 1011 it was burned to the ground by the Danes, and by the successive labors of the two prelates, Livingus and Ethelnoth, was rebuilt after the lapse of several years.

In 1043, much of this building was destroyed by fire, and was permitted to continue in the state the fire left it for some years. At the Norman conquest in 1066, Archbishop Lanfranc, rebuilt the cathedral in the Norman style; and, according to early historians, it was made a pattern for succeeding ecclesiastical structures throughout England. In early troublous times a massive wall completely encircled the building; for there was a large monastery in connection with it, and the cathedral was, as it were, a fortress within a fortress, and in the old Saxon times, many quarrels and disputes used to be settled in the church porch. As we stand upon the threshold of there may be seen in the distance the numerous steps leading to the choir. No wonder writers have spoken of "the height and grandeur of the piers branching up from the pavement like some natural forest of stone."

Erasmus tells us that when he visited the nave in his day, he saw sundry books fastened to the pillars. In the chapter library, there are some ancient manuscripts and Bibles preserved, of great value.

The greatest historical event in the history of the cathedral is associated with the assassination of in 1170. Fifty years after his death the body of Becket, who had been canonized by the pope, was removed from the crypt to the shrine which had been prepared. Two years' notice of the event had been given throughout Europe, and there was such an assemblage on the occasion as had never been known in England. The shrine rested on marble arches, and when its wooden canopy was removed it appeared blazing with jewels and gold. The spot where the shrine stood is exactly ascertained by the mosaic of the pavement. For many years the concourse of pilgrims from all parts of Europe was immense, and well-nigh incredible. In 1520, Henry VIII. and the great Emperor Charles V. of Spain visited the shrine.

THE REFORMATION

came, and then this monstrous mass of superstitious observances crumbled away.

CROSSING THE RIVER.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, February 27, 1881.

"And the priests that bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan."—JOSHUA 3 : 17.

The Passage of the Jordan—Associations of that River—I. Obstacles Touched, Vanish—A Beautiful Indian Tradition—The Jordan of Death—Dying Grace—John Livingston's Death—II. The Completeness of Everything that God does—The Tree of the Universe—A Complete Bible—The Kiss of God on the Soul—A Complete Saviour—III. Rivers of Difficulty to be Crossed—The Grapes Always on the Other Side—Illustrious Examples—The Last River Crossed One by one—Barefoot—Comfort for the Bereft—"Would You Call Them Back?"—Echoed Answers.

WASHINGTON crossed the Delaware when crossing was pronounced impossible; but he did it by boat. Xerxes crossed the Hellespont with two million men, but he did it by an extemporized bridge. The Israelites crossed the Red Sea, but the same orchestra that celebrated the deliverance of one army sounded the strangulation of the other. This crossing in my text is different from all those. It was without the loss of a human life. It was without the loss of so much as a linchpin. It seemed as if the waters were driven away. As the priests, who were the vanguard of the army, came down and touched the brim of the river the waters fled away, and then it was as if all the dampness had been sponged off, as though the road by a towel had been wiped dry. The streets of Jerusalem were not more dry than the depths of that river.

Yonder go the army of the Israelites, the armed men in front, followed by the wives, the children, the flocks, and the herds. As they come down into the midst of the river, and the waters pile up in crystal wall, the passing multitudes look up and think of the peril if that wall should fall before the march is completed, and the people get to the other side the bank amid the tamarisks and the oleanders. And so I think the mothers hugged their children closer to their hearts and hastened their pace. Quick now, get up on the other bank, all the host, the armed men, the wives, the children, the flocks, the herds, lest this which seems to be a triumphal march, end in awful catastrophe.

Seated this morning on the shelving of limestone we look off upon the river, this wonderful river that Joshua crossed under rainbow arch woven out of the spray—the river which afterward became the baptistry where Christ was sprinkled or plunged—the river in which the borrowed axe-head miraculously swam at the prophet's order—the river illustrious in the world's history for heroic faith and omnipotent deliverance, and typical of scenes to transpire in your life and mine, scenes enough to make us from sole of foot to crown of head thrill with gladness.

I. Standing this morning by the affrighted and fugitive river of Jordan, we learn in the first place that OBSTACLES TOUCHED VANISH.

The priests came down at the head of the Israelitish host, and they did not wade in chin deep, or chest deep, or knee deep, or ancle deep; they just with the foot touched the rim of the water, and Jordan fled. So it is with a great many of the obstacles in your life and mine. They are tremendous in the distance, but when we advance upon them, when we touch them with our courage, they are gone.

Paul and John in the Scriptures seemed to have especial antipathy to cross dogs. Paul says in Philippians, "Beware of dogs;" and John seems to shut the gate of heaven against all the canine species, when he says, "Without are dogs." But I have been told that when those ferocious animals come upon you, if you can keep your eye upon them they retreat. Whether that is so or not I cannot say, but this I know, that many of the troubles and annoyances of life which hound you, if you will only turn upon them, and as they advance upon you, you advance upon them and you keep your eye of courage upon them and cry, "Begone!" they will slink and cower.

There is a beautiful tradition among the American Indians that Manitou was travelling in the invisible world, and that he came upon a hedge of thorns, and after a while he saw wild beasts glare upon him from the thicket, and after a while he saw an impassable river; but as he determined to proceed, did go on, the thorns turned to be phantoms, the wild beasts a powerless ghost, the river only the phantom of a river. And it is the simple fact of our lives that the vast majority of the obstacles in our way disappear when we march upon them. Jordan touched vanishes.

You see some duty in the future you do not want to perform. "Oh," you say, "I haven't the physical courage for it, I haven't faith in God for it, I can't do it, I am not competent for the circumstance!" Go right on and do your whole duty, and the obstacles will be gone. The waters touched vanish. What is true when we are well and in great prosperity, we imagine may not be true in the last hour of life. How many there are who are afraid of the Jordan of death! If I should ask all those Christians in this audience, who have no fear or agitation about the crossing from this world into the next—if I should ask all such persons to rise up, there would not be twenty persons in the house rising up. Why, it is not your time to die. God never gives dying grace until you are going to die. We might as well expect martyr's grace when we are not called to be martyrs. It is in the Jordan in the distance that is so terrible. When you come up to it it will depart. That is going to be true in all your histories—not one exception—of those who are the children of God.

Good John Livingston used to have a great horror of leaving this world. He was in a sloop coming from Elizabethport to New York, and there came a sudden gust of wind, and the probability was that the sloop would be destroyed, and the most affrighted man on board was John Livingston, and many were surprised that so good and gracious and glorious a man as John Livingston should be affrighted under such circumstances; but when at last that man was called to die, he was as calm as a child asleep on a bank of flowers. It is death in the distance, not death close by, that affrights the Christian. Jordan touched vanishes.

So it will be when your last hour comes. I say it in utter confidence. I know it will be so. Christ, your priest, with bruised feet, will go ahead of you. He will put his feet to the brim of the water, and you will follow. The waters will fly and you will go through dry shod on beds of coral and flowers of heaven and paths of pearl.

"O! Could we make these doubts remove,
These gloomy doubts that rise,
And see the Canaan that we love,
With unbeclouded eyes,

Could we but stand where Moses stood
And view the landscape o'er
Not Jordan's stream, or death's cold flood
Could fright us from the shore."

II. Looking off upon this strange crossing of the river, I also learn

THE COMPLETENESS OF EVERYTHING THAT GOD DOES.

When the Jordan was bidden to halt, you would have supposed it would have overflowed and devastated the country. That would be the natural law. Halt a river in its march to the sea, and you destroy the country. But when God built an invisible dam across the Jordan so it halted, he built at the same time an invisible dam on either side the Jordan, so that the context says the waters stood up—stood up—they reared in their march. It was a complete miracle, complete in every respect, just like God's work, always complete.

But you would have said, "If the waters of the Jordan are drawn off it does not make any difference though there be two or three feet of water, the Israelites can easily wade through, and they will come up with saturated garments on the beach as people came up from a shipwreck." No, it was better than that. You would have said, "If the waters of Jordan are drawn off, then there will be a bed of mud and slime through which the Israelites must pass. Draw off the waters of the Connecticut or the Hudson, and there would be a bed of mud and slime impassable. It would take days and weeks for it to dry up." But lo! the completeness of the divine miracle. The waters fly. The bed of the river is perfectly dry. They go through dryshod.

Oh! the completeness of everything that God does. Does He build a universe, it is a perfect clock running ever since it was wound up. Fixed stars the pivots, constellations the intermoving wheels, and ponderous laws the weights and mighty swinging pendulum. The stars in the dome striking midnight, and the sun with brazen tongue tolling the hour of noon. The wildest comet has on it the chain of a law it cannot break. The thistle-down that flies before the school-boy's breath is controlled by the same law that controls a whole universe. The rose-bush in your window is controlled by the same law that controls the tree of the universe, on which stars are ripening fruit, and on which God will some time put His hand and shake down the fruit. It is a complete universe. No astronomer has ever suggested an amendment.

Does God make a Bible, it is

A COMPLETE BIBLE.

Standing amid its dreadful and delightful truths, you seem to be in the midst of an orchestra, where the wailings over sin, and the shoutings over pardon, and the martial strains of victory, sound like the anthem of eternity. It seems like an ocean of truth on which God walks, sometimes in the darkness of prophecy, and sometimes in the splendor with which He walked on Galilee—apostle answering to prophet, Paul to Isaiah, Revelation to Genesis. A complete book. It is the kiss of God on the soul of lost man.

Does God provide a Saviour, He is a complete Saviour. God, man—divinity, humanity. He set up the starry pillars of the universe. He planted the cedars of Lebanon. He quarried the sardonyx and the chrysolite and the topaz for the wall of Heaven, putting down jasper for the foundation, and heaving up amethyst for the capstone, and made the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. A mighty Saviour, and yet a sympathetic Saviour. In one instant He thought out a universe, and yet, held by His mother's hand. All Heaven adoring Him, yet on earth called "this fellow." Angels folding their wings over their faces and bowing before Him, holy, holy, holy, yet called a sot and a blasphemer. Rocked in a boat on Genessaret, and yet He it is that undirks the lightning from the storm-cloud and dismasts Lebanon of its cedars. Rubbing His hand over the place where you have an ache or a pain, and yet the stars of Heaven the adorning gems of His right hand. Holding us in His arms when we take the last look at our dead; sitting beside us at the tombstone, and while we plant roses there, He plants consolations in our soul. Every chapter a stalk. Every paragraph a stem. Every word a rose. A complete universe. A complete Bible. A complete Saviour. A complete Jordanic passage. Everything He does is complete.

III. Again: I look off upon the wonderful scene of my text and I learn that between us and everything bright and beautiful and useful and prosperous, there is that we must cross. "Oh!" said the Israelites to Joshua, "I wish I could get some of those grapes." "Well," said Joshua, "why don't you cross over and get them." The grapes are always on the other side. You have got to cross over to get them. That which costs nothing is worth nothing. God puts everything valuable a little out of our reach, that we may struggle for it. For the same reason He puts gold deep down in the mine, and pearls deep down in the sea, to make us dig and dive. We all understand that in worldly things. Would God we understood it in religious things.

Nobody is surprised to read that Cornelius Vanderbilt blistered his hands rowing a ferryboat. Nobody is surprised to read that A. T. Stewart used to sweep out his own store. You can think of those who had it very hard who have now got it very easy. Their walls blossom and bloom with pictures. Carpets that made foreign looms laugh now kiss their feet. The horses neigh and champ their bits at the doorway, the gilded harness tinklng with silver, and the carriage rolling away like a eautiful wave on New York life.

Who is it? It is the boy who had all his estate lung over his shoulder in a cotton handkerchief. he silver on the harness of the advancing span is etrified sweat drops. That beautiful dress is the aded calico that God ran His hand over, and it ecame Turkish satin or Italian silk. Those dia-nonds are the tears which suffering froze as they ell. There is always a river of difficulty between is and anything that is worth having.

There was a river of difficulty between Shake-speare, the boy holding the horses at the London Theatre for a sixpence, and Shakespeare, the world's dramatist winning the applause of all nations by his incomparable tragedies. There was a river of difficulty between Benjamin Franklin, with a loaf of bread under his arm trudging along the street of Philadelphia, and Benjamin Franklin, the philosopher, outside of Boston, playing kite with the thunderstorm. An indolent man was cured of his indolence by looking out of the window at night into another window, and seeing a man turning off one sheet of writing paper after another sheet of writing paper until almost the daybreak. Who was it that wrote until the morning? It was Walter Scott. Who was it that looked at him from the opposite window? Lockhardt, afterwards his illustrious biographer.

It is push and struggle and drive. There are mountains to scale, there are rivers to ford. Lord Mansfield, pursued of the press and pursued of the populace, said, "if a man die in behalf of the law and liberty of his country, he cannot die too soon." And there has been struggle for everybody that gained anything for themselves, or gained anything for the Church, or gained anything for the world. We all understand it in worldly things. Why can we not understand it in religious things?

You think it is a mere accident that that old Christian knows so much about the Bible. Why, he was studying his Bible when you were reading your primer. He got strong by running the Christian race. In fifty Solferinos he learned how to fight. In a shipwreck he learned how to swim. It was by pounding at the anvil of trouble that he became swarthy. Then when this Christian goes on and gets across all these other rivers of difficulty there is the River of Death still.

Lieutenant Molineaux explored the Jordan, and he said he had several boats all split to pieces in the rapids of the Jordan. Some parts of the river are very dangerous, and he had his boats completely destroyed in trying to explore the river Jordan. And the River of Death has destroyed many, many, many. There is a gurgling in the water, there is a moaning in the air, there is a thunder in the sky, and God seems to write, "I will tread them in My wrath and trample them in My fury."

To some it seems a dreadful river to cross, but now here is the Christian coming. It is time for departure. He has crossed all the other rivers and here is

THE RIVER OF DEATH.

His priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, with bruised feet, goes right on ahead of him, and he comes to the water, and his breath gets shorter and shorter, and his last breath is gone as he touches the wave. But then all the billows toss their plumes and begin to sing: "O! death where is thy sting? O! grave, where is thy victory?" God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more sea, and there shall be no more death.

What a matter of congratulation it must be to those Israelites that they not only got through themselves but their families with them. Here are the fathers and mothers climbing up the other bank, and here are their families coming right on with them. O! my brother, my sister, will it not be grand, will it not be glorious, if we pass through ourselves in safety, and all our loved ones besides!

I was some time ago seated at my table at home, and my family were all there, and I said, "What a beautiful thing it would be if we could all get into one boat, and I could be the oarsman, and we could just pull away across the River of Death; all start together, all go together, and all land in Heaven together." That is not the way. It would not do to substitute our ignorance for God's wisdom. It is one by one, one by one. My mother, in her dying moments, said to my father —they had been married sixty years—"father, wouldn't it be pleasant if we could both go together?" But no: it was two years apart. It is one by one.

Some of us who were brought up in the country remember when the summer was coming, warm summer weather, in our boyhood we used to ask mother to let us go barefoot, and we remember just the sensation when we put our uncovered foot upon the soft dust and the cool grass. And the time will come when we will cast off these sandals which we must wear because there are so many sharp places on the road of life, we will cast off these sandals, and with unsandalied foot we will step on the soft bed of the river. Then with one foot in the bed of the river, with the other we will spring up on the other bank, and

THAT WILL BE HEAVEN.

It will not be a breaking down; it will be a lifting up, it will be an irradiation as was beautifully illustrated when the Christian husband was dying and he said to his wife, "how that candle flickers, Nellie; put it out. I shall sleep well to-night and waken in the morning."

Oh, how much comfort there is in this subject for all the bereft! You see our departed are not swamped in the waters, are not submerged. They have crossed over. That is all crossed over. The Israelites were just as certainly alive on the eastern bank of the Jordan as they were on the western bank af the Jordan, and our departed Christian friends are just as certainly alive now as they were before they crossed the River of Death. The respiration easier. The sight keener. All their aches and ailments left this side. An impassable barrier put between them and all human and Satanic pursuit.

Crossed over. Not sick, not dead, not obliterated, not blotted out, but crossed over. Ought I not congratulate you, the bereft, at the thought that your friends are safe in Heaven?

I see by the papers last night that the Australia has been out now a good while, and I believe is nine days over due, and there is a great deal of apprehension about the Australia. And I remember a few years ago there was a great deal of apprehension about the City of Brussels. She was overdue. She left New York harbor for Liverpool. I think there were eight or ten days that she was overdue, and there was a great deal of apprehension on the part of the friends here about their friends on board that ship. The general impression was all through New York and in England, that the City of Brussels had gone down. But one day the news flashed from Liverpool: "the City of Brussels is coming up the harbor."

What a time of rejoicing it was in New York! Did we not do well to congratulate the people who had friends on board that they had got across safely, that they landed in Liverpool safely? How heartily we shook their hands in congratulation, and am I not right in congratulating you. O! Christian bereft, that your friends have got safely over? They have not gone down. They are harbored, crossed over. You would not call them back, would you? If you had the capacity would you call them back? Would you call your aged parents back? Did they not have a struggle long enough? Was not the journey tedious enough? Did they not have ailments and sicknesses enough? Would you call your Christian father, your Christian mother back, if you could? You would not, you would not.

WOULD YOU CALL YOUR CHILDREN BACK?

Perhaps it would not be safe for the Lord to trust us with the power. But I do not think we could afford to call our children back, to call them back to temptation and struggle, for life under the very best circumstances is a struggle. We could not afford to call them back. What, would we have our departed friends cross the Jordan three times? Is not once enough? In addition to the crossing they have already made, would we have them cross back again? And then after many years had gone they would have to cross over again to the other side, for surely you would not want to keep them forever out of Heaven. You would not want them to cross three times. The poet says:

"Pause and weep, not for the freed from sin,
But, that the sigh of love would bring them back again."

I ask a question and the answer comes back in heavenly echo, "Will you never be sick again?" "Never—sick—again." "Will you never be tired again?" "Never—tired—again." "Will you never sin again?" "Never—sin—again." "Will you never weep again?" "Never—weep—again." "Will you never die again?" "Never—die—again."

O! ye army of departed kindred, I hail you from bank to bank. Wait for us. When our work is done meet us half way between the willowed banks of earth and the palm groves of heaven. There is one old hymn that rings through your soul to-day while I am preaching, words consecrated by many a dying lip, words we tried to sing at my father's departure, but all the voices broke down at the close of the first verse, broke in emotion:

"On Jordan's stormy bank I stand
And cast a wishful eye to Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie,
O! the transporting, rapturous scene that rushes on my sight,
Sweet fields arrayed in living green and rivers of delight."

A Queen Forbidding Rum.—The Christian Queen of Madagascar has taken a strong position on the temperance question. Under a former treaty with France importations of rum were allowed. She has now forbidden her people to drink it, and faithfully warned them of the evil consequences; and, in their presence, she caused the barrels of rum assigned to her as revenue to be broken, and the contents poured out upon the sand. "I cannot," she says, "take a revenue from anything that will debase and degrade my people." What a lesson her conduct furnishes to professedly Christian governments who derive millions of dollars annually by revenue from the sale of intoxicating liquor.

"Mad" Sailors.—Miss Hendenstrom, whose work for Christ among Swedish sailors is well known, relates the following interesting incidents: Carl Lundelius, a young Swede of twenty years of age, has been converted lately. An old shipmate had been in the habit of going to the casino called "Jolly Sailor" for the sake of the dancing, and one evening found himself without money to pay for going in; so strolling along the highway he was passing the "Strangers' Rest," and went there. He was much impressed, and the following morning went to the ship and said to Carl Lundelius that he knew of a place a thousand times better than the "Jolly Sailor," and invited him to go there with him. After some discussion it was arranged that they should go to the Rest that same evening, as it began at seven o'clock, and he was told he could come out in time for the dancing at eight o'clock. They went, but when eight o'clock came neither moved from his place, and on leaving, when passing the "Jolly Sailor," Carl Lundelius wondered how there could be such a place, and on going on board prayed that God would show him Himself. He afterward told me that the words I had quoted from the story of the Prodigal Son, "I will arise and go to my father," had first led him to ponder. We prayed together, and he then and there decided for Jesus. On his return to the ship he immediately began to bear witness, but stood quite alone, and was pronounced mad. He asked me if there were not a Christian man in the Home who could accompany him, and when I said "No," he said, "But why not pray that one may be converted?" which we did, and the prayer of faith was answered on the second day. He then suggested that we should pray that his captain should take the new convert, and this also was answered, the captain testifying to the efficiency of Carl Lundelius, but regretting that he was mad, because he spoke so much of Jesus. Carl wrote to his father and mother, telling them of the change, and urging them to trust in Jesus.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Mrs. Hutton's Forebodings—A Prayer for Etta—The Family Gathering—The Empty Seat—The Influence at Work—A Knitted Shawl—Bible Study—A Spiritual Tonic.

THE Rector's gardener was spared the difficulty of a reply to Miss Aleth's comprehensive question; for before the bell had stopped ringing the fleet-footed child was at the doorstep, and in less than five minutes seated at the luncheon table.

When the gardener went home to his dinner he said to his wife:

"It is a rare pity about the shed. I don't know whatever the master has been saying in the house about that there fire last night. Little Miss Aleth has been talking about it, out there at the houses."

"My dear, I do wish you wouldn't have nothing to do with it at all. It will real vex the rector some day; and you know you've been here such a many years; and the cottage is very comfortable an' all. I don't know what I'd do if you was to get yourself into trouble."

Thus the wife replied. She was a thin, careworn, anxious-looking woman, who gave one the idea of hanging always half over the edge of misfortune before she came into it, instead of resting, as her husband did, in the fields of content on the other side.

"You ought to be called Mrs. Fearing," said her husband; "nobody ever did be so frightened about a thing as you are. Poor old dear!" he added consolingly, "I hope you won't be like this in heaven, and all the bright angels singin' and praisin' round you. 'Twould be a shame!"

To this sally she made no answer; while he continued more gravely:

"They went to Him 'without the camp, bearing His reproach.' He was a poor man, wife. Our Jesus was that; and He didn't have only a garden, or a mountain, or a upper room to meet His friends in, and have a bit of prayer like me."

Thus the colloquy ended. Both continued in the same mind, which, as the usual result of argument, was not to be wondered at. But the gardener went back to his work strengthened and refreshed by the precious verse he had himself quoted. Chiming like a peal of hope, these words remained with him that November afternoon and many a long day after.

While Mr. Clemence of Ferncroft had been in his seat at the School Committee, his wife was sitting in her pretty drawing-room with her Bible and her knitting. Presently she laid down her knitting, and covered her face with her hands. She was praying.

"Lord!" she said, "if it be Thy will that I should help that dear girl or any other member of her household in this time of their sorrow, I am ready to do it. 'Here am I, Lord! send me.' Oh, reach their hearts! Grant them Thy grace to love and serve Thee. Give them light in the midst of this dark cloud, and use them for Thy glory!"

At the same hour old Mike was praying also. By both she was remembered; but she did not know it. It was the hour of the usual family rendezvous after dinner, when, in happier days, Arthur's voice had added its deep, rich tones to many a song, and his pleasant conversation and genial manner had been the source of so much delight to those who now, clothed in their sable garb, met night by night without him. Sad indeed it was! each felt the blank.

While the heartless sympathy of many a frivolous acquaintance would use the words in writing or personal address, "Sad loss!" the pain of bereaved hearts resented the intrusion, from the sense of inadequacy in such empty sentences to express the real blank from which they were suffering. The old songs had lost their sweetness, the duets and solos sounded harsh and cold, and rang out funeral notes that cost so many tears and so many painful thoughts, that by common consent the evenings had lost their pleasant garniture, and were dull and quiet enough.

Mr. Fennicker would read out bits from the newspaper. The girls would subside into a sofa or easy-chair, with an absorbing novel or fancy needlework; while their mother generally held in her hand some soft wollen garment in process of creation for one or another of her sons or daughters. But generally now the needles lay idle, and her husband would try to rally her with a sad smile, calling her industry "a figure of speech."

On this night, a strong impulse seemed to draw Etta away from the drawing-room party and up into her little room. There, closing her door, she yielded to the fascination of solitary thought. It was food to her—comfort; and these were so precious, so utterly necessary to her, that, almost unconsciously, at any price she would secure them.

As her heart was drawn into its nearest approach to communion with God, sitting there in her armchair this evening, by the light of the fire, how little she knew that a mighty influence was being exerted for her in two different parts of the little town at that very moment—an influence to which she was herself then succumbing, and beneath which she was finding both strange and novel sensations. It was an influence, too, that was descending from a Higher Heart—a Heart of Infinite Love, who had seen those solitary sighs, and knew the grief, for He had borne it once; and HE had imparted His own intercessions to each of those praying ones.

"Come down and make tea, Etta!" called a voice at the door, after an imperative knock.

Etta went downstairs, filled her post, and then retired to the farther end of the room, where she was seen diving into a huge ottoman, which was known as a family store of wools of various kinds.

"What is Etta doing?" asked one of the sisters.

"Looking for some fleecy wool," was the reply; "or, if there is none of it left, for some yarn or Scotch fingering."

"There must be some of that," replied pretty Marion, the father's special pet; "for there was some left the other day when I made papa's cuffs. How much do you want?"

"Oh, just a little," said Etta.

"Etta's replies are indefinite," interposed Fred.

When Etta returned to her seat she was asked, as she expected, the next question—

"What do you want it for?"

"Oh! just to try if I could make something," was her evasive answer.

In her head, or rather her heart, an idea was fluttering, that surely something warm and comfortable might be created from the superfluous contents of the great ottoman, by her own hands for the troubled family that had enlisted her sympathies that afternoon.

Before she went to bed something like a square knitted shawl had got into shape on her ivory needles. Counting her stitches, and closely following the directions of an old knitting-book that she had also rummaged out, the evening passed much quicker than usual; and, for the first time since Arthur's death, she almost sighed when stern half-past ten broke up the party, and bedtime asserted its sway.

By her own fire Etta drank deeply into the Living Word that night, and the early hours of morning found her engrossed in the same study.

These were some of the thoughts that clustered like precious gems about the pages of the Book she read—

"Occupation!" she had thought, as she opened it. "I can no longer waste my time; nor can I spend an objectless eternity. I have been 'redeemed' myself. I am commanded to 'redeem the time, because the days are evil.' But what occupations shall I choose? How shall I spend my time?"

And then she searched, like a wise servant, for her Master's directions on that point.

Taking the word "Occupy" as her starting-point, Etta found to begin with at least one very simple direction.

"Occupy till I come," the lord had said, as he gave the talents in charge to his various servants before he left their sight. Here length of service was accurately given—"till I come," said the Master—but its kind was not touched upon! How strange! she thought, that it should be so direct a precept, and yet so undefined! For want of some human friend at her elbow, feeling sorely her lack of knowledge—"a babe in spiritual wisdom," as she often called herself—she fell on her knees, and asked in simplest words—

"Lord! teach me this. How can I tell Thy will? How can I know it?"

And then, as she looked and read again, the evident reality flashed full upon her, as though some dark lantern had been suddenly opened over the verse; or as though a curtaining fog had been as suddenly lifted, and the all-luminous rays of a golden sun had been shed over the sacred landscape, and it was plain.

"Clear as daylight!" she soliloquized, and covered her face with her hands.

There it was, in all its indefinite definiteness that is so peculiar to the writings of our Divine Teacher.

She saw it now! though she could not have put her revelation into words.

"He has left a blank for me to fill up!" she softly whispered. "Occupy—what? My time? Yes. He shall have it all. I yield it now, completely, to my Saviour, who has the highest right to it, because He purchased me."

"Occupy—what?" she continued, following her new line of thought, "my thoughts? Yes. He shall so dwell in my heart, that my very thoughts become His own—the passage-way for His footsteps, the channels for His blessing." And then the lovely verse she had discovered lately in her Bible stole into her memory, "Ye have the mind of Christ." Memory, imagination, affection, plans for the future, sad and joyous thoughts, hopes and fears—must they all become His? Yes, Lord, I give them all to Thee, because Thou hast loved me better than Thy life! and I love Thee in return."

How powerfully the Lord of her choice was drawing her heart to Himself that night! It was, indeed, one of the many green oases she had stumbled upon lately in her solitary chamber. But she had not yet exhausted the full nourishment of her new-found plot of "green pasture," nor had she sipped away the entire honey of this tiny blossom that grew so freshly for her in God's great garden.

"Occupy," she still pondered, "my desires with Him. 'One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in His temple.' I do desire to know more of Jesus. I want to see His face, and to understand His will, and He will surely satisfy me. Nothing is so painful to me as restless cravings, or wishes unfulfilled. Oh, how often I wish I had Arthur here to help me! Dear Arthur! . . . or even any kind friend. Lord, teach me to occupy my desires with Thee!" Thus she prayed.

Tired though she was with the simple effort of yielding to strong spiritual impulse, all unaccustomed as her heart had been to its exercises until within the past few months, she could not but turn one glance to the thought—

"Occupy—what? My home for Jesus. Yes; and my neighbors' homes, too! God grant it my be so!"

In spite of her fatigues to-night, Etta laid down to rest with the exquisite sense of nearness to God upon her that she had never before so clearly enjoyed.

Her awaking the next morning was under the influence of a strong tonic, so invigorated and refreshed did she feel, and so ready for a speedy return to those pages.

The morning light flooded her Book with fresh promises, casting a halo of brightness about the newly-born day, that she had not hitherto experienced.

Thus Etta's days passed on with their varying, chequered lights and shadows. But each was now tinged, though sometimes very faintly, by that brightness which emanates from the Sun of Righteousness.

THE LATE REV. DR. JOBSON.

THIS esteemed Wesleyan minister, whose portrait we give this week, expired on January 4th, at the age of sixty-nine. He was born in the cathedral city of Lincoln in the year 1812. He received a good early education, and was designed for the profession of an architect. He was articled to Mr. Willson, gentleman in Lincoln, England, and during the time he remained in his house received much literary instruction from the Roman Catholic clergy, who were on intimate terms with Mr. Willson's family, but he remained intelligently stanch and true to the Protestant faith. His course in life was presently diverted by conversion to God through the instrumentality of a pious mother, who was a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society.

This change of mind and heart led to his entering the ministry in 1834, and for nearly half a century was most indefatigable in the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. His ingenuous character and conspicuous gifts were early appreciated, and as a striking proof of the high estimation in which he was held, nine out of the fifteen years of service which he rendered in London circuits were spent at City Road Chapel, the archiepiscopate of Methodism.

He was universally distinguished as a powerful preacher. He had a well-modulated voice, and delivered his message with an earnestness which has been described as irresistible and overwhelming. One who often heard him during his first term in the City Road circuit has said that though his sermons were not then so mature as they afterward became, yet they were richly evangelical, and were delivered with much pathos and with great tenderness of appeal. He was even then a man greatly beloved. He had not been long in the ministry when he was admitted to the counsels and the friendship of the leading men of the Connection. He was a worthy and loyal disciple, in whom there glowed a true love for Methodism, and that love was increased by his early contract with the fathers of the Connection.

In the year 1856 he was selected from among his brethren to accompany his fellow-citizen, Dr. Hannah, as a deputation to the General Episcopal Methodist Conference in the United States. He afterward published, in a volume of great interest, an account of what he heard and observed in this country, which was illustrated with graphic sketches from his own facile and graphic pencil. Such was the impression produced in America by his sermons and addresses that one of the universities conferred upon him the honor of a doctor's degree.

Dr. Jobson has also been officially connected with chapel building and schools for ministers' sons, the Theological Institution at Didsbury, relief and extension funds, and day-school education, and has acted as clerical treasurer for the Foreign Missionary Society, and Book Steward. He was in some respects a remarkably old-fashioned Methodist ; and was opposed to the introduction of laymen into the Conference. During his last paralytic attack the grace of God abundantly sustained him ; and the joy which had been his in life was his also in death.

SOME RECENT CABLEGRAMS; Viewed in the Light of Prophecy.

Ireland's Separation Foreshadowed—Mr. Parnell's Visit to France—The Land League and the Commune—A Mighty Army—The National Contingents—Secret Societies—A Powerful Engine—Adapted to Napoleonic Traditions—Degraded Imitation of Christ.

ONLY a few weeks of the year have passed away, yet during that time the intelligence the cable has brought of events occurring on the other side the Atlantic, cannot fail to have impressed the thoughtful Christian observer with the conviction that some of the most remarkable changes predicted in the Bible are close at hand. Not the least conspicuous of these items of news, relates to the state of Ireland. Many years ago the Rev. M. Baxter, in his pamphlet entitled Coming Wars expressed the belief, founded on his study of prophecy, and confirmed by the conclusions of other prophetic students, that Ireland would eventually be legislatively separated from Great Britain.

Although that separation has not actually taken place, we have seen that the British Parliament after sitting eight weeks has not been able to give any attention to pressing affairs of state. Irish members have obstructed its proceedings, and the affairs of Ireland have monopolized its attention. Many intelligent Englishmen have in consequence been prompted to ask the question, whether the interests of the kingdom would not be promoted, and greater harmony secured, if the legislation exclusively Irish, were referred for consideration to a legislative assembly in Ireland, subject to the confirmation or veto of the queen.

A second noteworthy incident considered in the light of prophecy is the visit Mr. Parnell recently paid to Paris. We are led to expect as a sign of the approaching crisis a rapid development of socialistic communism, one of the three unclean frog-like spirits proceeding from the mouth of the dragon (Revelation 16 : 13). The mission on which the leader of the Land League went to the French capital was practically the formation of an alliance between the Irish Land League and the French Communists. While in Paris Mr. Parnell had several interviews with the editors of communistic journals, among them M. Rochefort. The negotiations have not been published, but that they were successful, may be inferred from the fact that articles appeared in those journals, soon after Mr. Parnell's visit, espousing the cause of the Irish agitators and denouncing British rule.

It had been suspected from the outset that were nearly identical in principle ; both being an organized movement against the rights of property. The mode of operation differed ; the Communists preferring open insurrection and a desperate fight at the barricades, while the mode adopted by the Land League is Boycotting and connivance at, if not instigation to, cowardly assassination. The difference was believed to be mainly one of circumstance and temperament, and not of principle. The fact that Mr. Parnell, casting about for allies, finds them among French Communists confirms that belief. Socialistic communism may now therefore be regarded as the banner of a large army, of which one wing is composed of German Socialists, a second of French Communists, a third of Russian Nihilists and a fourth of Irish Land Leaguers.

A third characteristic of the present day is one which has not attracted much observation. Lord Beaconsfield, who is a close observer of men and things, has, however, both orally and in his published works called attention to it, as an ominous sign of the times. It is the rapid spread of

SECRET SOCIETIES.

It is a startling fact that in all lands exist, societies whose proceedings are kept a profound secret, and to which members are only admitted under solemn oaths of secrecy and fidelity—oaths which if broken render the perjurer liable to a horrible death. In some of these societies the door of the room in which they meet is always guarded against intrusion by a man armed with a drawn sword.

There is no doubt that the object of many of these societies is purely beneficent. They are designed to render help and succor to members in adversity and to their families if bereft of their head. But there is no guarantee that such societies may not be perverted to other and far different purposes. They are now independent of each other, though they bear so close a resemblance that they might be combined or federalized under one executive by a carefully-prepared scheme.

More than one student of prophecy has asked the question, whether, in the existence of these secret societies, flourishing side by side with the political and social movement of Communism, there is not the key to the mystery of the rapidity of development we are led to expect, in that incarnated principle of consummate evil, Antichrist? Whether or not that may be the means used, it is obvious that a cunning daring genius, such a one as the two specimens already furnished by might find there an engine of irresistible power. Could he, by craft, centre in himself, on the Napoleonic principle of plebiscite, the executive power of all these societies, orders, and organizations, scattered all over the earth, his power would surpass that of any living potentate. By constituting himself first a servant, then a representative, and finally a master, as Napoleon I. and Napoleon III. did in their plots against the French Republic, he might eventually exercise world-wide sway, interposing, as the Popes of Rome once did, between subject and sovereign in every land. His edicts might be registered and executed in every clime, from pole to pole, and from east to west, and he might by an extension of the Boycotting principle (in which one branch of the mighty army is already proficient), prevent any man buying or selling who had not "the mark of the beast" (Rev. 13 : 17).

Such a scheme too would not be inconsistent with at least one characteristic of the prophetic description of Antichrist. Prophetic expositors believe that he will be a degraded imitator of the Saviour ; a being who to deceive the people will adopt the plan of Christ's kingdom, prostituting it to unholy ends. Christ gathers to Himself a people out of all lands, who give allegiance in temporal affairs to their respective temporal sovereigns, but consecrate their supreme fealty, the homage of their souls, to the King of kings. Antichrist might follow the same principle, until his power became consolidated and tested. He might at first wield the sceptre of a kingdom within a kingdom, until in the fulness of time he considered the hour had come for the revelation of himself in his true diabolical character.

While students of prophecy differ on this obscure subject of the rise and development of Antichrist, now that the signs of the times indicate the approaching end of the age, attention is naturally drawn to that strange potentate of the last days. Suggestions more or less plausible are constantly being made, and it is certainly by no means the most improbable, that the variety of secret societies now existing, and the attempted alliance of revolutionary schemes, such as the Land League of Ireland with the Commune of France, constitute a means which Antichrist may utilize to gather up the scattered strands of power and weave them into a cable wherewith to girdle the entire world.

Mrs. M. Baxter, together with some Lady-helpers, is holding meetings in Cologne, Germany, where the densest ignorance prevails as to the sin of man, and redemption through Jesus Christ. The city has a population of 135,000, most of whom profess Roman Catholicism. Mrs. Baxter's meetings are largely attended by women and girls, some of whom are factory girls, who come for the most part with the intention to disturb by loud laughing, shouting, pushing, bad language, etc,

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Re-apportionment Question in the House of Representatives was referred on, February 25th, to a joint committee of five members of each party in the hope that a basis of compromise might be arranged. The committee, however, has hitherto failed to come to any agreement. The subject was also discussed at a Republican caucus in Washington, at which it was resolved to oppose any scheme which fixed the number of members at a lower figure than 319. Mr. Cox's bill fixes the number at 307. Considerable expense will be incurred if the matter is not settled before the State Legislatures adjourn. The River and Harbor Appropriation Bill as amended passed the Senate on February 26th. The sum appropriated for the purpose of the Bill is eleven and a half millions.

Vigorous Efforts were made by an Influential section of the Republican party at Washington last week to amend the features of the Refunding Bill, to which the banks and business men are opposed. The Senate amendments were under consideration in the House Committee on Ways and Means, but an impression prevailed that it would pass in substantially the same state as when it previously left the House. The section which encounters the most determined opposition is the fifth, which requires national banks to replace the bonds now on deposit, which are paying the high rate of interest with the new bonds, which will only pay three per cent, and refuses them permission to deposit greenbacks instead. It is thus an enactment making the purchase of the new bonds compulsory on those banks which have a bank-note circulation. Should it pass in its present state an effort will be made to induce the President to veto the bill, although it is thought improbable that Mr. Hayes will venture on such a step at this juncture of affairs.

Intense Excitement in Wall Street was Produced on Friday last by an unusual financial stringency. The supply of money in the market was so small that the rates asked for advances were higher than at any time since the panic of 1873. The scarcity was caused by the action of national banks in various parts of the country who, alarmed by the provisions of the Refunding Bill as it now stands, desired, while opportunity remained, to deposit large sums in the treasury, to enable them to curtail or wholly withdraw their bank-note circulation. Over twelve million dollars were thus deposited in six days. The city banks for their own protection were compelled to call in the money they had lent to dealers, and to reject applications for new loans. Offers were freely made of a commission of one per cent per day in addition to the ordinary rate of interest. So stated, the rate does not convey a clear impression of the crisis; but when it is realized that the offer meant 371 per cent interest for the use of money and that that amount was actually paid in the New York market for advances, the stringency may be appreciated.

The difficulty of obtaining money prompted a general desire to realize securities at any price, and quotations fell with ruinous rapidity. Apprehension of serious financial disaster was prevalent, and rumors were circulated that heavy failures were imminent. The Secretary of the Treasury was notified by wire from New York that the financial situation was very threatening, and that, unless a large purchase of bonds was authorized, the result would probably be disastrous. Mr. Sherman had no desire to see his administration, now so near its close, associated with a panic, and although he has little sympathy with the action of Congress in the matter, he promptly took measures to relieve the prevalent anxiety. A dispatch was published at the sub-Treasury stating that the government would redeem bonds to a large amount on presentation, and the worst features of the situation were gradually allayed.

The actual relief effected by Mr. Sherman's announcement was not large, but its moral influence was enormous. It was accepted as an evidence that the Secretary would use all the means at his command to counteract the action of the banks, and a feeling of confidence soon took the place of alarm. The magnitude of the danger thus temporarily averted will doubtless operate as a warning to Congress against lightly experimenting with financial questions.

The Laws of South Carolina Indicate that a desire for social and moral reform is prevalent in that State. There are many Northern States in which such laws as have been passed in the Palmetto State might be introduced with advantage. Among these reforms are stringent laws against duelling, the restriction of the causes for which divorces may be obtained; the prohibition of all liquor licenses outside of incorporated towns and villages; and the discontinuance of railroad trains on the Sabbath, so that the railroad employés there are allowed to enjoy their rest day. If these laws are faithfully executed, South Carolina will be one of the model States of the Union.

Senator Carpenter of Wisconsin Died in Washington on February 24th. He had been suffering from "Bright's Disease" for more than a year, but had been able to attend to his professional and Senatorial duties until about three weeks ago, when he was prostrated by an attack of pneumonia, which aggravated his chronic complaint and ultimately proved fatal. Mr. Carpenter was born in Moretown, Vt., in 1824. He was first elected Senator from Wisconsin in 1869, but was not re-elected at the end of his term. He was again chosen after a severe electoral struggle in 1879. He was a man of very brilliant abilities, and many of his speeches elicited the commendation of our most eminent men. One of his best known efforts was when, in February, 1877, he appeared before the Electoral Commission as an advocate of the legal election of Mr. Tilden to the Presidency, giving his attention particularly to the Louisiana election. He disclaimed all political sympathy with Mr. Tilden, saying that he had voted against him and would do so again if he were a candidate, but he "believed that he was elected, and therefore appeared in the case."

A Gift of Two Hundred and Forty Thousand dollars was made last week in money and real-estate by Mr. George I. Seney, President of the Metropolitan Bank of New York, for the purpose of founding a hospital in Brooklyn. Mr. Seney placed the gift at the disposal of the Methodist Episcopal Church, wishing the new institution to be a Methodist General Hospital, but he stipulated that its benefits should not be confined to members of that Church, but be open to Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Roman Catholic, heathen and infidel on the same terms. Mr. Seney said, in the course of conversation with a reporter: "I suppose that other gentlemen will come forward in time and lend their hand in organizing this charity. I have given this money because I wanted to do good and because I believed that the time had come for our Church, in addition to building churches and endowing educational institutions, to do its share in hospital work. This is only one instance of Mr. Seney's well-known munificence. Only four weeks ago he gave $50,000 to found a library in Brooklyn, and he has previously given away enormous sums for other public purposes.

The Obelisk brought from Egypt to this country by Lieutenant Gorringe, was officially presented to the city of New York on Washington's Birthday by Secretary Evarts on behalf of the United States. It was presented to the government by the Khedive of Egypt, and the expenses of removal and erection in New York, amounting to $102,576, were defrayed by Mr. William H. Vanderbilt. On the medals struck to commemorate the occasion, the inscription states that the obelisk was "quarried at Syene, and erected at Heliopolis by Thothmeus III., and was re-erected at Alexandria under Augustus." Thothmeus III. is said to have flourished 3500 years ago, but the obelisk bears an inscription by a Pharaoh of later date, believed to have been the Pharaoh of the time of Moses. The companion obelisk to the one erected in New York was given to England, and three years ago was erected on the banks of the Thames. The obelisks were originally set up to commemorate the victories of the Egyptian monarchs.

An Effort to Suppress New York Gambling-houses has been inaugurated by President French, who called all the police inspectors and captains together at Police Headquarters on February 24th, and told them plainly that they must suppress gambling in any form in their precincts or take the consequences. Mr. French informed the captains they must make up their minds to do one of two things—either secure the evidence to convict gamblers or make their life such a burden that they would be glad to leave the city. The captain who failed to carry out this programme "might hereafter expect to get hurt." He would, in the judgment of the Board, have proved conclusively his unfitness for his position.

The Mormon Question has been Pressed upon the attention of the President-Elect by Governor Murray, of Utah, ex-Governor Woods, of San Francisco, and Judge McBride, of Salt Lake City, who went to Mentor at the invitation of General Garfield to give him full information regarding the state of affairs in Utah. Governor Murray is said to have presented his views clearly and strongly. General Garfield invited him to come to Washington after the inauguration for another conference on the subject. Governor Murray was a comrade-in-arms with General Garfield in the war for the Union, and their relations are those of cordial friendship.

An Interesting Effort to Promote Temperance reform has been made by the Selectmen of Brockton, Mass., who during the past year tried the experiment under the Excise law of controlling the sale of intoxicating liquors. One member of the Board took out a license, and no other licenses were granted. The licensed store was entitled "the Dispensary;" a competent person was engaged to carry on the business, and the establishment was opened under the direct supervision of the Board. No sales were made to be drunk on the premises, nor to drunken, partially drunken or irresponsible persons.

The report of the result issued by the Selectmen, states that drunkenness has decreased, and that the town has profited by the sale of liquor to the extent of $4505. There is no doubt that this and similar measures of modified reform prevent many of the evils of the drink traffic, but the cancer is too deeply rooted to be cured by any but thorough and more radical measures. The system tried at Brockton is a pet project of the English minister, Mr. Chamberlain, who has advocated it ineffectually in the British Parliament, and in his native town of Birmingham, England.

The Widow who a few Weeks ago Asked the prayers of the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of her wandering and almost ruined son, begs leave to return thanks to God for the return of that dear son in answer to the prayers offered. She also asks prayer that the lad's mind and health may continue to improve, and that he may again be a comfort and honor to his family, and be able to resist every temptation to sin.

A Sunday-school Teacher Died in his class Trenton, N. J., on February 13th. The First Presbyterian School of Trenton had just been opened with the usual devotional service when Mr. Wesley Titus, for many years a leading merchant in the city, died suddenly from heart disease. He had gone to the school, where he had been a teacher for many years, and just as he was about to commence teaching, he expired in the presence of his class. He was about sixty years of age.

Locusts in 1881.—The Following Curious facts in reference to these pests are given in the New York Observer: "There are two breeds of periodical locusts, one appearing once in seventeen years and the other once in thirteen years. The earliest appearance of the seventeen-year locusts in this country, so far as the records go, was in 1634, at Plymouth, Mass., and they have never failed to appear once in seventeen years ever since. Both breeds will appear this year, but not in the same localities. Professor Riley, the entomologist, says that the locusts will abound about June in Wisconsin, West Virginia, and probably in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. They may also appear, he says, in North Carolina, in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Westchester County, N. Y. The professor says that the thirteen-year brood will probably be seen in Southern Illinois, in Missouri, Louisiana, Arkansas, Indian Territory, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina. The two kinds of locusts differ very little in appearance.

Four Lunar Dogs is the Strange Subject of a telegraphic account of a spectacle visible at Denver, Col., on February 14th. The "dogs" are mock moons, an illusion produced by the light shining through a fleecy cloud in which are suspended multitudes of minute ice crystals. The first noteworthy appearance was that of a corona caused by the diffraction of the rays of light in passing between the globules of condensed vapor in the cloud, and the "dogs" appeared where the circles intersected. Four years ago, on December 23, 1876, a similar phenomenon was observed at Denver, except that it was then a solar halo, consisting of two concentric circles, with nine "dogs" or mock suns, and the spectacle was the admiration of the entire population.

A Gigantic Enterprise has been Undertaken, according to a telegram from Jacksonville, Fla., by a firm of contractors. They propose to reclaim twelve million acres of lake bottom and marsh land in Florida, and adapt it for sugar plantations. The Everglades, covering 3600 square miles, and Lake Okechobee, covering 700 square miles, form part of the region to be drained. The magnitude of the undertaking may be estimated by the fact that the area in question is nearly fourteen times the size of that which was reclaimed in the Netherlands of Europe by a system of dykes which is the wonder of the world.

Dancing as a Road to Vice.—A Methodist preacher recently stated at a ministers' meeting in Cleveland, O., that "a Roman Catholic bishop of New York, in conversation with a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, made the startling statement that the work of the confessional revealed the fact that nineteen out of every twenty women who fall and are lost can trace the beginning of their sad state to the modern dance."

A Minister's Degradation.—In an Address Dr. Fulton recently delivered, he said: It is not two years ago since he was invited to preach in a certain church in Jersey City. While in the company of the pastor he noticed that the latter's breath smelled of wine. He confessed that he had in disobedience to St. Paul's injunction to Timothy taken "a little wine for his stomach's sake." He was a most brilliant scholar and in every sense an ornament to the Church. But he had gone on from small beginnings till he had broken down the barriers of prudence and discretion one by one, and the end was not far off. He was soon reduced to a mental and physical wreck and went to San Francisco. Three weeks ago this unfortunate man called on Dr. Fulton begging for $5 to get his overcoat out of pawn. For months previously he had been sleeping in the very lowest and cheapest lodging houses in New York. Hundreds of other cases could be cited, Dr. Fulton said, were it not a work of supererogation. He did not think that any one was so inexperienced with the habits of man not to perceive the danger that lurked in the wine cup. The only safeguard to be found against its polluting power was to let it severely and entirely alone, and not by homœopathic and infrequent doses at the beginning to familiarize one's system and constitution with its stimulating sway, and in that manner lay the foundation for a life of misery, degradation and ruin. There should be no compromise tolerated with such a poisonous habit. A man should not tempt fate, and those who would lead abstemious lives should put the wine cup out of sight and out of mind completely and forever.

A Series of Revival Services will Commence at the Brooklyn Tabernacle on March 14th. Dr. Talmage announced on Sunday last that arrangements had been made with Mr. Philip Phillips, the singing Pilgrim, who has sung his way around the world, to assist in the work. There will be a corps of exhorters from the Tabernacle congregation who will deliver addresses and aid Dr. Talmage in the services, and Mr. Phillips will be assisted by a choir of two hundred voices. The first service will be held at a quarter to eight on March 14th, and will be repeated every evening as long as the Lord may indicate. This remarkable religious campaign will, it may be hoped, receive the blessing of God, and many earnest prayers are being offered that His Spirit may be poured out abundantly.

An Interesting Reminiscence in Connection with the late Hon. Fernando Wood, related by Rev. Joseph McKee, appears in The Christian Intelligencer. Mr. McKee was leaving his church in Sixth Avenue, New York, one Sunday after morning service during Mr. Wood's Mayoralty, when an elderly lady, who had been waiting on the sidewalk, stepped hastily up to him; and, said with deep emotion: "Reverend sir, I feel that I must stop and thank you for praying for my son to-day." Mr. McKee did not know the lady and asked for an explanation. She replied, "Why, my son—the Mayor of the city. Your prayer for him was such a comforting and strengthening reinforcement of my own. Oh, sir, if the ministers and Christian people would only all pray for him, I am sure it would strengthen him for his great responsibilities and temptations. He is the child of many prayers. And I want to thank you again, and to ask you to keep on praying for him."

An Ocean Patrol.—The Perils to which ocean steamers have been exposed during the present season, from which the utmost care and the best seamanship could not exempt them, leads the New York Times to suggest the preventive measure of placing steamers to patrol the great highway between this city and Liverpool. England and the United States, whose commercial interests are so greatly involved, could easily afford some such expedient to diminish the risk of ocean travel, and to relieve unexpected casualties, as well as the anxieties of those who have committed friends or treasure to the treacherous deep.

Another kind of patrol might also do much good. The frequent loss of precious souls in the busy life of our great cities suggests the thought of a city Christian patrol. Young men come from the country to make their fortune, but who suffer eternal loss, who might by the blessing of God be rescued if some kindly Christian man became their friend.

A Party of Children, One Hundred in Number, have been furnished with homes in the West by Mrs. John Jacob Astor through the agency of the Children's Aid Society. Seventy-six of them were sent to Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, and the remainder, who were large boys, were placed with farmers in Virginia. The whole number of homeless little ones thus provided for by Mrs. Astor is 813. The expense to her has been over $11,500.

A Portrait and Life of the Rev. Professor Broadus, D.D., of the Theological Seminary at Louisville, Ky., will appear in next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. Copies should be ordered through newsdealers, not directly from this office.

THE FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT: JOY.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, delivered on Lord's-day Morning, February 6, 1881.

"But the fruit of the Spirit is joy."—GALATIANS, 5 : 22.

A Right Royal Virtue—Total Abstainers from Joy—Despondency the Fruit of Indigestion—Joy the Genuine Fruit of the Spirit—I. It is Brought Forth—Ourselves, Witnesses—Proved by Church History—II. It is of a Singular Character—Ripens Under Remarkable Circumstances—Consistent with Conflict—Indescribable — Rational Joy — III. Experienced under Various Forms—In Hearing the Word—In Doctrine—In God—In Ordinances—In the Salvation of Others—In the Divine Will—A Joy in Rheumatism—In an Easy Conscience—In Anticipating the Coming of Christ—IV. Its Growth may be Checked—By Competing Joys By Unbelief—By Little Sins—Joy Lives at No. 2—V. It Should be Carefully Cultivated—Cruet-carriers—A Grandfather's Christmas Day.

OBSERVE, "the fruit of the Spirit," for the product of the Spirit of God is one. As some fruits are easily divisible into several parts, so you perceive that the fruit of the Spirit, though it be but one, is threefold, nay, it makes three times three—"love, joy, peace; longsuffering, gentleness, goodness; faith, meekness, temperance," — all one. Perhaps "love" is put first not only because it is a right royal virtue, nearest akin to the divine perfection, but because it is a comprehensive grace, and contains all the rest. All the commandments are fulfilled in one word, and that word is "love;" and all the fruits of the Spirit are contained in that one most sweet, most blessed, most heavenly, most God-like grace of love.

As for joy, if it be not the first product of the Spirit of God, it is next to the first, and we may be sure that the order in which it is placed by the inspired apostle is meant to be instructive. The fruit of the Spirit is love first, as comprehensive of the rest; then joy arising out of it. It is remarkable that joy should take so eminent a place; it attains unto the first three, and is but one place lower than the first. Look at it in its high position, and if you have missed it, or if you have depreciated it, revise your judgment, and endeavor with all your heart to attain to it, for depend upon it this fruit of the Spirit is of the utmost value. This morning, as I can only speak upon one theme, I leave love for another occasion, and treat only of joy.

I know some whom I am very far from despising, but whom on the contrary I greatly value, whose religion, sincere as I know it is, is sadly tinged with gloomy colors. They are afraid of assurance, for they dread presumption; they dare not speak of their own salvation with the certainty with which the Bible saints were wont to speak of it; they always say "I hope" and "I trust." They would seem to be total abstainers from joy; they are suspicious of it lest it should be carnal excitement or visionary hope. They hang their heads like bulrushes, and go mourning all their days, as if the religion of Christ knew no higher festival than a funeral, and all its robes were the garments of despair. Brethren, despondency is not the fruit of the Spirit. Make no mistake: depression is frequently the fruit of indigestion, or of satanic temptation, or of unbelief, or of some harbored sin, but "the fruit of the Spirit is joy."

Constantly looking within your own self instead of looking alone to Christ is enough to breed misery in any heart. I have also known gloomy expressions to be the fruit of affectation, the fruit of the unwise imitation of some undoubtedly good person who was of a downcast spirit. Some of the best of men have had a melancholy turn, but they would have been better men if this had been overcome. Imitate their many virtues: take the pot of ointment and pick out the dead fly. O my brethren, look well to it that ye bring forth the genuine, holy, sacred, delicious fruit of the Spirit, which in one of its forms is "joy."

I. In speaking upon this joy I shall notice, first, the fact that

IT IS BROUGHT FORTH.

We know this to be the fact because we our- selves are witnesses of it. Joy is our portion, and we are cheered and comforted in the Saviour. "What!" say you, "are we not depressed and sorrowful at times?" Yea, verily; and yet what Christian man or woman among us would make an exchange with the gayest of all worldlings? Your lot is somewhat hard, my brother, and sometimes your spirit sinks within you; but do you not count yourself to be, even at your worst, happier than the worldling at his best? Come, would you not take your poverty, even with your mourning, rather than accept his wealth with all his hilarity, and give up your hope in God? I am persuaded you would: you would not change your blessed estate for a monarch's crown. Well, then, that which you would not change is a good thing, and full of joy to your heart.

Brethren, we experience extraordinary joys at times. Some are of an equable temperament, and they are almost to be envied, for a stream of gentle joy always glides through their spirit. Others of us are of a more excitable character, and consequently we fall very flat at times. Ay, but then we have our high days and holidays, and mounting times, and then we outsoar the wings of eagles. Heaven itself can hardly know more ecstatic joy than we have occasionally felt; we shall be vessels of greater capacity there, but even here we are at times full to the brim of joy—I mean the same joy which makes heaven so glad.

Besides our own witness, the whole history of the Church goes to show that God's people are a joyful people. I am sure that if in reading the history of the first Christian centuries you are asked to point out the men to be envied for their joy, you would point to the believers in Jesus. There is a room in Rome which is filled with the busts of the emperors. I have looked at their heads: they look like a collection of prize-fighters and murderers, and scarcely could I discover on any countenance a trace of joy. Brutal passions and cruel thoughts deprived the lords of Rome of all chance of joy. There were honorable exceptions to this rule, but taking them all round you would look in vain for moral excellence among the Cæsars, and lacking this thing of beauty they missed that which is a joy.

Turn now to the poor,

and read inscriptions left by them in the catacombs; they are so calm and peaceful that you say instinctively—a joyous people were wont to gather here. Those who have been most eminent in service and in suffering for Christ's sake have been of a triumphant spirit, dauntless because supported by an inner joy: their calm courage made them the wonder of the age. The true Christian is a different type of manhood from the self-indulgent tyrant; there is almost as much advance from the coarseness of vice to the beauty of holiness as there is from the chimpanzee to the man.

Now, if in the very worst times God's people have been a happy people, I am sure they are so now. I would appeal to the biographies of men of our own day, and challenge question as to the statement that their lives have been among the most desirable of human existences, for they possessed a joy which cheered their sorrows, and sustained them in the hour of death.

With some Christians this fruit of the Spirit is perpetual, or almost so. I do not doubt that many walk with God as Enoch did throughout the whole day of their life, always peaceful and joyful in the Lord. I have met with some dear brethren and sisters of that kind whose breath has been praise, whose life has been song. How I envy them, and chide my own heart that I cannot always abide in their choice condition. It is to be accomplished, and we will press forward till we are "always rejoicing." But with others joy is not constant, and yet it is frequent.

David had his mourning times, when tears were his meat day and night, and yet God was his exceeding joy. How thankful we ought to be for the portrait of David's inner self, which is presented to us in the Book of Psalms. With all his down-castings, what joys he had: David was, on the whole, a joyous man. His Book of Psalms has in it lyrics of delight; the gladdest hymns that ever leaped from human tongues. David is, I believe, the type of a great majority of the people of God, who if not "always rejoicing" are yet often so.

Please to recollect that the utmost fulness of joy could hardly be enjoyed always in this mortal life. I believe that the human frame is not in this world capable of perpetual ecstasy. Look at the sun, but look not too long lest you be blinded by excess of light. Taste of honey, but eat not much of it, or it will no longer please the palate. Let your ear be charmed with the Hallelujah chorus, but do not dream that you could endure its harmonies all the hours of the day; before long you would cry out for eloquent pauses, and sweet reliefs of silence.

I was struck with the remark of Ebenezer Erskine when he was dying, and some one said to him, "I hope you have now and then a blink to bear up your spirit under affliction;" he promptly replied, "I know more of words than of blinks;" that is to say, he had rather trust a promise of God than his own glimpses of heaven; and so would I. The word of God is a more sure testimony to the soul than all the raptures a man can feel. I would sooner walk in the dark, and hold hard to a promise of my God than trust in the light of the brightest day that ever dawned. Precious as the fruit is, do not put the fruit where the root should be. Please to recollect that, Joy is not the root of grace in the soul, it is the fruit, and must not be put out of its proper position.

II. Secondly, this joy is

OF A SINGULAR CHARACTER.

It is singular for this reason, that it often ripens under the most remarkable circumstances. As I have already said, the highest joy of Christians has often been experienced in their times of greatest distress. Tried believers have been happy when smarting under pain, or wasting away with disease. Sick-beds have been thrones to many saints; they have almost feared to come out of the furnace, because the presence of the Lord in the midst of the fire has made it none other than the gate of heaven to their souls. Saints in poverty have been made exceeding rich, and when they have eaten a dry crust they have found a flavor with it which they never discovered in the dainties of their abundance.

It is a singular joy, too, because it is quite consistent with spiritual conflict. He that is an heir of heaven may cry, "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" and yet, ere the sigh is over, he may sing, "I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; struggling, yet always victorious; cast down, but not destroyed; persecuted, but not forsaken; troubled, and yet all the while triumphant; such is the mingled experience of the saints. Oh, this is the wondrous grace, this joy which can live side by side with conflict of the sorest sort.

This joy is special because at times it is altogether beyond description. One who was of a sober disposition called it "joy unspeakable and full of glory." "Full of glory!" That is a wonderful expression. A drop of glory is sweet, but, oh, to taste a joy that is full of glory—is that possible here? Ay, and some of us bear witness that it is so: we have felt joy that we dare not tell, and could not tell if we dared: men would turn again and rend us, condemning us as utterly fanatical or out of our minds if we were to cast these pearls before them; but, oh, if they could guess what delicious draughts are held within the jewelled chalice of divine communion they would be ready to wade through hell itself to drink from it. Our joy is altogether unspeakable joy at times.

One more singularity there is in it, for it is all the while solid, thoughtful, rational joy. The joy of the ungodly is like the crackling of thorns under a pot, noisy, flashy, but soon over. The ungodly man feels merry, but really if you come to look into his mirth there is nothing in it but flame without fuel, sparkle without solidity; but the Christian's joy is such that he has as much reason for it as if it were a deduction from mathematics. He has as just a right to be joyful as he has to eat his own bread: he is certain of his pardon, for God has told him that a believer in Christ is not condemned; and he is sure of his acceptance, for he is justified by faith. He knows that he is secure for Christ has given him eternal life, and said that His sheep shall never perish. He is happy, not for causes at which he guesses, but by infallible reasons plainly revealed in God's Word. This makes him joyful in the Lord when others wonder that he is so, for he perceives arguments for happiness which are unknown to the thoughtless crowd.

III. Thirdly, I would now refresh your memories, and by the help of the Spirit of God bring back former joys to you: this joy is EXPERIENCED UNDER VARIOUS FORMS.

Sometimes he experiences it in hearing the word: it is written concerning Samaria there was great joy in that city because Philip went down and preached the Gospel to them. Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound. However, joy of hearing lies in believing what you hear. We get joy and peace in believing. When you get a grip of the word, when the glad tidings becomes a message to your own soul, and the Spirit speaks it to your own heart, then you say, "Go on, man of God. Your sermon will not be too long to-day, for the Lord is laying it home to my soul." The reason why people grumble at long sermons often is because they do not feed on them. Very seldom the hungry man murmurs at having too big a meal.

But what joy there is, dear friends, in the salvation of God when we heartily receive it. Oh, how we bless the God of our salvation, and how we praise him that he hath saved us from our sins and from the wrath to come, by giving us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, by the sacrifice of His dear Son. Frequently we revel in the privileges of the covenant. The joy of my heart when I think of the doctrine of election is quite inexpressible. That hymn which begins—

"In songs of sublime adoration and praise,
Ye pilgrims to Zion who press,
Break forth, and extol the great Ancient of days,
His rich and distinguishing grace," is often with me, and makes my heart merry.

Then the doctrine of redemption, of which I tried to speak last Sabbath-day: how joyous it is! What bliss to know that the Redeemer liveth.

"Unto you that believe He is precious," and a fulness of joy flows forth at every remembrance of Him. Then that doctrine of justification is the marrow of joy. Oh, to think that we are just in the sight of God through Jesus Christ. All the doctrines of grace, especially that of final perseverance, are joyful truths. I protest that if you take final perseverance from me, you have robbed the Bible of one of its crowning attractions. Jesus has not given us a transient salvation, but His salvation shall be forever.

But, brethren, our grandest joy is in God Himself. Paul says, "and not only so, but we joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Oh, to think of the great Father! What a melting of spirit comes over the child of God if at midnight he looks up at the stars, and considers the heavens and cries, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him!" To think that He is not only mindful of us, but that He has taken us to be His sons and daughters! To feel the Spirit within our heart crying, "Abba, Father! Abba, Father!" Oh, this is joy in the profoundest sense.

How sweet to think of Jesus Christ the Son, the glorious incarnate God, the surety, the satisfaction, the representative, the all in all of His people. We joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Nor do we miss the joy of the Spirit, when we know that He dwells in us. He sanctifies us, comforts us, and guides us in the road to heaven. Oh brethren, this is a sea of bliss, the infinite deeps of the Eternal Godhead! Leap from all your miseries into this sea of glory. Plunge into the joy of your Lord.

This being so, we have a joy in all God's ordinances: "with joy do we draw water out of the wells of salvation." What a joy prayer is: I hope you find it so. The Lord hath said, "I will make them joyful in my house of prayer." And what a joy it is to get answers to our petitions, even as our Lord says, "Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." Has not your joy been full, till your eyes have been dim with tears and you have not hardly dared to tell how wondrously God has answered you? The mercy-seat is lit up with joy. What a joyous ordinance is that of praise! The amount of happiness felt in this Tabernacle when we have been singing unto the Lord can never be measured. For my own part, I have seemed to stand just outside the wall of the New Jerusalem joining in the hymns which are sung within the gates of the eternal city.

But I have scarcely begun the list yet, for we have a great joy in the salvation of other people. Perhaps one of the choicest delights we know is when we partake in the joy of the good Shepherd over His lost sheep, when He calls us together, for we also are His friends and His neighbors, and bids us rejoice that He has found the sheep which was lost. Especially do we joy and rejoice if the poor wanderer has been brought back by our means. The jewels of an emperor are nothing compared with the riches we possess in winning a soul for Christ.

Brethren, if we ever become perfect in heart, we shall joy in all the divine will, whatever it may bring us. I am trying, if I can, to find but I cannot get up to it yet. I have found a joy when it is over—I can reach that length—and I can and do bless God for any good result that may come of it; but when the pain is on me it is difficult to be joyous about it, and so I conclude that my sanctification is very incomplete, and my conformity to the divine will is sadly imperfect. Oh, the splendor of God's will! If a man were as he ought to be, God's will would charm him, and he would not wish for the smallest change in it. Poverty, sickness, bereavement, death, are all to be rejoiced in when our will is merged in the will of God.

What! Would you alter God's infinitely wise appointment? Would you wish to change the purpose of unerring love? Then you are not wholly reconciled to God; for when the head gets quite right the heart climbs where Paul was when he said, "We glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience." It needs a Samson to kill the lion of affliction, and you cannot get honey out of it until it is conquered; but we might all be Samsons if we would but lay hold on the strength of God by faith.

Dear brethren and sisters, the list of joys, which I am even now only commencing, contains the joy of an easy conscience, the joy of feeling you have done right before God, the joy of knowing that your object, though misunderstood and misrepresented, was God's glory. This is a jewel to wear on one's breast—a quiet conscience. Then there is the joy of communion with Christ, the joy of fellowship with His saints, the joy of drinking deep into Christ's spirit of self-sacrifice.

There, too, is the joy of expecting His glorious advent, when He and His saints shall reign upon the earth, and the joy of being with Him forever. The joy of heaven, the joy of which we have been singing just now. These joys are countless, but I will pause here and leave you to make a fuller catalogue when you are at home. May the Holy Spirit not only refresh your memories concerning old joys, but bring forth out of His treasury new delights that your joy may be full.

IV. I must notice, in the fourth place, that this fruit of the Spirit may be CHECKED IN ITS GROWTH.

Some of you may have muttered while I have been speaking of this joy, "I do not know much about it." Perhaps not, friend—shall I tell you why? Some people are too full of the joy of the world, the joy of getting on in business, the joy of a numerous family, the joy of health, the joy of wealth, the joy of human love, or the joy which comes of the pride of life. These joys may be your idols, and you know the joy of the Lord will not stand side by side with an idolatrous delight in the things of this world.

Our joy is sadly diminished by our unbelief. If ye will not believe neither shall ye be established. Ignorance will do the same to a very large extent. Many a Christian has a thousand reasons for joy which he knows nothing of. Study the Word and ask for the teaching of the Spirit of God that you may understand it; so shall you discover wells of delight. Joy is diminished, also, by walking at a distance from God. If you get away from the fire you will grow cold: the warmest place is right in front of it, and the warmest place for a believing heart is close to Christ in daily fellowship with Him.

It may be that sin indulged is spoiling our joy. "This little hand of mine," as Mr. Whitefield once said, "can cover up the sun as far as my eyes are concerned." You have only to lift a naughty, rebellious hand, and you can shut out the light of God Himself: any known sin will do it. Trifling with sin will prove a kill-joy to the heart.

I believe that many lose the joy of the Lord because they do not put it in the right place. See where it lives. Look at my text: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, and peace." There joy stands in the centre; "love" is on one side and "peace" on the other. Find a man who never loved anybody and you have found a joyless man.

He does not live in the right house for joy. Joy dwells at No. 2. "Love" is No. 1; "joy" is No. 2; "peace" is No. 3; and if you pull down either of the houses on the side, No. 2 in the middle will tumble down. Joy is the centre of a triplet, and you must have it so or not at all: "Love, joy, peace." Thus have I shown how the growth of joy can be checked. I pray you do not allow such an evil thing to be wrought in your heart.

V. But, lastly, it ought to be CAREFULLY CULTIVATED.

There is an obligation upon a Christian to be happy. Let me say it again: there is a responsibility laid upon a Christian to be cheerful. It is not merely an invitation, but it is a command—"Be glad in the Lord and rejoice, ye righteous." "Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, Rejoice." Gloomy Christians, who do not resist despondency and strive against it, but who go about as if midnight had taken up its abode in their eyes, and an everlasting frost had settled on their souls, are not obeying the commands of God. The command to rejoice is as undoubted a precept of God as to love the Lord with all your heart.

In this joyfulness you shall find many great advantages. Rejoicing will nerve you for life's duties. "The joy of the Lord is your strength." Hear how the sailors when they pull the rope will shout and sing, and work all the better for their cheery notes. I do not believe our soldiers would march to battle with half their present courage if they tramped along in silence. Beat the drums! Let the trumpet sound forth its martial note! Every man is eager for the fray while soul-stirring music excites him. Let your heart make music unto God, and you will fight valiantly for the kingdom of your Lord.

Holy joy will also be a great preventive. The man who feels the joy of the Lord will not covet worldly joy. He will not be tempted to make a God of his possessions or of his talents, or of anything else. He will say, "I have joy in God; these things I am very thankful for, but they are not my joy." He will not crave the æsthetic in worship, for his joy will be in God and his truth, and not in external forms. Some people's idea of joy in religion lies in fine singing, charming music, pretty dresses, splendid architecture, or showy eloquence. They need this because they do not know the secret joy of the Lord, for when that holy passion reigns within you may sit inside four whitewashed walls, and not hear a soul speak for a whole hour and a half, and yet you may have as intense a joy as if you listened to the most earnest oratory or the sweetest song.

Joy in God is suitable to our condition!

"Why should the children of a king Go mourning all their days?"

What are we at now, some of us? We have been hanging our harps on the willows: let us take them down; the willow boughs will bend. Thank God, we did not break the harps, though we did hang them there. Let us get into our right position; children of the happy God should themselves be happy.

Joy is certainly the best preparation for the future. We are going where, if we learn to groan never so deeply, our education will be lost, for melancholy utterances are unknown up there. We are going where, if we learn to sing with sacred joy, our education will be useful; for the first thing we shall hear when we get into heaven will undoubtedly be, "Hallelujah to God and the Lamb;" and if we have been joyful on earth we shall say,

"AH, I AM AT HOME HERE."

To enter heaven with a joyful soul is only to rise from downstairs to the upper chamber where the music knows no discord. It is the same song in both places, "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His blood."

Joy in the Lord will be very helpful to you as to usefulness. I am sure a Christian man's usefulness is abridged by dreariness of spirit. What nice Sunday-school teachers some Christians I know of would make! "Come ye children, hearken unto me, I will teach you the miseries of religion;" and the dear brother begins by telling the children about the Slough of Despond, and Giant Despair, and the Valley of the Shadow of Death. He wonders when he gets home that the dear children are not attracted to the ways of godliness. Are they likely to be?

A member of a church who has no joy of the Lord is little likely to encourage or influence others: they edge off from him. Even those who try to comfort him find it is to no purpose, and so they give him a wide berth. You hear him stand up to address an assembly of believers, to tell his experience, and after a very little of it you feel you have had enough. Those who drink wine will tell you that half a dozen drops of vinegar are more than they want in a glass of wine, and about wherever they go are not choice company. I do not find fault with gloomy souls, but they might be more useful if they could live more in the sunlight.

The joy of the Lord is the most injurious to Satan's empire of anything. I am of the same mind as Luther, who, when he heard any very bad news, used to say, "Come, let us sing a psalm, and spite the devil." There is nothing like it: whenever anything happens that is rough and ugly, and seems to injure the kingdom of Christ, say to yourself, "Bless the Lord, glory be to His name." If the Lord has been dishonored by the falling away of a false professor, or the failure of the ministry in any place, let us give Him all the more honor ourselves, and in some measure make up for all that has happened amiss.

And, lastly, holy joy is very pleasing to God. God delights in the joy of His creatures. He made them to be happy. His first and original design in the creation of all beings is His own glory in their happiness. When His people rejoice He rejoices. Some of you spent Christmas-day in the bosom of your families. Possibly you have a large family; ten or twelve were at home on that day, with a grandchild or two. I will tell you what was your greatest joy on that day: it was to see the happiness of your children, and to mark how they enjoyed what you had provided for them. They are only little children, some of them, creeping about on the floor, but they pleased you because they were so pleased themselves. The crow of a little child delights your heart to hear it, for it gives us joy to behold joy in those we love.

Suppose your sons and daughters had all come marching in on Christmas-day in a very gloomy state of mind, cold, loveless, joyless; suppose that they did not enjoy anything, but grumbled at you and at one another, you would be quite sad, and wish the day to be soon over, and never come again for the next seven years. Thus in a figure we see that our heavenly Father delights in the delight of His children, and is glad to see them grateful and happy, and acting as children should do toward such a Parent.

Now, brethren, rise as one man, and sing—

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry,
We're marching thro' Immanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

JOHN BOWLING, COACHMAN.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

WHAT a neat little turn-out it was, to be sure! I can see them now, though they passed up the road a good hour ago. It is not very often, out of half a hundred carriages and pairs, that one will cling to your memory beyond all the rest.

And John Bowling was conscious of it too, though, sly dog that he was, he pretended to be thinking of another subject altogether, and sat on the box with his eyes fixed straight before him, wholly engrossed in the management of his pair of horses.

I say, John Bowling, don't think to take us in like that. We know that a more self-conscious coachman never sat behind his horses. We know that with all your pretended ignorance you are not at all in the dark as to what folks are saying when they stop short and look so hard at your fine carriage, your splendid horses, and your grand portly self perched up there on the box. No, no, John; we know all about it—trust us.

And, to tell the truth, we are quite of your opinion, John, that if ever horses and carriage were made to match the coachman, yours are the horses, and yours the carriage. And since I fear we can't put any more conceit into you than you already have, we may as well out with it, and confess that for skill in handling the reins, few, if any, coachmen could surpass you, John Bowling; and if your master and mistress don't know it, they ought to be told of it without any delay. You're of more importance to their dignity, John, than they know, and it's only right they should thoroughly understand that you're a treasure—a perfect treasure, and a coachman not to be picked up every day of their life, though they have got so much money that they scarcely know what to do with it.

Who is John Bowling?

I will try to answer that question as briefly as I can, because it does not matter very much to my story who he was. Well, in the first place, he was the son of Tom Bowling, another coachman; the grandson of Phil Bowling, another coachman; and great-grandson of Nat Bowling, also a coachman. Indeed, tradition spoke of the attachment of the family to horses as dating much further back than this—even to the extent of saying that the very first of the race of Bowlings was a coachman: so is it any wonder that the last of the race should have been such a noble ornament to the box of a carriage?

In the second place, John was a bachelor. Of course he might have been married times out of number, and indeed would have been but for the difficulty of selection, since it was from no dislike to the matrimonial state that he kept single. The fact was, out of such a multitude of likely females, he felt utterly unable to make up his mind, and so finally gave it up in despair.

In the third place, he was entirely without relations. Few men can say that. He had had some in the coachmen line at one time, but they all seem to have met with an untimely end. One got thrown off the box and was killed; another died from the kick of a horse which, strange to say, had never before been known to lift his leg viciously; a third, caught cold while waiting for the family one bitter night outside a theatre; while the fourth and last got run over in some way never ascertained, as he never lived long enough to enlighten folk's minds. It may be worthy of remark that the only sympathy John Bowling got in his trouble was from his horses, who, in some strange way, seemed to know that their friend was low-spirited, for they rubbed their noses against him, and endeavored with special energy to express their sorrow for him.

Perhaps, if John had had relations, or had been a married man with a family of little children, he might have been saved from the public-house, the one great snare of his life. Mind, I don't say that it would have been so, for too many instances crowd in upon one's memory, telling quite an opposite story. I only say it might have been so.

When I say that John Bowling was a frequenter of the public-house, I wish it to be clearly understood that it was a very rare thing indeed that he was drunk. He was a drinker, but not a drunkard, at the exact period to which we are now referring.

Now my purpose in writing about John Bowling is not to give a sketch of his whole life, interesting though it would be, but to show from the various incidents of his daily life how his favorite public-house round the corner affected him, short of making his head reel and his legs give way under him. So, in a series of short chapters, I will endeavor to pursue this object.

"Drat these 'osses! what plaguy critters they are this evening. What's come over 'em I don't know. They're more perwerse than women, that they are; and here am I in a awful hurry too. Get up, here!"

John's helper was laid up with a bad hand, so that he had some extra work to do. It had made him very hot, and had compelled him to go round the corner at spare moments. He had just come in from such an errand, and was cleaning the horses preparatory to going out again.

To tell the truth, the horses weren't perverse a bit. When they did move in an unfavorable position for John, it was only natural, considering the rough treatment they were having. Poke a sponge into John's eye, and see how he would like it. Pull John's hair, as he was pulling the horses' manes and tails, and trust him for not starting and getting a bit angry.

Steady, John, steady!

"Well, I never," continued John; "they're getting quite wicious, I declare," when one of the horses, whose leg had come against the edge of the pail, gave a start of pain. "Come, I say, if you're rough, I'll be rough. I'll have none of yer nonsense. If yer think to come over John Bowling, you'll find yerself in a wrong box altogether. Get up, you brute!"

I'm sorry to say John's temper got so much better of him here, that he gave the poor horse a violent kick. Of course this only made matters worse; for, starting back, and coming in violent contact with the other horse, what wonder that he should give a plunge or two? John's passion now rose high, and grasping the whip which stood near, he belabored the second beast most unmercifully.

"You wixen, you—take that, and mind and behave yerself better for the time to come."

I say, John, how is it that your horses give you so much trouble only after your visits to the public, I wonder? How is it when you've got nothing aboard that they're so quiet and gentle and steady? Come, tell us now. Don't you think it possible, ever so little possible that a little bit, a very little bit, of the fault rests with you? Come, be honest. Depend upon it, John, it's the man's nasty temper, not the poor beast's, that makes the difference.

By and by John has to harness the animals. He has paid another visit to the public since, so that he finds this as difficult a task as the cleaning.

"What! in a temper still, you reptiles!" he exclaimed, as he rattled the straps and buckles under the senstive creatures' very noses, and ordered them here and there in the roughest manner possible.

No, John, your temper still, I'm sorry to say. Put a bit in your mouth and jerk it as you're now doing, and I wonder how you would take it.

By this time John was looking fiercely into the horse's eyes, trying, I suppose, to convict them of their extreme guilt; but with the real effect only of making them still more unsteady. A sharp blow on the nose of the most restless did not improve matters; or his "Ha! you brute," uttered as an accompaniment to the blow, for the horses pranced about wildly, vigorously shaking their heads.

John, John, you're the brute, not the horses. What do you mean by it? It's your own fault, every bit of it. Keep out of the public-house, man. That's the secret of it all.

As may be easily supposed, there can be but little said about John and his carriage. What is there to aggravate a man in a carriage? A carriage cannot answer back; a carriage cannot get obstreperous; a carriage cannot oppose anybody's will. So, from such a quiet, silent, easy-going thing as a carriage, whatever provocation could John Bowling receive?

But haven't my readers yet discovered that men in certain curious moods will fall out—and that rather than not fall out at all they will get into a passion with a carriage even? This was the kind of mood John often used to get into after a visit or so to the public.

Take just an instance. John's helper would not provoke him on this particular day, and would insist on doing everything in the most prompt and obedient manner possible. He could not therefore quarrel with him.

John's horses, too, had been most gentle, and had stoutly refused, too, to do anything to put John out, bearing their insults most meekly. John therefore could not pay them out with any show of justice.

But John's carriage gave him the opportunity, and set the gunpowder on fire. Would you believe it would not go into the coach-house? First one wheel would strike against the door, and then the other; and more than one attempt failed to make that carriage go where it was wanted.

Then came the explosion. John's temper rose with a vengeance, and vented itself, I am sorry to say, in a shower of oaths. As I cannot repeat them, I must leave John Bowling and his temper, simply saying,

"Poor John. Stupid John. Wicked John. What a sad pity you love the public so, John!"

"Well, this is a rummy place I've got into. I've heerd tell of such places afore, but never in all my born days have I seed it till now. It's always, 'John, drive here; John, drive there.' And, as if a man hadn't got enough to do in the driving line, they must go and make a postman of me, and be ever a sending me about delivering o' their letters. How ever I'm fool enough to stay, I don't know."

When John Bowling first took the "ribbons," a more obliging man never breathed. He was ready, aye glad, at a moment's notice, to do any mortal thing. And so little did he stand on ceremony that, however far removed from the coachman's duties any order might be, he did not scruple to do it. Sometimes men called him a fool for so doing, and urged him to stand up for his rights like a man; but instead of making him despise his own goodness of heart, this advice led to his despising his advisers.

"No, no," he would say, "it makes a man feel comfortable to do as much as he can. Folks as is for ever standing up for their rights, are rayther apt to be in the wrong sometimes."

This went on for a long time; and instead of getting less and less obliging he seemed to grow more and more so. The turn came all of a sudden, for, as soon as he took up with the public-house, he began to think of himself. And the more he took, the more he changed. His master could not understand it at all. And no wonder, for John was a puzzle even to himself. But so it was, as we have remarked, his disagreeableness, unwillingness to oblige, and discontent, were traceable solely to the contents of certain pint pots he had grown accustomed to raise to his lips at short intervals.

Once, when he had accompanied his master to the country where there was no public-house, he returned to his old self again, and was at everybody's beck and call without a murmur or a frown. That those were happy days too, even John had to confess; for say what men will about one's dignity, self-assertion, when carried too far, does not add a fraction to one's happiness. But no sooner had he returned to town, and dropped in at his old haunt round the corner than his bad temper returned too, and his grumblings recommenced with renewed energy.

"Here's these 'osses," he would say, "a being drove off their legs. Shame on it! How I'm going to keep 'em well, and make 'em look nice and natty with this everlasting drive, drive, drive, I should like to know very much. Put master and missus in harness, and I wonder how they'd look after a bit of this 'ere kind of work."

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.

February 25, 1881.

MONUMENTS.

Fernando Wood—Malediction Hushed at Death—Senator Carpenter's Death—The Cypress Sprigs in the Coronal—Death the Great Leveller—The Celestial Inauguration Day—The Erection of the Obelisk—Imperishable Monuments—The Material of Construction—Peter Cooper's Monument—Monuments Possible to the Poor—Two God-inscribed Epitaphs.

SINCE my last Friday night lecture on current events the body of Fernando Wood, Member of Congress from New York, has found its pillow of dust. There is something beautiful in the fact that at the decease of our public men the voice of detraction stops. My boyhood ears rang with anathematization of Fernando Wood. I cannot now remember what it was all about, and it makes no difference to my present purposes; but the lips, now smitten and unable to answer back, all common decency demands that no assault be made upon the departed.

It is only swine that uproot a graveyard. All good-hearted men agree that if you have anything to say, say it while arm and voice and foot are competent for retort. Indeed, it is a eulogy on our whole slandered human nature that a halo is very apt to gather around the departed as they recede. We begin to put generous construction upon actions for which we once had only malediction, and after a while we contribute generously to build a monument to those who were the subjects of our bitter denunciation.

If we thus sometimes have to eat our words off the marble tablet of our public servants, perhaps we had better be a little more lenient in our criticism of the living. The discord between our ante-mortem scarification and our post-mortem eulogy would not be so remarkable. Fine monuments of polished Aberdeen granite cannot correct injustices done to public men. You see the departed cannot get up to read the complimentary epitaph overhead. By all means repudiate the wrong-doing of public men, but remember that the difference between them and you may be a mere difference of opinion, and do not conclude that the fact that a man votes opposite to you, and acts opposite to you, is overwhelming proof of his scoundrelism. Did it ever occur to you that he no more differs from you than you differ from him. But it is well that if detraction will not cease before, it shall at any rate stop when against its hard visage slams the iron gate of the tomb.

Hardly had the obituary of the member of the Lower House of Congress been written than the telegrams of the Associated Press announced the decease of a distinguished Senator, Matthew Carpenter. At the time that Washington is building its triumphal arches for the new President, another chair in the national councils is draped in black. So they come, and so they go. Death is a jealous old tyrant, and he will not consent to allow the living to have all the honors. There shall be sprigs of cypress amid the coronals. The huzza shall be preceded by the lamentation, and the grand march by the dirge.

We shall be brought down to the same level after a while—czar and serf, emperor and coolie, senator and the plainest voter, president and citizen. The inequalities of this life are struck through with brevity. It is only a question for the clocks and watches to decide. So many revolutions of the wheel, and so many strokes of the hammer. But the inequalities this side are not more brief than the inequalities on the other side are prolonged. In proportion as in this world we have been unselfish and useful and Christ-like, we shall there take precedence.

The Bible says as one star differeth from another star, Mars from Jupiter, so shall we differ hereafter. But many a man with one talent will outshine those with five talents, and seven talents, and ten talents. God will take into consideration what our capacity was, and how near we came to doing the best we could. Many of those who were at the head here will be at the foot there. Some of those who stood in pulpit and chancel here will be fortunate if there they get the last seat back by the door. Some who on earth were considered nobodies will there take the place of celestial chiefs.

"Where are you going?" we will say to some one whom we on earth considered perfectly insignificant, and the soul will reply, "I am going up to take one of the thrones to which I have just now received an invitation." And we will stand and look and see him moving on and up, and on and up, until he has gone clear out of our sight in heavenly preferment. That will be Inauguration Day surpassing in pomp all that will be seen next Friday at the National Capital. Some of you will be the heroes and the heroines.

Among the events of the week is which, having come across land and ocean, and by long teams drawn, has at last reached its destination, where it will remain an adornment to Central Park, a suggestion to the scholarly, and a signet of international brotherhood. I think it will do us all good to feel that past ages from the top of this obelisk are looking down upon us. In this country we have but little of the venerable in architecture, or painting, or sculpture, or monument. That which has stood a hundred years excites our awe; but lo! here is something that has the solemnity and the impressiveness and the majesty of thousands of years. The Government of Egypt did well to present it, Commander Gorringe did well to transport it, William H. Vanderbilt did well to advance the means for the completion of the undertaking, and the $85,000 expended were a grand investment in behalf of the historical intelligence of this nation.

But where are the quarrymen who hewed it out of the earth? Where are the sculptors who cut it into shape? Where are the scholars who ordered the inscriptions? Where are the orators who proclaimed at its first uncovering. Once it was insensate stone, and they were living men. Now they are the speechless, and it is the eloquent. It tells of the passing generations, of the evanescent nature of human authority, of imperial ambitions now forgotten.

Solemn old obelisk! The waves of eternity past strike against one side the cold column, and the waves of eternity to come beat against the other side the column. But even that shall crumble away. Time has a chisel with which he will obliterate every inscription and clip away all symmetry, and the mandate which has left the Coliseum in ruins, and the Pantheon only a guess of what it once was, shall say to the obelisk, as it will say to those who last Tuesday celebrated its coming into right position, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

But there are

MONUMENTS THAT NEVER PERISH.

The longer they stand the grander their proportions and the mightier and brighter their inscriptions. I mean the monuments built out of hearts comforted, out of sorrows appeased, out of hunger fed, out of tyrannies demolished. When that white and holy shaft is uncovered it will be amid an orchestra of nations saved, and the eulogy of Him who will say: "I was hungry and ye fed me, I was naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and in prison and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it to me." Higher or lower, we all have opportunity of building for ourselves such a monument. It will not have the coldness of granite, but the warmth of eternal sympathies. Ten thousand years, instead of erasing, will only augment its grandeur. The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance.

What were the obelisks and the pyramids as monuments to commemorate the Pharaohs and Rameses of the earth, compared with the monument of culture and benevolence on Eighth Street, New York, built by the munificence of Peter Cooper, the ninetieth anniversary of whose birthday has just been celebrated. The most venerable and honored man of New York. At the time when such charities were not common, he did for the education of the poor that which has inspired innumerable charities all the land over.

He will need no monument in Greenwood. He will require no statue in the public square. He will ask no favor of obelisks. He has opened the gate of New York to many who have passed into useful lives, and he will keep the golden gates open for multitudes to come. All benedictions on his name. May the Lord permit us to celebrate his centennial. Heaven can do without him a good while longer, for it has many of the useful and good; but New York has only one Peter Cooper. Far distant be the day when we shall miss him from our banquets and our charitable platforms! I do not know what his religion is, but a religion that educates the ignorant and blesses the poor, and elevates the morals of a city is a good enough religion for this world, and I think will have a brilliant prospect for the next. Cooper Institute is worthy fifty Egyptian obelisks.

But do not let us be discouraged because we cannot build our monuments of usefulness on a large scale. If, according to the divine announcement, he who gives a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple, shall receive a disciple's reward, then every encouraging word uttered, every Gospel invitation given, every lift of the helpless over hard places, every prayer offered, every deed done, however insignificant to human sight, will be everlastingly honored and remembered by the Lord long after the granite of the cemeteries has fallen, and the obelisks of antiquity shall have been swallowed up in the last earthquake of a foundering world.

As far as I remember, God in the Bible wrote only two epitaphs, the one over a man who had lived for himself—"Thou fool;" the other over a plain woman, whose tribute of love to Him offended His disciples, "She hath done what she could." *

MR. MOODY ON CHURCH FAIRS AND THEATRE-GOING.

DURING his recent meeting in San Francisco, Mr. Moody made answers to written questions that were submitted to him. We quote two of the questions and answers from the Watchman:

QUES. Do church fairs and suppers help the finances of the church?

ANS. In the long run they don't; they hurt them. I never knew a church fair in my life that some one didn't get his feelings hurt. I believe they grieve the most spiritual of every church, and you can't afford to grieve those who have the most power with God. They bring in a profane element. Men of the world—scoffers—will tell you they have paid fifty cents to help the church. They have probably paid fifty cents for an oyster stew that cost the church forty cents, and the Church of God has made ten cents on the operation. I think it is very small business.

Then the way they are conducted is very objectionable. The idea that you can go around to the sanctuary, and by giving twenty-five cents vote who is the handsomest lady in town! And this in the house of God! I tell you we have gone so far in this respect that we don't know where we are. In one place I remember its being given out that any man might go in and kiss the handsomest woman there for twenty-five cents. And yet you wonder that the world scoffs at the church!

QUES. What do you think of a Christian's going to theatre?

ANS. Go, if you can do it for the glory of God. You can go to the theatre, dance, or anything else that you can do to the glory of God. That is the test. If you are sincerely converted and filled with the regenerating influence, you won't want to go. God don't set any of these things before you and say you shall not go; but he offers you something better, so that you don't want them. I never desire these things, because God gives me something that makes me happier than they could, and if you are His child, you won't want these things.

A question in regard to dancing was answered in the same way. A man in Scotland, who was a distiller, asked me to prove from the Bible that his business was wrong. I quoted to him the requirement to do all to the glory of God. I told him that if he could kneel down by each barrel of whiskey and ask God to make it a blessing to the world, then his business was right. But if he couldn't do that, then his business was wrong.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

The Sceptic's Sick Wife.

"WE must not be sorry when God's chisel is at work upon us," Mr. Stanley said, gently; "for him it is great gain, and for me—"

"For you?" I asked, for he seemed as if he did not like to go on.

"For me it is a hard bit of discipline; the Master Builder's tools have cut very deep, but it is all right. I ought not to be sorry, ought I?"

"I see what you mean," I said; "but are we not told to be 'sorrowful, yet always rejoicing?' Don't you think it is a comfort that the two are put together?"

"Yes," he said, thoughtfully, "I see; He does not blame us for being sorry, so long as we sorrow not as others which have no hope. 'Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing;' thank you so much for the thought."

I fancied that he had a tear in his eye as he spoke, but I could not be sure, for a minute afterward Sir William entered the room, and then he seemed as cheerful and full of spirits as he had always been while we were travelling together.

"So you never got my letter!" he said to Sir William. "I am very sorry; but I gave it to a dragoman whom I knew pretty well, and whom I met at the Jaffa Gate. He was not a Jerusalem dragoman, but one who had come with some people from Cairo, and he promised me to deliver it at once. He must either have forgotten it, or, Arab-like, he conveniently lost it, but took care not to lose the 'baksheesh' I gave him at the same time. Well, it does not signify now."

"Oh, no," said Sir William, "of course not; only that fellow deserves to hear of it again. But how was it they knew nothing of your telegram at the Convent?"

"I met the man in the street bringing it, just after I left you, Miss Lindsay. He knew me by sight, and handed it to me at once, and then I just hurried back to the Convent and told them I must leave that morning; but I had neither time nor inclination to enter into particulars with them."

When the gentlemen came into the drawing-room after dinner, Mr. Stanley brought out a number of splendid photographs of Jerusalem and its neighborhood which he had bought in London, and had brought with him to show us.

Sir William was engrossed for some time in an interesting debate which he had just found in the Times newspaper; but Evelyn explained the Jerusalem photographs to Lord Moreton, and Mr. Stanley sat by me and pointed out the different places that we had visited together.

There was one beautiful view taken from the Mount of Olives, just at the turn of the hill where we had stood to look down upon Jerusalem.

We looked at this photograph a long time; I thought it more beautiful than any of the others. Jerusalem stood out clear and bright in the sunshine; each house, each mosque, each dome was standing out before us almost as distinctly as we had seen it on that lovely evening when, like our Lord and Master, we had beheld the city and wept over it.

"I shall never look at that photograph," said Mr. Stanley, "without thinking of those words: 'Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which I had lost.' Do you remember who said them to me there?"

"Yes," I said; "that was a very pleasant ride."

"Are the olive-leaves safe yet?" he asked, in a low voice.

"Oh, yes," I said; "did you think I would lose them?"

"No, I did not think so; but I wanted you to tell me, that was all."

How much there was to talk of during those few days, and how many times we said the words, "Do you remember?" I have heard it said that when we use those three words it is a proof that we are talking to friends and not to strangers. To strangers we can never say, "Do you remember?" but to friends, to those who have gone side by side with us along any part of the pathway of life, how often we say to them, "Do you remember this?" "Do you remember that?" And how pleasant it is to recall first one thing and then another in the past, and to talk it over together!

I think this will be one of the pleasures of heaven. We shall often there, I think, use those three words, "Do you remember?" as we go over together in memory all the way that the Lord our God has led us, and as we recall the many proofs of His love, His goodness, and His wisdom, that we enjoyed together on earth.

It was the last evening of Lord Moreton's and Mr. Stanley's visit; the next day they were to leave us for the North.

We were wandering about the lovely gardens of Alliston Hall, gathering fresh flowers for Evelyn's sitting-room, for I would never let any one else arrange the flowers there.

Lord Moreton was very anxious to see a new and very rare shrub that Sir William had had planted at the other side of the gardens, and Evelyn went to show it to him.

Mr. Stanley and I stopped behind, for he complained of feeling tired, and I had not finished gathering my flowers.

"I am so sorry we are going to-morrow!" he said.

I did not answer him, but bent over the bed to gather a beautiful white lily of the valley.

"But I shall not disappear so suddenly and mysteriously this time," he said.

"No, that is a comfort," I said, involuntarily, and then felt very angry with myself for having said it.

"Why is it a comfort?" he asked; "was my leaving Jerusalem any trouble to you?"

"Yes," I said; "of course I was sorry. I did not like Sir William to doubt you."

"I am very glad you trusted me through it all," he said.

I was gathering some more lilies, so I did not look up till he spoke again, and then he only asked me a question, and I do not remember that I ever answered it:

"Will you trust me through life, May?" he said.

We often speak of "learning by contrast;" and, surely, some of our most forcible lessons, those which we never forget, are learned in this way.

I had been about three months in my new home, and I had always felt that it was the happiest place on earth, and yet, although I thanked God for giving it to me, every morning and evening, when I said my prayers, still I do not think I ever realized how happy it was until that Monday night.

For Monday morning's post had brought me a letter, written in pencil and almost illegible. I did not recognize the writing, and therefore glanced to the end, and I was very much surprised to see the signature—Alice Ellis.

Yes, the letter was from Claude's wife. It was a very short one. I turned to the beginning, and read as follows:

"MY DEAR MRS. STANLEY: I want to ask a great favor of you. Will you come and see me, as soon as you can after you get this letter? I want very much to speak to you; there is something that I want to ask you.

"I am very ill, so please forgive this untidy note, for I am writing it in bed. Do come at once, if you can.

"Please forgive me for asking you.

"Believe me, dear Mrs. Stanley,

"Very sincerely yours,

"ALICE ELLIS."

We do not live very far from London; it is only about an hour's journey, so I went by the next train. I wondered very much why Alice had sent for me, and what she wanted to ask me.

When I arrived in London I took a cab to the address she had given me on the letter. The cabman drove for about a mile through a dirty and dismal part of the great city, and then he stopped before a high dismal house, in the midst of a row of high dismal houses, which was confronted, on the opposite side of the street, by another row of houses just as high and just as dismal.

I dismissed the cabman and rang the bell. The door was opened by an untidy servant, with no cap or collar on, but wearing a very dirty, ragged apron. She showed me into a room the windows of which looked out into the narrow street, and asked me to sit down while she went to tell "the folks up-stairs" that I had come.

The room was shabbily furnished and smelled strongly of tobacco, and the atmosphere was close and stifling, as if the windows had not been opened for a long time.

Was it possible that Claude and Alice were living here, or had I made a mistake in the address? I referred to the letter in my pocket, and found I was correct as to the name of the street and the number of the house, and, certainly, the girl who had admitted me had said that Mrs. Ellis lived there.

But oh, how forlorn and dreary everything looked! I was quite glad when a slipshod footstep was heard on the stairs, and a sullen-looking girl of about fourteen years old came in, and asked me to come up-stairs to "missus." She took me into a bedroom at the very top of that high house, and there, lying in bed and looking fearfully ill, I found Claude's wife, Alice.

She welcomed me very warmly, and thanked me, again and again, for coming so soon; but I could hardly hear what she said, for her baby, who was lying on the bed beside her, was crying so loudly, and her every effort to pacify him was in vain.

"Jane, you can take baby into the next room," she said to the girl; "he is so fretful! Does not he look ill?" she added, turning to me.

I took the child in my arms; he was dreadfully thin, and had a careworn, wasted face, more like that of an old man than of a baby three months old.

"Poor little fellow!" I said.

"Yes," she said, with a sigh; "I almost wish sometimes that he would die."

"Oh, Mrs. Ellis," I exclaimed; "you don't mean that."

"Yes, I do," she said bitterly; "I had rather that he died before I do. Take him into the next room, Jane!"

The girl took the child from me and went away, leaving the door open behind her.

"Would you mind shutting the door?" said Mrs. Ellis; "she always will have it open. And then I can talk to you comfortably; we shall feel quite safe. I have been wishing to see you for more than a week," she went on; "ever since I knew that I was so ill. Oh, Mrs. Stanley, I am so utterly miserable."

"I am very sorry to find you so ill," I said.

"Yes," she said, "I am very ill, and I shall never be well again. The docor says I am in a rapid decline. It is trouble which has brought it on; you will have heard what trouble we have had."

"Miss Richards told me something about it, when I was with her, a few months before she died," I said.

"Yes, all my money has gone; every farthing of it. My father made some mistake about it, and the investments failed, and we lost it all. And Claude is so angry about it; he says my father has deceived him, and he is just as vexed as if it were my fault; he has not seemed to care for me a bit since then. But I did not mean to speak of that. I don't want to complain. It is natural, I suppose, that he should be vexed. He thought we were rich, and we went on spending a quantity of money, and then, when this came out, all the people sent in their bills, and now all Claude's money has gone too. I don't know what will become of us!"

"And you look so ill," I said; "you ought to be taken care of, Mrs. Ellis."

"Oh," she said, "I don't mind so much for myself; it is poor little baby that makes me so unhappy. He cries so much, and that girl is so very careless with him. Old Mr. Ellis is very kind; he wants me to go there, but Claude won't hear of it: I don't know why. We could not live at all if it were not for Claude's father; he is always sending him money."

"But could you not be moved into a more comfortable lodging than this?" I asked.

"I'm afraid not. It is very dirty and untidy; but you see they are good in one way, they do not hurry us about paying them, so it seems a pity to move. But I did not send for you to tell you all our troubles, Mrs. Stanley," she said; "I wanted you, if you could, to help me to get a little comfort."

"In what way?" I asked, for I wanted to hear what she would say.

"Do you remember a conversation we had together when I stayed at Alliston Hall, Mrs. Stanley? I told you then that I always tried to laugh trouble away, and you said—do you remember what you said?"

"What was it?" I asked.

"You said that there were some troubles that could not be laughed away. Those troubles have come to me now; I can't laugh now, Mrs. Stanley. But I wonder if you remember what else you said that day; you told me that you never tried to laugh troubles away, but you always prayed them away. Oh, if I could only do that!"

"Do you believe in prayer, Mrs. Ellis?" I asked.

"Yes, I do," she said earnestly; "I do now. I used to laugh at it when Claude laughed at it, and I used to try to think it was all nonsense. But the other day the doctor was here, and I said, 'Doctor, please tell me the truth; shall I ever get well again?' And the doctor said, 'I am afraid not, Mrs. Ellis.' Then I asked him how long he thought I should live, and he said, 'perhaps a month or two.' And then he went away.

(To be concluded.)

THE SINNER'S FRIEND.

S. S. Lesson for March 13th, Luke 7: 36–50. Golden Text, Luke 19; 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day indicates Christ's vocation upon earth, "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." It is just in proportion as we recognize ourselves to be "that which was lost, that we understand the greatness and the sureness of Christ's redemption. All which sin has touched has been lost, the eyes, ears, tongue, hands, feet, which have served under sin are lost members, diverted from their true purpose. The Son of Man is come to seek them again and save them for His use. He stands between fallen man and perdition, fallen man and despair. Wherever we are conscious that anything or any person is lost, there is the place, the willingly chosen place of the great Redeemer. In their ignorant sinful pride, men have trodden on those whom they have thought to be lost, those who are morally lost to society, the drunkards, criminals, and the fallen, and common opinion gives them no hope of rising again, but treats them as utterly hopeless. And it is these whom Jesus came to seek and to save.

Speaking to the shepherds of Israel God speaks as He well might speak to spiritual and temporal rulers in our own day, and says, "The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost; but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them. And they were scattered, because there is no shepherd: . . . and none did search or seek after them" (Ez. 34: 4–6). But later in the same chapter He says (ver. 11), "For thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out." "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick."

Blessed be God He made the world out of nothing, and when a poor lost soul is willing to be nothing, God is at no loss to create that soul anew, and His workmanship in terrestrial or in spiritual things is ever perfect; "And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold it was very good" (Gen. 1: 31). Thus we need never to look upon a fellow-creature, however degraded, as being beyond all hope; "With men this is impossible; but not with God, for with God all things are possible" (Matt. 19: 26). Let a few Christians filled with the Holy Ghost go out in God's Name among the lost ones, and bring them in contact with Him who is come to seek and to save them, and the most hopeless cases are conquered by the mighty power of an almighty God. The results of the Salvation Army work is proof solid of this.

Jesus had just repeated the reproach made to Him that He was a friend of publicans and sinners, the imputation was that their sin was an attraction to Him, that His tastes accorded with theirs, for they who accused Him had no conception of doing anything, or of seeking the society of anybody, except for self-interest. Knowing their thoughts of Him, the Lord Jesus entered into the house of a Pharisee who had desired Him to eat with him. Scarcely was He entered when a well-known sinner of the city, knowing that He was there, came and sought Him out. A man who lived for himself might have thought, "How unfortunate that this poor woman should come just now, it will justify the untrue remarks which are made about me," and he might have avoided her. But it was Christ's vocation to seek and to save the lost. Jesus never avoids those who make a claim on Him. He says "Him that cometh unto me, I will in nowise cast out."

The poor woman sought only Jesus, was occupied with none other, neither the Pharisee nor the other guests were anything to her. Remarks were going round, she heard them not, glances were cast, but she saw them not. She was lost, this she knew, and in Him there was salvation for such as she. What was all the world to her by the side of the Saviour? "Oh," you say, "if we saw other sinners as far advanced as that we could believe they would be saved." Brethren in Christ, are we bringing Jesus near to them by the Christ-like position which we take in respect to them? Do they see in us nothing but love and a heart yearning to shelter them from their sin? or do they find us full of suspicion and of condemnation? Oh, it is too true that often these degraded ones are so untruthful we know not what to believe of what they say. But it is a fact that the more we approach them in the spirit of the Lord Jesus, the more God gives us discernment that we may discover when they are untrue, and more power of His presence to awe them into reality. Were not the degraded ones with whom Jesus had to do, at least as degraded as those whom we meet with? But in His presence, all must be real. Let us, by our habitual standing before Him, make them conscious that He is present, and it will become impossible for them to deceive us.

The poor sinner stood at Jesus' feet behind Him weeping, and she perceived a service which she might render Him, she began to wash His feet with her tears, and to wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed His feet and anointed them with the ointment. He did not draw His feet away. Others might have thought that the tears of such an one tainted them, they might have considered what would be thought and said of their proximity to such an one, but the Master put Himself and His own reputation out of the question. He saw and rejoiced over the broken heart, and maybe there was more of oneness between her who wept for her own sin and Him who wept for the world's sin, than among any other members of the company.

The Pharisee's only idea of a sinner was to condemn him. Tenderness or pity toward those who had erred would never occur to him, he would think it an encouragement to sin. Forgiveness was far from his thoughts, his religion consisted in just retribution; the woman was a sinner, an outcast, let her be treated as one; and he judged that Jesus was no prophet because He tolerated the woman's presence. But He to whom the hearts of all men are open, answered the thoughts of Simon by the parable of the two debtors, as though to say, "Simon thou thinkest that thy debt to God is tenfold less than this woman's, that she owes five hundred pence, and thou but fifty. Yet if thy debt and hers are both forgiven which will most love Him who extends you pardon? In this woman there is proof of love, "I entered into thine house, thou gavest Me no water for My feet; but she hath washed My feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman has anointed My feet with ointment. Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little."

What words for the broken-hearted sinner! "Her sins which are many are forgiven," the lost one was found and saved. The coming fact of Jesus' death for her sin was already accomplished in the eyes of a God who sees the end from the beginning. Her sin met with its retribution when the Son of God cried in the anguish of His soul, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me." The lost one, because she was nothing, came nearer to God than the man who had never sinned so deeply, because her cause was undertaken by the great Redeemer. He said unto her, "Thy sins be forgiven thee, and she had the word of the Son of God for it, against all condemnation of her own heart, against all the horrors of her past experience, against all doubts which the wicked one might inject she could say, "Jesus said to me, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee.'" She believed in His authority over sin, and He added "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace."

Oh, how slow man is to believe that we are saved by grace through faith and that not of ourselves (Eph. 2: 5)! "Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace but of debt," i. e., so much wages for so much work: "But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." How could this poor lost woman by any human means restore the evil she had done, how undo it, how make satisfaction for it? Impossibility meets us at every step. But when He whose law she had broken, undertook to make the satisfaction demanded by the law which He had made, what appeal could be made from His decision? They that sat at meat with Him could not understand the grace of the Lord Jesus, tens of thousands among nominal Christians do not understand it now, but the poor sinner understood it, and she left the Pharisee's house whiter than snow, for the blood of Jesus Christ had cleansed her from all sin. Can we believe that she went forth to sin again? or can we believe that henceforth she would be in a position to boast? The link of necessity which existed between her hopeless helplessness and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, was her security. She was pledged by her nothingness, and He by His fulness, that she should not continue to sin. Had she been left to her own resolutions or her own efforts there would have been little hope of her leading another life, but another power had entered into her life, a power which had grappled with sin and conquered it, Christ lived in her, and He was her Guarantee against sin, and the world, and the flesh.

When Jesus said to her, "Go in peace," He never could have contemplated her return to the slavery of sin; and therefore, dear reader, if you think that some power of sin which binds you is too strong to be broken, if you think that because of some extenuating circumstance you are not very culpable, or if you try to persuade yourself that sin is not sin, you are alienating yourself from the world's Redeemer, and ensuring your own failure; because you withold you case from Him who "came to seek and to save that which was lost." There is no reason why any foreign power should retain dominion over us, since Jesus is mightier than all the power of the enemy, but oh, how many there are who idly pray about their sins, without fairly having the matter out with Him, they never come to a point in which they let Him show them where the hindrance lies, they fight shy of coming to close quarters, it is more to their interest to avoid coming to a point, because they are not quite decided to abandon all sin, or even to allow that it is sin, they dread letting the reins of their life out of their own hands, and thus they never fairly put their case into the hands of Jesus; it answers their purpose better to pray, and then to have it to say that the Lord does not answer them, because they have no real intention to break definitely with their sin. Should such be among my readers, let me say that although Christ is the Friend of sinners, He is not the Friend of sin, and as long as you take the part of your sin against the Saviour you hinder Him from being your Friend.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Crushing Disaster has Fallen on the British army in South Africa. General Sir G. P. Colley telegraphed on Saturday night, February 26th, that he had occupied Majela mountain, a position overlooking the Boer Laager. Another telegram followed, saying that with six companies he had taken possession of Spitzkop, a position to the left of Laingsnek. This was followed by another telegram, dated Sunday, which said: "A severe engagement took place to-day between the Boers and General Colley's force and the latter was driven from its position at Spitzkop. There was great loss on both sides. Many British officers were killed and wounded." A later telegram from Colley's camp said that all the wounded coming in agree in reporting that General Colley has been killed and that only 100 British have escaped. The Boers charged up the hill four times and were about to retreat, when the British were forced to retire because the reserve ammunition had not been taken to the extreme summit.

"The Experience of a Landlord who has Undergone the process of "Boycotting," is published in the London Standard. Mr. Bence Jones, writing to that journal, details the miseries of the infliction, which, he says, "no one who has once experienced will face again." He purchased an estate and sunk a large amount of capital in its improvement, and his arrangements with his tenants were of the most amicable character. He refused some of the demands of the local Land League, and was Boycotted in consequence. He fought the battle with the League, and baffled its plots, but the ordeal was a very severe one.

He asserts that not only large proprietors but numbers of small ones are leaving the country, and is confident that the reform measures contemplated by the Government will put a stop to all landlords' outlay of capital in Ireland and to the residence there of all who can get away His conclusion is that "more industry and more honesty can alone improve the condition of the tenants, and that to fix bad tenants in their farms—idle, indolent, drunken men—is to fix more firmly the worst evils we have." Mr. Jones states that the leaders of the League which Boycotted him, were two priests, and these men induced his laborers to leave his employ by threats and promises.

An Accident to the British Premier Occurred on the night of February 23d. Mr. Gladstone, in alighting from his carriage on his return home from the House of Commons, slipped and fell backward, cutting the back of his head severely on the iron step of the carriage. A doctor dressed the wound, and Mr. Gladstone was ordered to remain in bed. The traffic in the street where he lives has been stopped. The wound, though not serious, is regarded with anxiety, as the Premier's restless temperament, and his desire to attend to public business, tend to induce fever. Mr. Gladstone's anxiety arises to some extent from the consciousness of the two opposing elements in the Cabinet. The Marquis of Hartington, who represents the aristocratic element in the Cabinet, is Mr. Gladstone's deputy in his absence.

A Royal Marriage was Solemnized in Berlin on Sunday, February 27th. Prince Frederick William Victor Albert, eldest son of the Imperial Prince of Germany, was married to Augusta Victoria, daughter of the Grand Duke of Schleswig-Holstein. The bridegroom is a descendant of two royal houses; his father is the eldest son of the Emperor of Germany, and his mother is the eldest daughter of the Queen of England. The marriage ceremony was performed with the utmost magnificence, and the Prince of Wales and other royal personages attended. The aged Emperor was visibly affected by the unusual circumstance of being present at a grandson's wedding.

The Coercion Bill in the British House of Commons reached its final stage on Friday, February 25th, and was sent to the House of Lords. An attempt was made by the Irish members to prove that the delay in passing the act had not resulted in injury to Ireland, and that it was consequently unnecessary. Mr. Forster, the Secretary for Irish affairs, in reply, said that January of this year had been worse in respect of outrages than any month since 1844, excepting November and December last. He admitted that there had been an improvement in the condition of Ireland since November, 1880, but believed it was due to the knowledge that the Protection bill would certainly become law, and that the Irish were beginning to perceive that offences could no longer be committed with impunity; that the intimidation of witnesses and of juries would no longer be successful. "Private letters," says the correspondent of the New York Tribune, "show considerable improvement in Ireland in other respects. 'Boycotting' fails; the reign of terror is reduced to narrower limits; tenants are beginning to pay rents long withheld, while the hold of the League on the people is already loosened." It is reported that when the bill becomes law more than a thousand evictions will be made. Process-servers will then be protected in their work, and landlords will be anxious to get rid of undesirable tenants before the Land bill is passed. It is feared that the next few months will be a period of sore distress for the Irish people, whom Mr. Parnell and his associates have duped into the belief that the Land League could protect them from eviction.

Mr. Parnell's Advice to Irish Tenants in danger of eviction, given at a meeting at Clara, Ireland, on Sunday, February 20th, when ten thousand persons are said to have been present, was, to plough up the land so that the landlord could not graze cattle thereon. He subsequently wrote to the Secretary of the Land League at Clara retracting his advice, not because of its wickedness, but because he had learned that "unjust and barbarous laws make such an act punishable by seven years' penal servitude." Mr. Parnell's speech had been made the subject of interrogation in the House of Commons; a member asking whether it was not an incitement to illegal acts. In reply it was stated that the Government were seriously considering the speech. Mr. Parnell went to Paris again last week to consult his new allies, and also it is believed to avoid the danger of arrest. The English correspondent of the New York World asserts that Mr. Parnell's power over the Irish tenantry is waning. If that report is correct, the Government are unlikely to arrest him, as that act would give him the opportunity of posing as a martyr and excite the sympathy of the people.

Conjectures as to the Character and Scope of the reforms in the Land laws of Ireland, which the British Government are about to propose, are very vague. It is expected that they will be very radical and sufficient to satisfy the more moderate of the Irish tenants. There will be some difficulty in passing an efficient measure in the House of Commons, where many Irish land-owners have seats, and there will be still greater difficulty encountered in the Upper House, for the same reason. An English journal predicts that nearly the entire strength of the Conservative party will be arrayed in opposition to it, reinforced by many old Whigs and the Liberals who are against any forcible interference with the private rights of landlords. The introduction of this bill will be the beginning of a new and formidable agitation throughout the whole country.

The Secret Papers Discovered in Cabul, the capital of Afghanistan, when the British conquered it have been made public, and prove that Russia while professing amicable feelings toward England was secretly inciting the Ameer to war. One of the articles of a treaty drawn up between Russia and Afghanistan is as follows:

"The Russian Government engages that if any foreign enemy attacks Afghanistan and the Ameer is unable to drive him out and asks the assistance of the Russian Government, the Russian Government will repel the enemy, either by means of advice or such other means as it may consider proper."

The Russian general in a letter of advice to the Ameer said: "Make peace openly, and in secret prepare for war, and when God reveals His order to you declare yourself. It will be well when the envoy of your enemy wants to enter the country if you send an able emissary, possessing the tongue of a serpent and full of deceit, to the enemy's country, so that he may, with sweet words, perplex the enemy's mind and induce him to give up the intention of fighting with you." Russia deserte the Ameer when England made war upon him, an the old man died broken-hearted at the breach faith. So the original treachery toward Englan was supplemented by treachery toward the Amee

The Ambassadors of the European Courts a Constantinople are endeavoring to arrange a peac able settlement of the questions in dispute betwee Turkey and Greece. It is expected that both Pow ers will be formally invited to join in a conferenc when the foreign ministers will attempt to arbitra between them. Meanwhile in the Greek Chambe of Deputies on Feb. 23 a Royal decree was submi ted, calling to arms all men above twenty-one yea of age who have served three months or more i the army. Decrees were also presented empowe ing the government to admit foreign officers int the Greek army, provided they will become Gree citizens, and modifying the organization of th financial department of the army. This announc ment conveys the impression that Greece has b little hope of war being averted.

A Religious Reform in Egypt has bee initiated by the Khedive, who has given orders t the Grand Chief that the ceremony known as th "Dossa" must henceforth case. The "Dossa was a procession which took place annually Cairo in the national ceremony known as "Mewlc el-Nabi" and consisted of the passage of a Shei on horse-back over the backs of his co-religionist who prostrated themselves on the earth on the faces and the horse walked over them as on a li ing highway. The measure has received the fu approbation of the native notables, of learned me attached to the University of l'Ashar, as well as all high society in the capital, and addresses thanks have been presented to the Khedive. Th devouring of serpents and poisonous fire an sword-wounding, etc., is similarly fobidden.

Earthquakes are Occurring in Various Part of Europe with portentous frequency. A ver severe shock was felt a few days since at Bologna Florence, Venice, Padua, Ferrara, etc. Account from Switzerland show that the earthquake whic occurred there on January 29th, extended over much wider area than was at first supposed. It intensity may be judged from the fact that th chimes in the church clocks were made to strik and the bells to toll, books were thrown from the shelves, and pictures detached from the walls while in Berne alone more than one hundred chim neys were thrown down. Children and teacher ran pell-mell from the schools, and all study ha to be given up for the day. This is the twenty fourth earthquake that has been recorded i Switzerland since November, 1879, and probabl the most severe.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon gives the following Extract from a letter recently received from a minis terial friend: "Your first sermon in Belfast cause me to decide finally to enter the ministry. Sinc then I have given ten years to mission work i Damascus, where I built the first church eve erected for the spiritual worship of the true God i that city. I built two churches on Mount Hermon and in these churches again and again I hav preached your sermons in Arabic. I preached on of your sermons on the top of Mount Hermon at picnic given to our different villagers. Mr. Spur geon is now sufficiently recovered to resume hi labors. He preached at the Tabernacle mornin and evening on January 30th, and February 6th.

THERE is an important significance in the parable our Lord delivered near the close of His ministry, when, in describing the period which has covered over eighteen centuries he likened the world to a house which the householder had left in charge of his servants. He "gave authority to his servants and to every man his work" (Mark 13 : 34). The absolute and infinite wisdom of our Lord has been in nothing more conspicuous than in this appointing discrimination. Not only has every servant had his work given to him, but it has been work for which he was specially fitted ; and when the Church and the world have been in need of any particular kind of skill, that skill has always been provided. There is a diversity of gifts, but for each kind there is a sphere in the service of Christ.

Thus He could use the unlettered Peter and the cultured Luke ; the poor uneducated tinker, John Bunyan, and the erudite Joseph Butler. To every man his work, and the faithful disciple gladly lays at the Master's feet all he is and has, thinking it nothing worth except as it is utilized in his Master's service. The preaching of the simple Gospel unadorned, by men who know no language but their own, and scarcely any book but the Bible, has in the history of the Church over and over again been so successful that the lack of secular knowledge can never be justifiably pleaded as an excuse for silence when the call of God has come to a Christian to carry the message of the cross to the perishing.

But while learning is not indispensable to active work in the service of God, it is not on that account to be despised. When Paul preached on Mars' Hill he enlisted the attention of his refined and cultured audience by a quotation from "certain of your own poets" (Acts 17 : 28). Thus showing his own acquaintance with a literature foreign to his own. In the present day, when it is the fashion to assail Christianity with "opposition of science, falsely so-called" (1 Tim. 6 : 20), and the young believer is patronizingly informed that if he understood the results of modern research he would not hold the faith of his fathers, it is more than ever important that some among us should be men of learning.

Holding as we do

on which the incomplete discoveries of scientific teachers are powerless as waves on a rock, we are yet concerned that our young men should not be left under the impression that Christianity is the offspring and ally of ignorance ; but that they should know that men of learning and culture are firm believers and zealous workers under Christ's banner. More than that, that men who have studied and thought have found that their belief in the doctrines of the Bible has grown more steadfast as they advanced in knowledge. It is the superficial thinker, the man whose studies have only touched the outer surface of things who is most likely to be a sceptic or unbeliever, and that because he has discovered only half truths.

The character of Dr. Broadus, the learned professor of New Testament Interpretation and Homiletics, whose reputation not only is spread abroad in this country but is well known in the halls of learning across the Atlantic, affords a case in point. That a man whose ability and acquirements would fit him to take a high position among the world's teachers in a secular capacity prefers rather to devote his talents to the work of religious culture, is a plain proof that Christianity has no reason to fear education. When men like Dr. Broadus, who could win name and fame and fortune in the world give their lives to Christian work, satisfied to lose the objects the world holds in highest esteem, if they may but labor successfully for Christ ; then the humble Christian may point to them as irrefutable proof that there is nothing in science or learning to discredit Christianity, and nothing in the pursuits of the world at all comparable in value with the prize of "the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3 : 14).

The work Dr. Broadus has done in the Church has been of a twofold character. He has attained a wide popularity as a preacher, and he has long been known as an active and efficient laborer in the work of preparing young men for the ministry. We will now give our readers a brief sketch of the man's uneventful but influential life. We are indebted for several of the facts to "The Baptist Encyclopædia," edited by William Cathcart, D.D., and in course of publication at Philadelphia, by Louis H. Everts ; a magnificent standard of reference of the Baptist denomination in all parts of the world, complete, accurate, and copious, enriched with contributions by about sixty able writers, and with more than four hundred new engravings.

John Albert Broadus was born in Culpeper Co., Virginia, on the 24th January 1827. His family is of Welsh extraction, and the name was formerly spelled Broadhurst. His father was a prominent member of the Virginia Legislature for a number of years. Another near relative was the Rev. Andrew Broadus, of the same State, the distinguished Biblical scholar and preacher of the early part of the century, who declined repeated calls from the prominent Baptist churches of Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, and whose collections of hymns were extensively used at that time.

AN AMUSING INCIDENT

is related of Mr. Andrew Broadus in his early days when an extreme nervousness sometimes interfered with the delivery of his sermons. Having been appointed to preach on a notable occasion, he went through the preliminary services in his usual felicitous manner ; but when the large audience had settled itself to enjoy a spiritual feast, he came to a sudden pause and said, "The circumstances of the case—I mean my case—make it necessary to excuse myself from proceeding with the discussion." The thought had probably seized him that the expectations of the people could not be met, or he had recognized in the congregation some one whose criticism he dreaded.

Dr. Broadus was educated at the grand old University of Virginia, and his principal instructor was one of its principal ornaments—Dr. Gessner Harrison, who, during his thirty-one year's Professorship of Ancient Languages, toiled so patiently, conscientiously, and thoroughly that Charlottesville became, in that single generation, one of the foremost seats of learning of the New World. The pupil carried his devotion to his master so far that he became his son-in-law ; and long after the master died, and the pupil had attained to equal fame, he thus spoke of him in a memorial address delivered before the Society of Alumni of the university : "He fell amid the storm of war. Three years earlier, and the death of Gessner Harrison would have stirred the whole South. The journals of every State would have contained tributes from many an admiring and grateful pupil.

"In Virginia, especially, we should have been told in eloquent terms how much he had done to raise the standard of education throughout the State, and the story of his laborious life would have been lovingly connected with the history of that great university which was the pride of all educated Virginians. But he died when the war-tempest had long been raging, when the darkness was deepening and many hearts were beginning to shudder lest all things we most loved should go down together ; and he fell almost as unnoticed as falls a single drop into a stormy sea."

This Gessner Harrison before he became a teacher was, with his brother, a student in the university ; and it was noticed as a peculiarity of the two young men that they would never study on Sunday. That observance of the Fourth Commandment was carried out in all respects. For instance, it used to be a practice of Thomas Jefferson, the venerable founder of the university, to invite the students to dine with him on Sunday ; and in due course an invitation came to the two Harrisons. But they courageously returned a note stating that their father had trained them to observe the Sabbath with great strictness ; that not even their having had the honor and pleasure of dining with Mr. Jefferson, would console him for their having committed a violation, as he would conceive, of the Sabbath ; and that therefore, out of respect for their father's convictions, to say nothing of their own, they felt constrained to deny themselves the happiness tendered to them.

The noble ex-President sent them a reply in which he said it gave him the highest gratification, and was a consolation to his old age, to meet such an instance of filial piety ; to find young men showing such respect for their father's opinions, at a time when too many of the young were inclined to disregard the counsels of age and the wishes of parents. And he ended by particularly requesting that on a certain day of the next week they would dine with him, and saying that he could take no denial.

The same overruling force of principle showed itself when the student had grown to middle life. "His daughters—and that is one test of a man's character—regarded him not with mere ordinary filial admiration and affection, but with an unutterable reverence, and, at the same time, a passionate fondness. . . . If a foreigner without introduction was slighted and suspected, and yet seemed to have good in him, Dr. Harrison would take pains to give him countenance. When wounded United States soldiers were brought to the university after the first battle of Manassas, and many people, in the first flush of indignation, were inclined to shrink from them, Dr. Harrison. . . . went promptly and repeatedly to their dormitories, caring for their wounds and reading to them from the Bible."

THE LAST END of this faithful Christian is touchingly described by Dr. Broadus : "In the autumn of 1861, the first year of the war, pecuniary difficulties, deep concern for the country, and yearning anxiety as to the welfare, in body and soul, of his three sons who were in the army, together with the labor of teaching, told upon his health. He did not seem to be sick, but his appetite became capricious and he appeared to be depressed. Later on one of his sons was brought home very ill with camp-fever, and he would insist on nursing him and spent nights in watching beside the sick-bed. He had never known what it was to spare himself when there was a demand for toil and sacrifice, and in spite of remonstrances he continued this course. He saved his son's life, but himself caught the wasting fever. He took to lying, with a weary yet patient look, on the lounge, and the family had no idea how ill he was.

"One morning there came on him suddenly a violent chill, and he lay unable to speak. He looked longingly at his wife and children, strove vainly to speak, then turned his gazing eyes straight up to heaven, and in a little while he was gone. The day was the 7th of April, 1862."

We have made this digression for the twofold purpose of depicting the mind and heart that did so much in forming the character of the subject of our sketch, and of showing the susceptibilities of Dr. Broadus by pointing out what he most loved in Gessner Harrison.

DR. BROADUS GRADUATED

as A.M., in 1850, with such distinction that in the following year he was offered and accepted the position of Assistant Professor of Ancient Languages in the university ; and so for two years he was occupied in imparting classical lore to the students. Then work of a more distinctively religious character was offered him ; and forsaking the fascinations of college life with its ease and learning, and freedom from care, he entered upon the pastorate of the Baptist church at Charlottesville and held it till 1855, when he was elected chaplain of the university. There he officiated two years, and then returned for two years more to the pastorate. But he possessed talents and learning which fitted him for the responsible duty of training young men for the ministry, and when a vacancy occurred in that sphere of labor none was found as worthy to fill it as he. That happened in 1859. The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, which was then at Greenville, S. C., invited him to the Chair of New Testament Interpretation and Homiletics, and he has remained in that connection ever since, moving to Louisville, Ky., when the institution was transferred to that city.

An acquaintance and admirer of Dr. Broadus's says of him: "The Doctor's position in the Seminary at Louisville is that of Professor of Preparation and Delivery of Sermons, and of New Testament Interpretation; but his gives so much character and reputation to the institution that strangers sometimes imagine that he is the president. It is, however, unnnecessary to tell those who are aware of the able direction of the seminary, and especially of its financial prosperity, that the president is the Rev. Dr. Boyce.

"Dr. Broadus is a man of deep and varied scholarship, and of commanding ability in the pulpit. In his knowledge of the Greek of the New Testament, he is without a peer in the South. There are frequent calls upon him to preach in the churches in Louisville, and the announcement of his name does not fail to draw a large congregation. Even his own students, who attend his daily lectures, consider it a privilege to hear a sermon by him and to come under the sway of his power, which is remarkable in the lecture-room, but is far more so in the crowded assembly. The Baptist denomination in America has no man to-day of whom it is rightly more proud, and there is probably no man in the denomination who has done more for it than Dr. Broadus.

"Dr. Broadus is a man of a most genial disposition, affable, kind, and courteous in his manners. He wins the love and confidence of every one into whose society he is thrown. His character is intensely emotional and sympathetic, and with that quality is combined a high degree of magnetism. His students love him as a father, for he manifests a father's interest in them, and is their truest and wisest counsellor. It is a treat to see him in his home, which is as nearly a paradise as any home in this world, and his unsurpassed powers of conversation afford a continued feast to guests and visitors. At the same time his modest, unassuming nature, as refined as a woman's, is seen to full advantage in the unrestrained freedom of his delightful family circle. But whenever he steps into his study, the secret of his public success is found in the regularity and system of his habits."

Dr. Broadus was bereaved of his first wife, whom he courted under the interesting circumstances we have mentioned, and he afterward married her who now brightens his home, Miss Sinclair, of Charlottesville, Va.

The spirit in which the professor performs his duties may be inferred from the following

REMARKS FROM HIS PEN:

The materialist in education asks, Why study dead languages and ancient history? On the same principle, why travel, abroad or at home, except as a commercial traveller? Why listen to the aged? Why ever talk to your neighbor, unless it be in driving a bargain? Such people—and, alas! the world is full of them now—do not know the difference between getting an education and learning a trade." And again, with reference to enthusiasm in the pursuit of science: "Beautiful enthusiasm! The would-be wise, the boastfully practical world will sneer. But there is hardly anything so much needed in America to-day, save honesty and the fear of God, as this very enthusiasm for pure science; as the spirit that will toil, no matter how long, to find out something, and will then break forth into its joyous Eureka, in the dear delight of added knowledge, not yet stopping to ask how far the discovery will be of practical utility."

In 1863 Dr. Broadus preached as a missionary in General Lee's army, and for the next two years he was Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday-school Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. In 1870 he published a work on the Preparation and Delivery of Sermons, which was reprinted in Great Britain, and has been adopted as a text-book in several theological seminaries. Besides various articles for reviews and magazines, he has published a series of papers in which he gives an account of a tour he made through Europe, Egypt, and Palestine in 1870–71. In 1876 he published lectures on the History of Preaching, which he had delivered in the Newton Theological Seminary, near Boston. His only publication in the principal department of his professorship is an elaborate review of the American Bible Union's version of the New Testament, contributed to the Religious Herald of Richmond, Va., in 1867–69.

Dr. Broadus's services as a preacher are eagerly sought when he leaves his own city for a Sunday, and he has had the honor of declining more than one call to be the pastor of a large church. He is doing a great work where he is, and we hope he will be long spared in life and health to prosecute his labors. Many a mighty Baptist preacher of the next generation will acknowledge his obligations, under God, to the Louisville Seminary.

"I WANT TO BE GOODER."

THE Rev. George F. Pentecost tells the following story in The Independent: It was at the close of a preaching service in connection with a series of Gospel meetings in a manufacturing town in New England. As I walked toward the platform, where my wrappings were, I noticed seated alone on one of the benches what seemed to be a little boy. As I passed him, I thought to myself: Why is that boy sitting there alone and at this late hour? So I went back to him, and sat down by his side. On this closer inspection I found him a lad of perhaps fifteen years. He was very dirty, face and hands grimmed with factory-grease; hair uncombed; mouth defiled with tobacco. Meantime, he was chewing his "quid" vigorously. I put my arms kindly about his shoulders and said:

"Well, my boy, what are you waiting here for?"

The reply was the laconic "I dunno."

"What did you come in for at all?"

"I just wanted to see what was going on and to hear the singing."

"Well, why do you stay longer, now that nearly everybody has gone?"

"I dunno. 'Cause I don't feel good."

"Do you want to be a Christian?"

"I'd'no. I dunno what that is."

"Why, it is to be saved from your sin and become God's child. Would you not like to be God's child? That is to be a Christian."

"I'd like to be gooder. That's what I like to be."

"Well, my boy, that is what Jesus will do for you if you will take Him for your Saviour. He will not only make you 'gooder,' but He will forgive all your sins and give you a new heart."

"I dunno what you mean by that."

And therein he was like Nicodemus. Indeed, he was a young Nicodemus come to Jesus by night. He knew that he wanted to be "gooder," but he did not know how he was to be made so. I talked with him a little while about Jesus, but he did not seem to understand how Jesus could be "away up in heaven," and yet know anything about him; and particularly he did not know how he was to give himself to Christ. Nevertheless, I went on preaching or talking Jesus to him, trusting the present Holy Spirit, who had awakened him and detained him in the inquiry-room, to enable him to understand these things. At length he said:

"I don't know what you mean by believing on Jesus Christ."

Apparently dropping the subject, I turned to him abruptly and said:

"Where do you work?"

He looked up, evidently surprised, and told me that he worked in a certain factory.

"What do you do in it?" I asked.

"I works in the picking-room."

"Is it a good job?"

"No, sir; 'tain't! It's long hours and poor pay."

"How long do you work?"

"Oh! different. Sometimes ten hours and sometimes fourteen, according to the way the mill runs."

"And what pay do you get?"

"Only but fifty cents a day."

"Well," said I, "now, Johnny, suppose Mr. So and-so," naming the manager of a large mill in another part of the town, "should come to you, and say: 'Johnny, I want a boy to work for me in my mill, and I will tell you what I want him to do. I want him to work four hours a day in the mill with two of my own boys, that I am bringing up to know the business. Then I want him to go to school a half day. I will give him a dollar a day, and he shall eat at my table and live in my house with my boys; and, indeed, I will be a kind father to him and take good care of him.'"

The little fellow listened with amused incredulity; but when I had finished, and asked him "Johnny, if such an offer was made to you, would you accept it?" with a smile that spread all over his face, and even up out of the grime and dirt, and far quicker than I can record it, he answered:

"You bet I would! And mighty quick!"

"But, Johnny, what would you do with the old job?"

"I'd throw it up, higher'n a kite."

"And then what would you do?"

"Why, of course, I go to work for the new boss. But, say, Mister, you are 'chaffing me' now."

"No, Johnny, I am not chaffing you. You are working for a hard master now, and are having long hours and poor pay. Every one who is living in sin is serving the Devil, and the only pay you will get by and by is death. But, my boy, God loves you, and He has sent Jesus into the world to tell you so and to offer to make you His child, put you to work for Him, and finally take you to heaven. Now, Johnny, will you accept this new situation and become God's child? That is what I mean by believing on Jesus Christ and accepting Him. Will you take him for your Saviour and new Master?"

Once more the smile came back into his face, and, with straightforward, honest love in his eye, he said:

"Is that it? Then I'll take Jesus Christ for my Saviour."

"But, Johnny," said I, "what will you do with the old job of sin?"

Still another ray of light came into his face, and, with compressed lips and firm and determined voice, he said, evidently remembering his other answer: "I throw it up."

"That's it, my dear boy. That is what it is to become a Christian. It is to take Jesus for your Saviour, who forgives all your sin, and for your new Master, and God for your Father in heaven, and throw up the old job of sin. And now will you kneel down here with me, and tell Jesus that you have taken Him in your heart, to be your Saviour and Master?"

"Yes, sir." And, with that, he fell upon his knees beside me, and, after I had offered a prayer, I asked him to pray, which he did, substantially in these words: "Lord Jesus, I take you for my Saviour, and I throw up sin. Help me to be gooder than I am and to serve you right." I said the "Amen."

* * * * * * *

I was in that city months afterward, and asked the pastor after "Johnny," and he told me he was walking uprightly. Among other things, he had "thrown up his tobacco."

Dr. Livingstone, the Explorer of Africa, had conceived the idea over twenty years ago of the coffee-room scheme. In the interesting "Personal Life of Dr. Livingstone," by Dr. Blaikie, just published, we find a letter written by Dr. Livingstone in July, 1857, in which he said: "I am thinking of giving, or trying to give, a lecture, by invitation, at the Glasgow Athenæum. I am offered thirty guineas, and as my old friends the cotton-spinners have invited me to meet them, I think of handing the sum, whatever it may be, to them, or rather letting them take it, and fit up a room as a coffee-room, on the plan of the French cafés, where men, women, and children may go, instead of to whiskey-shops. There are coffee-houses already, but I don't think there are any where they can talk and read papers just as they please.

HELP FOR ALL.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, delivered on Sunday Morning, March 6, 1881.

"In me is thine help."—HOSEA, 13 : 9.

German Vandalism at Versailles—An Awakened Sinner's First Impulse—The Gospel has no War with Morality—Trouble at the Root—A Man in a Quagmire—The Legend of a Roman Fountain—How God Helps the Sinner—I. The Holy Spirit Enlightens Him—A Reminiscence of Belleville—II. Repentance Given—III. Faith Implanted—A Horseman's Conversion in the Night—IV. Pardon and Peace Given—What We all Want—Help in Life—Help in Death—The Princess Alice and the German Sceptic—A Christian Mother's Sudden Death—A British Officer's Perilous Slumber.

THOSE of you who have visited Versailles know that the picture-galleries were full of representations of the Napoleonic victories. It was Napoleon at Austerlitz, Napoleon crowned, Napoleon here and Napoleon there. When the Germans, a few years ago, took Versailles, the first thing they did was to cut out of the canvass all the representations of those Napoleonic victories. They wanted nothing that showed the defeat of the Germans and the triumph of the French. I would to God that this morning all trace of sinful victory in our soul might be obliterated, and that nothing might be left but the triumphs of grace.

The first thing that a man does after waking up to his sinful condition is to try to help himself. He looks over his character. "Now," he says, "here I have some bad habits I must get rid of. I'll stop this, and I'll stop that. I have been given to profanity; I'll stop swearing. I have been given to over-reaching my neighbors in bargaining; I'll be honest. I have been in the habit of Sabbath-breaking; I'll observe the Lord's day, and whatever I did wrong I'll do right."

There is no war between

THE GOSPEL AND MORALITY.

We must give up our evil habits if we are going into the kingdom of God; but if you have the idea that by changing your habits you can change your nature, you have made an awful mistake. A pomologist goes into his orchard, and he sees a valuable tree dying, and he knows that it has a worm gnawing at the root. Does he begin by chopping off branches in order to get the health of that tree? No; he begins to dig in the earth, and he comes down until he is able to destroy the worm at the root. Now, how are we to come to moral and spiritual health? Will we accomplish the thing by chopping off this bad habit and chopping off that bad habit, chopping off this evil proclivity and chopping off that evil proclivity? No; there is trouble at the root. "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." As long as the heart is wrong the life will be wrong.

Now, in a great many things, it is well for people to help themselves. If you want to get the favor of the world, go to work and win it. If you want to get a fortune, go to work and earn it. If you want to be a geologist, delve with your own crowbar; or a mineralogist, smite with your own hammer; or a surgeon, cut with your own knife; or a poet, chime your own cantos; but if you have any idea that you are going to change your heart and hew your own way into Heaven by your own strength, you are attempting an impossibility.

You know very well that if a man be sinking in a quagmire, the more he struggles the deeper he sinks. If you are now in the depths of your sin, struggling by your own power to get out, you will only sink deeper. You want a strong arm on the outside to clutch you and lift you up, and plant you on the rock. In other words, you want someone to cry out from the solid land, "In me is thy help."

Well, there are those in this audience who not only feel they have a sinful nature, but that they are helpless. I congratulate you, I am glad of it that you feel you are helpless. You say: "That isn't brotherly; that isn't humane." Well, I say that in the same spirit in which Lady Huntington said it to a man who exclaimed, "I am a lost man." She said, "I am glad of it." He said, "That's a most unkind remark." "Ah!" she said, "I am glad of it. Because you must first feel you are lost before you will win salvation." And so if there are those here this morning who not only know that they have a sinful nature, but that they are helpless, I congratulate you. For now comes the clarion voice of my text—it comes like ten thousand thunders bursting from the throne: "In me is thy help."

There is a fountain in the city of Rome about which is the superstition that if a man once drinks of it he will some time certainly come there to drink again. He may be gone fifty years, he may wander all the world over; but the superstition says that that man will certainly come back and drink again of the fountain. He cannot help it. But it is no superstition for me to say that when a man drinks of this fountain of grace he is sure to come again, and coming this morning, some of you the hundredth time, the thousandth time, you will come yet again and yet again—this morning perhaps with more joy than when you came the first time. Drinking once, you drink again.

Now I feel the great heart of God, the great heart of a loving and sympathetic God, throbbing against the heart of this assembly, and every word is a throb: "In me—is—thy—help."

I. God, in the first place, is willing to help you by giving you the Holy Spirit to show you and me just the position we occupy. "Now,

WHAT IS THE USE OF CONVICTION?"

some one says. "If God is going to save me, why not save me? What is the use of my being harrowed up by the sense of my past deficits? I am ready now to begin a new life; why be bothered about the past?" My brother, I will tell you the use of conviction.

You go out into the street, and there is a gay equipage dashing past, and you rush out and take the horses by the bit, and you stop them. The occupant of the carriage says: "Why do you stop me, sir?" and you offer him fifty cents. He throws the money back in your face. He says: "Do you think I am a beggar? How dare you stop me? Get out of the way, or I will ride over you. Drive on!" Next morning you are coming out of your front doorway, and you see a poor man on the steps, hungered and in rags, and you give him fifty cents. He says: "Thank you. God bless you! I was near unto death for lack of bread. Thank you, thank you."

In other words, the Gospel of the Son of God is a charity to our impoverished race. You offer that charity to a man who deems he is in need of nothing. He says: "Why do you offer me deliverance? I am not incarcerated. Why do you offer me pardon? I am no sinner. I want none of your help. Drive on!" Another man, by the power of the Holy Ghost, is persuaded that without Jesus Christ he is pauperized, impoverished, and beggared for eternity. You offer him the Gospel. He says: "God bless you for this offer. Hear all the earth and all the heavens that I am to be pardoned and blessed. Thank you, thank you." In other words, without conviction a man does not want Christ and his salvation. The Holy Spirit coming on the heart, a man wakes up to see his true state. If the Holy Spirit should come in this assemblage this morning with unwonted power—we all feel His presence now; but if He should come with unwonted power, what a scene!

I remember in the first year of my pastorate in the little village of Belleville I was very much discouraged because there were so few conversions, and one Sabbath morning I went into the pulpit utterly disheartened, and preached what it seemed to me was a very lame sermon. The next morning, passing down the street, a lady of one of the first families of the village said to me, "I wish you would come in and see my family." I said: "Are any of them sick?" I passed in and I found the Holy Ghost was mightily working upon all their hearts, and before that nightfall that whole family were in the kingdom of God. Moreover, it was the beginning of a great awakening, and the Holy Spirit moved on scores of hearts.

If the Holy Spirit should mightily appear this morning, there is an aged man who would drop his head and say: "O! Lord, though it is the eleventh hour, have mercy on me." And there is a worldling who would say: "O! God, give me a better portion than this world offers." There is a young man who would say: "Lord, I have been a wanderer, I would like to come home." Did I not hear a whisper going along from seat to seat? I think it was a prayer, a prayer: "God help me!"

I look into your faces this morning, my beloved people, and I ask you the potent question which Paul asked of the Ephesians: "have ye received the Holy Ghost?" Pliny says that the first three days of the young lion's existence it seems to be dead, and the lioness is in seeming grief at the unconsciousness of her young; but on the third day the lion lifts up his voice and at the roaring the young lions seem to wake out of death. O, that the lion of Judah's tribe would this day utter His arousing and resurrectionary voice until all the dead should rise!

II. Again, I remark that God is ready to help you by giving you

REPENTANCE.

There is a great difference between seeing my sin and turning from it, there is a great difference between finding my lost condition and getting out of it, there is a great difference between finding myself on the wrong road and getting on the right road. I explode the delusion that conviction and conversion are the same thing. Thousands of people get convicted who never get converted. I will illustrate the difference.

A man is picked up from a scene of riot and debauchery and thrust into a prison at night. In the morning he wakes up and he sees walls, he feels his own wretchedness, he says: "aching head, aching feet, aching heart, miserable, miserable." He sits down and mourns. That same night another man is picked up from a scene of riot and debauchery and thrust into prison, and in the morning he wakes up and sees only walls, and feels his own wretchedness, and says: "aching head, aching feet, aching heart. Miserable, miserable. I can't endure it," and he raps on the wicket of the prison, and he calls the jailer. He says, "come here, come here. There is a man on such and such a street who is my friend, and he knows the Governor. You just ask that friend to go to the Governor's office and get a pardon for me, and get it right away." The message is carried, the pardon is obtained, the prison doors are swung open, the man comes forth. In the first case it was conviction; in the last case it was conversion.

Now, where are we to get this repentance from? From God. "Prove it," you say. I will prove it. "Him hath God exalted to be a prince and a Saviour." What for? "To give repentance unto Israel." Oh, that this morning the Lord would help us all to repent. Rowland Hill says, "when I put down my pilgrim's staff at the gate of Heaven, if I drop a tear it will be because I have to part forever with the sweet and pleasant companion, repentance." You hear about the sorrows of repentance. This morning I tell you of the joys of repentance.

III. Again, God is willing to help you by enabling you to exercise

FAITH IN CHRIST.

Now, you say, we have come to a technicality. There is no technicality about it. You tell me that a man can believe as easily as turning his hand over. You make a misstatement. I often hear Christian men in prayer-meeting say: "It is easy to believe, perfectly easy to believe." I deny it. The most exhausting undertaking to which I ever put the energies of my soul, the most exhausting undertaking to which you ever put the energies of your soul was to believe in Christ. I go further, and say it is so great an undertaking that no man can accomplish it of himself. "Prove it," you say again. I will prove it. "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves. It is the gift of God."

"Well," you say, "if it is a gift of God, that discharges all my responsibility. If God is the only one who can give it, and doesn't give it, I have no responsibility in the matter." Ah, you make a mistake, my brother! A farmer plants the corn. He knows he cannot raise the corn; he cannot make the corn grow. He knows the sun and the shower do that. The farmer does his work; the sun and the shower do their work. God's work is to give faith. What is your work? To ask for it, to implore it, to agonize for it until you get it. If you could exercise that faith this morning my brother, my sister, what a revolution in your feelings!

At a religious meeting a man heard the Gospel and he mounted his horse and rode homeward during the night. While riding homeward Christ spake peace to his soul. The man believed, and the burden was gone, and he was so overjoyed he could not contain the joy. He knew if he rode on to his home there would be no one there to sympathize with this spiritual joy, and so he turned his horse about and he rode back through the darkness to the pastor's house. It was quite late. He called the pastor out, and seizing him by the hand he said: "Oh, what a God we have!" And if this morning you could only trust Him that man's exclamation would not seem at all extravagant, and as you went out of this house to-day you would take some Christian by the hand, and with all the concentred emotion of your soul you would cry: "Oh, what a God we have!"

IV. I remark again, God is willing to help you by giving you the

of the Gospel. God is not a King hard to get at. Earthly kings are sometimes almost unapproachable. You have got to go with a certain style of dress, and you have got to come at certain hours. Not observing those rules, the guard will roughly thrust you back from the castle gate, and will say to the officers of the law: "Take that man into custody; he has no business here in that attire."

History tells us of a man who, having offended a king, had to stand barefoot on the cold pavement in front of the palace day after day, doing penance before the king would admit him. Our King is not of that sort. He throws open the palace door and He says: "Come in; never mind the court dress; come in your rags, come in your poverty, come now. Come any hour of the day, come any hour of the night. You cannot come any time when I won't be glad to see you. Come in, come in." And while He is calling all the bells of the tower begin to ring, and they chime just one thing: "Come, come, come, come."

Oh, what a tremendous thing it is to have God put His hand on your shoulder and say: "As far as the east is from the west, so far I will move your transgressions from you, I have loved you with an everlasting love. The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee."

Oh, that unhorses the last terror, that sheathes the last sword, that raptures the soul with a great joy, that turns the face of God, the full face of Christ on you. He can do it. He can save you. He hushed Gennesaret and He can quiet your perturbation. He gave sight to Bartimeus, and He can fill you with irradiation. He restored Malchus' hearing, and He can make you hear the glad tidings of great joy.

Do not look back, it is all sin—do not look down, it is all destruction; but look up and see written over the mangled brow, printed on the bleeding hand, punctured in the pierced side, and hear dropping from the lips: "In me—in me is thy help." O! God, that is what we want, that is

WHAT WE ALL WANT.

It is help. Help for that formalist who is depending upon his ceremonies. Help for that moralist who is depending on his good deeds. Help for that wanderer who is so discouraged. Help for the young. Help for the old. Help now—infinite, instant, and everlasting help. Hear it ringing from the throne. Hear it in the multitudinous chorus of the white-robed choristers. Hear it in the jarring of the wide-open gate of Heaven. "In me is thy help!" Oh, yes, my friends, we want help. We want help while we live, and we want help when we die.

There is no need of my fooling away the time this morning, or you fooling away time in flatteries. What we want is help. You have perplexities the world cannot sympathize with. You have annoyances the world cannot help you in. When some great trouble comes you have sympathizers, but there are annoyances in your life that nobody understands. Now, you want God to help you just at that point. When the doctor told Walter Scott he must stop worrying, stop fretting, he said: "Ah, doctor, Molly might as well put the kettle over the fire and tell it not to boil as for you to tell me not to fret, when I have so many things to fret about!"

Yes, you want God in those things where the world cannot give you sympathy. It is a rough path, it is a rugged path, it is a very narrow path many of you have to travel. I know, I know all about it. God only can guide you and strengthen you. I speak right to the mark now in talking to you.

When a man came in a stormy night, and during a great freshet and rapped at a farmer's door, the farmer opened the door and said: "why, what are you doing here to-night? How did you get across the river? the bridge is down." "Oh, no," said the man, "the bridge isn't down; I just came across the bridge." "But the bridge is down," said the farmer; "it fell this afternoon and was washed away in the freshet." The man said, "the bridge isn't down, I just rode over it." Then they went out with their lanterns, and just one timber remained. The man's horse had cautiously walked that timber. A few inches either way and it would have been death; but God helped that man right across. And it is a narrow path some of you walk, a dangerous path. God only can help you, and He will help you. "In me is thy help."

Then we will all soon want help when we leave the world. Scepticism does very well, or seems to do very well while we live and everything goes brightly; but it fails at the last as it did Princess Alice when she wrote to Strauss, the world-renowned sceptic, saying to Strauss: "I am about to leave the world and I want you to send back all my letters, all my infidel letters; for I am dying now, and I am going to die in the faith of Christ, and I want to burn my letters." Ah, your scepticism may do a little while longer, but it will not do all the way through. "In me is thy help."

I would rather have the experience of that good woman who a few Sabbaths ago sat in this house, and a day or two afterward stood at the head of the stairs in her house, and said: "Come, come, my daughter." The daughter came and the Christian mother, putting her hand on her head, said—standing at the head of the stairs—"If this be death, I am satisfied," and fell senseless, and in a few moments was with God on high. I shall be satisfied when I wake in His likeness, and so will you. I would rather have that experience than all the experience of the brilliant sceptics of the world.

I would rather have the experience of the young man who on his dying bed had such enrapturing views of the world to come that he wanted to go, and after the physician had said some encouraging words about convalescence, the mother took the doctor into the next room and said: "Doctor, don't discourage him by telling him he is going to get well." Oh, yes; in that hour we will want help,

WE WILL WANT CHRIST.

I pray God that the effect of this service may be eternal. We will depart in a few moments now. Let those of us who are children of God be earnest. Let there be nothing in our conversation to indicate that religion is a trivial thing, that this divine help is of no importance. A Christian father with his impenitent son passed out the church, passed down the street, and the Christian father said to the impenitent son: "My son, that was a good sermon, that was a very good sermon, one of the best sermons I ever heard." And in a few moments he whistled and he laughed. Getting to their home, the son went to his room and said: "The Gospel is a lie. If father thought I was on my way to a judgment, and I was unprepared for the great future, and I was in infinite peril, he couldn't have whistled and laughed all the way home, if he knew I wasn't a Christian. The Gospel is a lie."

God forbid that we should throw dishonor upon a religion which is a tremendous reality—tremendous. Let me say to this vast audience, in which there are many earnest souls who have not yet found God, but they are in earnest now—let me say, decide the matter quickly and now. Adjournment is perilous. More souls lost through adjournment and procrastination than in any other way.

When Sir Colin Campbell, with his army, retreated from Lucknow, there was one man left. Captain Waterman overslept himself in a place where they did not see him and did not arouse him. At two o'clock he wakened, and lo! the English army was gone, and he was surrounded by fifty thousand savages. He said his horror was indescribable, and he sped away as rapidly as he could, until he came to the rear guard of the English army, and he was insane with excitement.

God forbid that it should be said of any man in this house, while multitudes march on into the kingdom of the Gospel, you have overslept in sin, waking up amid ten thousand spiritual enemies, the everlasting captive of your own somnolence. Awake thou that sleepest, and rise from the dead.

"Seize the kind promise while it waits,
And march to Zion's Heavenly gates,
Believe, and take the promised rest,
Obey, and be forever blest."

A Car-Fare Paid.—A Poor Old Woman, bowed with age and infirmity, and almost crippled with rheumatism, was helped into a seat in a car by the conductor. The car soon filled, and started on its way. In a few minutes the man came in with his customary "Fares, please," and collected from each his pence. But before he reached the old lady a benevolent-looking gentleman first put his own fare into the collector's hand, and then adding to it the same amount, he said, "That is for the old lady opposite, if she will accept it." As the man passed her by, he said, "You are paid for, ma'am." And the gentleman hastened to add, "If you will accept it." But no doubts troubled the poor needy woman. Freely as the gift was offered, she accepted, with only a simple, grateful "Thank you." How like to the gift of God! The liability met by another—One who, owing nothing Himself, was in a position righteously to discharge the debt, to meet the need; our blessed Substitute, the one to whom God imputed our sins upon whom He laid the iniquities of us all!

Hindoo Incantations.—The Rev. F. W. Ainley, in some published reminiscences, says: "In the country of Travancore, where I was living, we had very few highroads, but many beautiful rivers, up and down which we used to travel in boats rowed by ten or twelve natives. One day I was with another missionary, and we halted at a place where many trees grew near to the river. I got out of the boat and walked in among the trees, to be sheltered from the blazing mid-day sun, and as I walked I came on a strange sight. Five or six men were sitting in a circle, cross-legged, on the ground; their long black hair was loose and streaming; they were beating small drums with their hands, and singing a shrill chorus. I asked them the reason of their doings. 'Oh, sahib! there is a child there (pointing to a house a little distance off) that has got a devil, and we are driving it.' Leaving them, I approached the house, and outside, on the grass, a father held in his arms his suffering child, who was screaming with pain. The father told me that his little boy had been in this state for six hours, and thought some god was angry with him, and had sent a devil into his son. He had called for these priests, hoping that they might be able to do something for him."

A Living Man Almost Dissected.—A Man named Klein was found during the late frost apparently frozen to death in the neighborhood of Golothern, Switzerland, and there being nothing about him to give a clue to his identity he was handed over to the Cantonal hospital for dissection. When the supposed corpse had been laid on the dissecting-table the mistake was discovered, and means were taken to infuse new life into him, which succeeded so well that he is now in his usual health. In like manner men have despaired of the spiritual life of others, who were dead in trespasses and sins; and yet the Spirit of God has been at work, quickening and raising them up to newness of life in Christ Jesus.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

King Hal the Foreman—National Blunders—The Builder's Order—A Visit to the Ball and Anchor—Beer as a Sedative—The Saloon-Keeper's Tactics.

It was on one of those cold days in November that, at five o'clock, a drizzling fog unceremoniously set in to announce an evening still more cold and dreary than even that November day had been. The church clock of another town in the same county as that in which Etta lived was on the stroke of five, and the chimes had begun to ring out their herald of the laborer's rest, when, at some distance off, an experienced ear might have detected a harsh clanging, something in sound like the noise you could make with a poker upon a tea-kettle.

This unmusical performance resulted from a succession of blows upon a metal plate, given by the hammer of a broad-shouldered, black-whiskered man, of good height, and bearing an appearance of considerable power. Bodily power he certainly had, and mental abilities, though untrained, he must also have possessed to some degree; for the very act we have mentioned bespeaks his position as foreman over the large gang of workmen who are already scattering, like so many school boys, from the quaint red brick walls of the house at which they have been working.

His loose corduroy trousers, spattered all over with lime and water, and his thick fustian jacket, are the honorable signs of toil, of "good hard work," as he would say; "no finikin little jobs like them there!" he is thinking, as with a sideway shake of his head, he casts a glance at the rickety cart that is passing along the high road, at this moment followed by a little man, who, with his hand to his mouth, screams, like a door on its hinges, "Scissors to mend; grind 'em neat."

Certainly King Hal—as our friend the foreman is called by his mates, because his name is Henry King, and, by the nickname fashion, the said name has, through some natural process, become reversed—is a finer specimen of humanity than the tramp. Indeed, if you look from one to the other you will see there is no comparison. They belong apparently to a different race of beings. Hal is in the prime of life, strong, hearty, with a wrist like iron, and legs that think nothing of his seven miles' walk daily, to and from his work, in addition to the eleven hours' standing, which constitutes a larger proportion of the duty of his life, and which admits of the meal intervals as its only parentheses from early dawn to sunset.

If you sum up year by year of labor like this, and recollect that a life cast in such a mould, and expended thus, is really the representative of vast masses of lives similarly expended, you will surely recognize the fact that, in the aggregate, these form the "Atlas" of our country. On these broad shoulders rest the burden and the toil of the day. Without these men, we, who from sheer incapacity could not touch their life-work with the tip of our fingers, would soon be paupers.

Depend upon it, our remedy for the strikes and drunkenness which are the two national afflictions that are cutting away the foundations of our prosperity, does not lie in the introduction of a foreign element. We have mouths enough to feed already. Rather let us make a better use of the materials God has given us. We have treated our workingmen too much as beasts of burden. We have forgotten that they have hearts, minds, bodies; that they are made of better stuff than we are, and, if looked at only in a monetary point of view, worth gold to their nation.

This is, however, a very low view to take of the true value of these noble fellows, generous, faithful, self-sacrificing, unalterable in loyal devotion to you, if once you win their hearts. "Narrow-minded" do you say? Narrow! they don't know what it means! Broad-souled, frank, trusting creatures are the sons of our soil; so broad—and this in the right sense of the word too—that we may be put to shame, who, in our higher education, have become trammelled into many a petty line and crooked warp. If you want to find unselfishness, large-heartedness, visit among the dwellings of those who, by bodily labor, earn the scanty sum weekly that we can afford to squander in minor enjoyments, as unnecessary often as they are unreal.

But to return to King Hal in his retreat from the scene of his day's work. The men have divided themselves off in various directions, and are betaking themselves to their homes by various paths. Some have jumped over the little brick wall that separates the rising pile from the adjoining field, and are pursuing the muddy path that will eventually land them in the village from whence they had emerged at sunrise that morning.

Others are ascending the long steep hill that rises at the back of their scene of labor. When they have crossed this ridge, they will find themselves in the small suburb of a rural town. Some of this group are bachelors, and live "in a bed"—that is to say, they have no house, only a shake-down, which they share with another lodger, making the sum total of their habitation, as far as they can call it their own by the right of payment, half a bed; for the rest they must "make shift" as best they can.

Another large party are wending their way down a narrow lane, the mud splashing over and into their heavy boots as they walk. They are tired, and a little cross, too, if the truth were known, as we may judge from their voices. They are passing opinion on various matters as they shuffle along in the direction of "home." King Hal is among them, and his voice, low and deep, complains the most bitterly.

The fact is, they have all been a little unhinged by an interview they have just had with the builder. As they were coming into the lane he rode up to them on his horse, accompanied by his son on another steed, and shouting, "King!" in his usual rough tone—or rather the rough tone that he always employed in speaking to his workmen—he swore a round oath, saying, "What on earth were you up to to-day, I should like to know, putting that blockhead Dan Holmes on the mason's job at the east front?"

"Dan?" Hal answered questioningly. And then, remembering "a thing or two" which had occupied his recollection evidently, he said apologetically, touching his hat, "Beg your pardon, sir; but Dan did the bit round the farther window, and I thought he'd do for the job. He's been badly lately, and off work, but he was round again to-day, so I told him on."

"Have done with your nonsense!" was the builder's reply. "Dan may walk. I am not going to have him loafing about the place. Do you hear?" This last query was roared, shouted, or describe it as you please—the extraordinary method of affirmation that this exalted personage generally considered necessary for the enforcement of his wishes, when those wishes were to be carried out by Hal or his subordinates. So saying, Mr. Eldridge had touched up his horse and ridden away, muttering unutterable things.

This little episode, though one of too frequent occurrence to present much astonishment to any of the parties concerned, yet hardly carried with it a salutary influence, or one likely to soothe the weary spirits even of a party of strong working-men who had been toiling all day at labor the builder now considered far beneath himself, though at one time he had been thankful for jobs of a similar kind.

"What's the row?" asked one of the group, as on they trudged again.

"Dan and he ain't nowheres together. That's how it is," answered Hal. "They had a bit of a difference one day, something about pay, or that; our governor, he don't know nothin' 'bout lookin' easy on a chap, when he thinks he's once gone agin 'im. No one never can give no satisfaction to 'im. There ain't no pleasin'. Work, work, work, and you'll be paid. I like that! Yes, and you are paid, too. Oaths and curses! Why, this swearing beats the 'Cat and Dog' hollow. Never hear nothing like it there. And then treated just as if you were a dog."

"And it's all the year round alike!" chimes in another. "Wet and fine, hot and cold. He don' change."

"He's a bear, he is," says one with fair curly hair and brown cap, as he pushes the said cap of his hot brow.

By this time the whole party have reached a di in the road, where they see two or three small cot tages flanking one stiff, square little building, con taining the inevitable two windows covered by brown wire blind, divided by a door, and sur mounted by a swinging signboard, that proclaim it to be the depôt of alcoholic liquors, and secure its individuality by the title "Ball and Anchor."

Alas! directly this little roof is in view, Hal an his companions begin to think they feel thirsty Hal, for one, had fully intended going straigh home to-night, but being slightly ruffled by th preceding conversation, he replies to the query fron men on both sides of him, "'Ave 'alf a pint?' "'Ave a drop?" by the curt reply, "Think I will;' and in they all go, disappearing one by one int the smoky little parlor. The rubicund landlor rubs his hands together, nods his head, accost them with "Foggy night!" and retires behind th bar to serve the liquor. "Here!" he shouts fo another attendant, and a smiling, tinsel-decked, be fringed barmaid appears, closely followed by Mrs Chart, the lady of the house.

All make themselves instantly the essence o amiability. Jocose words, loud laughter, kind in quiries, politics, gossip—all pass in turn round th entrapped circle, each theme being initiated by th host and his allies. There is an object in this They know that it is rather an honor, becaus somewhat rare an event, that King Hal and all hi colleagues should walk in at once. Mrs. Char guesses that something has gone wrong, and soo the matter is out.

Then Mr. and Mrs Chart take their line fron their customers, and loudly agree with all they sa about "the guv'nor," crying him down for th time being with great spirit. They have an eye t business, and while the talk goes round the glasse are refilling. Presently Hal has the sense to knov that things are going a little too far, and so make an effort to escape.

"You coming, Curly?" he says to the fairhaire man.

"In a minute," answers the man addressed.

"Take a drop of something neat, to warm yo up a bit, first!" says the wily landlord—truly th most veritable foe in disguise that poor Hal eve had or ever will have!

"I think I'll go!" says Hal. He shuffles hi cap on his head, pulling it well over his eyes an goes out. But once outside, his social nature per suades him that it would be better to wait a minut or two for the others. And so he does.

THREE GREAT COMING EVENTS.

By P. W. E.

I. THE COMING OF THE LORD FOR HIS SAINTS AS THE BRIDEGROOM.

Three Great Events Before the Church—Th First—The Coming of the Lord for His Saint —The Bride in the Old Testament—Cut Off fo Her Unfaithfulness—Her Hope of Restoratio —The Bride in the New Testament—Christ' Coming—Her Present Hope—Her Union wit Christ—To Judge, Rule, be Glorified, an Reign with Christ—Enoch, a Type—Isaac, Type—The Duty of the Church—The Functio of the Holy Spirit—The Burden of the Promise —One Verse in Twenty-five—"I Come Quick ly"—Walk, Work, Watch.

THE Scriptures speak of three great event that are before the church and the world. Thes are (1) the coming of the Lord for His saints (2 "the hour of temptation," or "the great tribula tion," which occurs after the saints are taken t heaven; and (3) the coming of the Lord with Hi saints. It is very important that the distinction between these events should be carefully noticed as to time and character.

The coming of the Lord for His saints is the present hope of the church. When that takes place, as it may at any hour, all believers from the foundation of the world, who have not been raised, will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air. The Church, as the body of Christ, consisting only of true believers, will then cease to exist on the earth.

After the coming of the Lord for His saints, and before His coming with His saints, God will be occupied in preparing the way for the establishment of Christ's earthly kingdom, and in making ready a people who shall receive Him as their earthly sovereign. These objects are both accomplished by means of sore judgments inflicted on the earth, judgments by which His enemies are punished and His people purified. "The hour of temptation," or "the great tribulation," is the period during which these judgments are poured forth. The coming of the Lord with His saints will take place at the end of this "hour of temptation," or "the week of tribulation," as it is sometimes called, after the preliminary judgments have been brought to a close. It is the event described as "the coming of the Son of man," "the coming of the day of the Lord," and "the appearing of Christ with his saints." At that coming Christ will execute judgment on His enemies, deliver His chosen earthly people, and establish His dominion in righteousness over the world.

We propose to bring out some Scriptural truths respecting these three events, in the order named. The first of the three will be the subject of this article. The coming of the Lord

FOR HIS SAINTS.

The Scriptures teach us that there is an earthly as well as a heavenly bride. The difference, however, is most marked. Jeremiah writes, "Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith Jehovah; I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals" (Jer. 2 : 2). This espoused wife proved herself unfaithful. Christ came to her according to promise, but she received Him not. She took counsel how she might put Him to death. But God declares that after many days of visitation He "will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness and speak comfortably unto her . . . and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth" (Hosea 2 : 14, 15). That is, in due time she shall be restored and made glorious *in the earth.

On account of her unfaithfulness she was cut off, or set aside. Who then is the wife of the Lamb, spoken of in Revelation? We find no reference in the Old Testament to the Church of Christ, this heavenly bride. This was "the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints" (Col. 1 ; 26). No intimation was ever made respecting the Church of God, until after the Jews took counsel how they might destroy Jesus. They being set aside, Christ said to Peter, "I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16 : 18). Up to that time there was no Church of God. From the day of Pentecost the Church has been and is being gathered "out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." The Holy Ghost is the gathering power; and Christ is the centre of gathering. Those who belong to the Church of Christ have been born of God; set apart according to the gracious will or purpose of the Father; sanctified by the blood of Jesus; and chosen "to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth" (2. Thess. 2 : 13).

Paul, in speaking to the Corinthians, says, "I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Cor. 11 : 2). In another epistle he writes, "Husbands love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for it . . This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the Church" (Eph. 5 : 25–32). These passages show that the heavenly bride is the Church. She has but is to be taken to be with Christ and to receive glory in heaven.

When our Lord was on the earth He gathered about Him a few disciples, who on the day of Pentecost were baptized into one body, called the Church. The night on which the Lord was betrayed He said to them: "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14 : 2, 3). Up to that time there was no place prepared for those who would constitute this heavenly bride. Here He not only assumes that He will prepare a place for them, but that He will also come again and receive them to Himself. On the day of our Lord's ascension, while the disciples were looking steadfastly toward heaven as He went up, "behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven" (Acts. 1 : 10, 11).

No language can be more clear or explicit than this. Our Lord is to come again, in the same manner that He went on high. He is the Head of the Church—thus the Church must be raised and associated with its Head in everything: in suffering, in life, in judgment, in dominion, and in glory. "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken their (your) mortal bodies" (Rom. 8 : 11). And they being thus associated with Him, He makes them sharers of all He is and has.

When He judges the world and angels, the Church will judge the world and angels with Him. When He rules the nations with a rod of iron, the Church will rule them with the rod of iron also. When He appears in glory to the world, the Church "shall appear with Him in glory" also. When He reigns, the Church will also reign with Him. When He comes forth with a sharp sword out of His mouth, to tread "the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God" (Rev. 19 : 15), the saints as the armies of heaven will come forth with Him. Christ must take His inheritance as "Head of the body, the Church." He is not perfected for His inheritance until the Church is thus associated with Him; for it is "the fulness of him that filleth all in all" (Eph. 1 : 23). In one sense, indeed, the Church is thus associated with Him now; but the time for its full, perfect recognition will not occur till He comes to take her to Himself before the judgments are poured upon the earth.

Enoch, the type of the Church, "by faith was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God" (Heb. 11 : 5). He was not left to see the world reach the climax of its wickedness and the judgment of God poured out upon it. He saw not "the fountains of the great deep broken up," nor "the windows of heaven opened." He was taken away before any of these things occurred; and he stands before the eye of faith as a beautiful figure of those who "shall not all sleep, but shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye" (1 Cor. 15 ; 51, 52).

TRANSLATION, NOT DEATH, was the hope of Enoch; and as to the hope of the Church, it is thus briefly expressed by the apostle, "To wait for his Son from heaven" (1 Thess. 1 : 10). The Church knows that her entire justification is through the death and resurrection of Christ, and she waits for the day when He shall come and receive her to Himself. She through the Spirit waits for the hope of righteousness by faith (Gal. 5 : 5). She does not wait for righteousness inasmuch as she by grace has that already; but she waits for the hope which properly belongs to the condition into which she has been introduced.

We are assured that "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17). And again, "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed" (1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52). These passages show that the first resurrection takes place when the Lord comes for His saints; and that His coming is the present hope of the Church. Hence our Lord says, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately" (Luke 12 : 35, 36). And Paul commends the Thessalonian saints because they had "turned to God from idols, to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven."

Jesus, the Head, is in heaven; the body, the Church, is here. By the Holy Ghost constant communication is maintained between the Head and its members. By the same Spirit are ever flowing from the glorified Lord, life, joy, peace, and every other spiritual blessing.

Isaac, of old, in type, as if risen from the dead, came forth to meet his bride, Rebecca, escorted by Eliezer; so the Holy Ghost is the guide of this heavenly bride homeward. And when God's time has fully come, that same Spirit by whom our dead spirits have been quickened will also quicken our mortal bodies, and lift us one and all up to meet the Lord in the air. Here is our hope.

Many passages of Scripture can be quoted from the New Testament referring to the coming of the Lord, either for or with His saints. On an average, one verse out of every twenty-five refers to Christ's coming. Some of them are very significant indeed. In the last four addresses to the seven churches in Revelation, chaps. 2 and 3, the Lord's coming holds either in the shape of encouragement or of warning. Till the rapture, the Church should be watching and waiting, looking and longing for the Bridegroom to come.

It is well to notice, in the last chapter of Revelation, "I come quickly" is said three times, and is designed for our consideration; first, to see well to our walk; secondly, to see to our work; and thirdly, for our hearts to watch for Him. The first time, seventh verse, he adds, "Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of this book." Then the practical application is given in the twelfth verse, "My reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." But in the twentieth verse, the third time the words are uttered, there is nothing said about our walk or our work. Here He assumes that He Himself is to us "the chiefest among ten thousand" and the One "altogether lovely." So this cry is for our hearts, yes, for our all; as He has loved us, has died for us, has sanctified us, has cleansed us, has nourished us, has cherished us, and soon He is to present us to Himself as His bride.

What an exalted, what a blissful destiny awaits the children of God! Oh, that our hearts were more moved by this fact now! Are we looking for the coming of the Bridegroom? Do we long to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump? May our hearts be established in His love, and we be encouraged and cheered with the prospect of His coming and of our change, that we may forever be with the Lord! "For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry" (Heb. 10 : 37).

* It is not the method in Holy Scripture to predict two events as if they were naturally consecutive, when in reality the failure of the first is to be the occasion of the second. The hope held out to the Bride, up to the time of Christ's rejection, was that of earthly union with her Lord. But when the Lord "came unto his own, and his own received him not," then the "mystery" which had been hidden was revealed, and a higher glory than had been set before the seed of Abraham was presented to the Church. Nevertheless, all the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and to their children, will be fulfilled when they who rejected Christ turn again and say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23 : 39). This is indisputably proved by Ezek. 20 : 34, 42; 34 : 13, 14; Zech. 12 : 6; 14 : 11; and other passages which may be found by means of the marginal references.—ED.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Inauguration of Gen. J. A. Garfield, on Friday, March 4th, as President of the United States was accompanied by a stately and imposing ceremony. The weather was extremely unpropitious, but in spite of that circumstance an assemblage rarely equalled in numbers and character gathered to witness the inauguration of the twentieth citizen who has been called to the highest position in the gift of his country. Among the distinguished personages present General Hancock was conspicuous. It argues a high degree of personal good nature and nobility of spirit that the man who only missed the high honor of the Presidency by so small a margin, should voluntarily unite in the rejoicings and festivities of his rival's induction to office.

Expressions of regret were heard in many quarters that the severe simplicity of the inaugurations of our earlier Presidents had given place to martial display and a procession in which the military element was conspicuous, thus giving the ceremony a character more in accord with the monarchical coronations of Europe than with republican institutions. It may, however, be remarked in extenuation if not in defence of the innovation that the occasion was one calling for exceptional rejoicing. For more than twenty years the inaugural ceremonies have been marred by depressing circumstances. The condition of the South prior to 1877, and the fears of a civil outbreak in that year, owing to the peculiar circumstances of Mr. Hayes's elevation to office, rendered the quadrennial celebration somewhat gloomy. But this year, through the goodness of God, the nation has entered on more auspicious times, and the unwonted pageantry may be regarded as an expression of national delight and gratitude.

The New President's Inaugural Address has been received with general satisfaction. It is not eloquent nor ornate, but it is marked by strong common-sense, and by a clear perception of what is right and best for the nation. If the policy of the ensuing four years is an embodiment of the principles the President laid down in his address, it is safe to predict that his administration will have earned, and will receive the cordial good-will of the vast majority of the people

Mr. Garfield opened his remarks with a rapid review of the events of the century of American independence. "Even from this brief review," he said, "it is manifest that the nation is resolutely facing to the front, resolved to employ its best energies in developing the great possibilities of the future. Sacredly preserving whatever has been gained to liberty and good government during the century, our people are determined to leave behind them all those bitter controversies concerning things which have been irrevocably settled and the further discussion of which can only stir up strife and delay the onward march."

Having thus indicated the general principles he intended to be the guiding forces of his administration the new President dealt with particular questions, including the currency, the civil service, the tariff, and the Mormon question, on all of which he reiterated the doctrines he held when in Congress. The President concluded with the following solemn words, to which, especially to the final reverent invocation, every Christian citizen will add a responsive amen :

"Finally, acting always within the authority and limitations of the Constitution, invading neither the rights of the States nor the reserved rights of the people, it will be the purpose of my Administration to maintain the authority and in all places within its jurisdiction to enforce obedience to all the laws of the Union in the interests of the people ; to demand rigid economy in all the expenditures of the Government, and to require the honest and faithful service of all executive officers, remembering that the offices were created not for the benefit of incumbents or their supporters, but for the service of the Government.

"And now, fellow-citizens, I am about to assume the great trust which you have committed to my hands. I appeal to you for that earnest and thoughtful support which makes this Government in fact, as it is in law, a Government of the people. I shall greatly rely upon the wisdom and patriotism of Congress and of those who may share with me the responsibilities and duties of administration. And above all, upon our efforts to promote the welfare of this great people and their Government I reverently invoke the support and blessing of Almighty God."

Mr. Hayes Signalized the Last Day of his administration by a prompt veto of the Funding Bill. In justification of a step so decisive as that of vetoing the measure which has occupied more of the time of Congress during the session than any other question, Mr. Hayes said : "While in my opinion it would be wise to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to offer to the public bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest in aid of refunding, I should not deem it my duty to interpose my constitutional objection to the passage of the present bill, if it did not contain in its fifth section provisions which, in my judgment, seriously impair the value and tend to the destruction of the present National banking system of the country." Mr. Hayes urged Congress in view of the importance of the measure to pass a new bill even on the last day of its existence ; but such a procedure was clearly impracticable. Congress was pledged to the three per-cent rate, and that being settled, the fifth section was a necessity. The banks might not have taken the new bonds at all, unless compelled to do so by the fifth section.

The Close of Mr. Hayes's Term of Office ought not to pass into history without a reverent acknowledgment of God's overruling loving-kindness and watchful care. Four years ago we stood on the brink of a period which even faithful Christians could not anticipate without apprehension and foreboding. The administration came in with a doubt on its title, with but a wavering support from its friends, and with the bitter hostility of enemies, exasperated by the methods employed to place it in office. The national bark was among breakers, and there was mutiny among the crew. But God averted the threatened disaster, and the nation has during Mr. Hayes's term of office received from the Divine Giver of all good an abundant blessing. She stands to-day happier and more prosperous than at any former period of her history.

The administration made many mistakes, and is responsible for acts its friends deplore, but its record judged now that it passes from the present into the past is one of a generally creditable character. Under it, the wounds of civil war have healed rapidly; Resumption has been achieved, and the National Debt largely reduced ; Civil Service Reform has advanced through its most critical initial stage ; and a general freedom from grosser forms of corruption has been manifested. In addition to this, Mrs. Hayes inaugurated a Temperance Reform in the White House, which has given countenance and encouragement to other reformers, and has given an impetus to the advance of total abstinence principles in other official residences. For these blessings, as for the abundant harvests God has given us, a nation's thanks go up to the Almighty Ruler of the World, and in spite of the odium which attached to the administration, it will be associated in the memories of the people with recollections of not a few good deeds and the dawn of returning prosperity.

The Cabinet Nominations sent to the Senate on Saturday, and promptly confirmed, indicate how difficult a task cabinet-making is in the present condition of the Republican Party. Not only had geographical considerations to be taken into account, but the divisions of the party into Grant and anti-Grant men had to be remembered. President Garfield had no desire for a repetition of the scenes which agitated the early days of Mr. Hayes's administration, and which down to the very last day of his term threatened to burst out in flame. The President has endeavored to please everybody by selecting his men impartially from different places and sections of the party, so that each name may be taken as representative not so much of special ability as of political associations. The task of constructing the Cabinet being so beset with dangers and difficulties it is not surprising that some of the appointments recall the aphorism of a great General about square pegs in round holes.

Mr. Blaine takes the portfolio of Secretary of State, the office of Premier having probably been offered to him on account of his having been the principal rival of Mr. Garfield at Chicago. Mr. Windom, of Minnesota, becomes Secretary of the Treasury in spite of some utterances which have caused a feeling of uneasiness in business circles. It is said that the appointment was endorsed, if not recommended, by Mr. Sherman, which fact, if true, may tend to allay anxiety. Mr. William H. Hunt, of Louisiana, is Secretary of the Navy, an appointment which the South will probably accept as a recognition of its claims. Mr. Robert T. Lincoln, of Illinois, the son of President Lincoln, becomes Secretary of War, and is spoken of as an able man of strong Grant proclivities. Mr. MacVeagh, of Pennsylvania, a relative of the Cameron family, becomes Attorney-General, and Mr. Samuel J. Kirkwood, of Iowa, undertakes the arduous duties of Secretary of the Interior.

The claims of New York on the new President were strong, for to the vote of that State he owed his election. He has, however, recognized them in a somewhat "left-handed" fashion by making Mr. Thomas L. James Postmaster-General. There is no doubt that Mr. James will be the most efficient Postmaster-General it was possible to select, and New York will feel the loss of his services more than the honor of his selection. It was hoped that the principal commmercial centre of the Union might have furnished the Secretary of the Treasury, but from the first, the President decided for some inscrutable reason, that that office must go to the West.

The Cabinet so made up has been accepted with moderate satisfaction by the organs of public opinion. It is not particularly brilliant nor strong, but it has political ability in Mr. Blaine and administrative ability in Mr. James, and is entitled to ask that the country wait for results before deciding on its merits.

Ex-President Hayes in a Railroad Disaster,— The train by which the ex-President travelled from Washington toward his home at Fremont, O., was wrecked soon after passing Baltimore on March 5th. It was travelling at the rate of forty miles an hour, when on rounding a curve near Severn Station, eleven miles from Baltimore, the engineer saw a train approaching in an opposite direction, and moving at the same rate of speed as his own. He immediately shut off steam and reversed his engine, but it was too late to avert the collision. The two trains came together with a terrific crash, and the three engines with several cars were turned into a heap of ruins. Two men were killed on the spot, and twenty others were so severely injured that it is thought some of them cannot recover. The occupants of the ex-President's car were thrown from their seats and sustained a few bruises but were otherwise uninjured. Mr. Hayes hurried from the car as soon as the disaster was realized, and assisted in extricating the injured passengers.

Twenty Thousand Dollars for Sunday-school work.—The Rev. W. P. Paxson, superintendent at the South-west for the Sunday-school Union, in a recent address at Boston, stated that Mr. George Bennett, now living in Massachusetts, formerly of St. Louis, had given $1000 a year for twenty years for the support of Sunday-school missionaries at the West, and that by means of this money it had become possible to organize 3290 schools, with more than 140,000 scholars.

A Man Lost his Life at Pittsburg, Pa., through an inadvertence of his fellow-workmen on February 19th. He was an employé in Messrs. Robinson & Rea's foundry, and during an interval of work he entered a large oven on the premises to warm himself, as the weather was bitterly cold. Some of the workmen seeing the door of the oven open and not knowing of their companion's presence in the oven, closed it. The entrapped man could not open the door from the inside, and although he cried loudly, his voice was drowned by the noises of the foundry. When the workmen went to the oven again in the course of their duties he was found almost unconscious, baked into a hideous spectacle, and he died in a short time. The incident, singular as it is, in the affairs of life has many parallels in the affairs of the soul. Men go into places apparently harmless for the sake of a little fleeting pleasure, and suddenly discover that they are where "none that go return again."

A Desperate Struggle between a Tramp and a man delirious from suffering occurred at Reading, Pa., on February 23d. The sick man was a small-pox patient, and was insane and frantic from pain. A telegram to the New York Herald says: "His face and body were literally covered with small-pox sores. His clothing was muddy and torn. The inmates of the farmhouses barred their gates and doors in terror and prevented his coming among them. The community was in absolute terror. No one would venture near the man. He was tall and well built, and seemed to be extremely powerful. He tore down several fences enclosing front yards so as to enter the houses. Finally a tramp, who gave his name as Henry Borden, came along the road. Borden was also a very powerful man. Fully aware of the ailment of the madman, Borden seized him by his right wrist and commanded him to go with him. He struggled desperately, but the tramp succeeded in dragging the sufferer more dead than alive to the poorhouse, where he was admitted to the small-pox ward. The tramp's courage and determination not only prevented the spread of the infection, but may result in saving the man's life." Though physical force has no place in the campaign of the Gospel against sin, yet to the poor sin-sick souls the Christian is sent with the command, "Compel them to come in."

A Brutal Exhibition, in the Way of a Dog fight, took place on Sunday, February 27th, on Long Island, between two imported bull-dogs, an Irish one, owned in Philadelphia, and an English one, owned in this city. The fight lasted over five hours and was savagely contested. It was witnessed by about one hundred persons. For the first two hours little advantage was gained by either dog, though both were terribly injured about the head and throat. At the end of the third hour the Philadelphia dog seemed to have the advantage, but suddenly the New York dog caught hold of the other's jaw and held on for over an hour. The one hundred persons who found pleasure in witnessing an exhibition so brutal must have sunk to a very low and degraded level of humanity. Satan may be supposed to delight in the spectacle of the horrors of mortal combat, and it would seem that men exist who partake largely of the diabolical character.

Seven Weeks under a Snowdrift is the Explanation given of a disappearance which has occasioned agonizing suspense at a farm near West Chester, Pa. On Christmas night a young man and his sister returned to their home in a sleigh. The young lady went into the house while her brother drove on to the barn to unharness the horse. That was the last that was seen of him. As he did not appear after some time the sister went to the barn, but found neither her brother nor the horse. The sleigh, detached, stood near. In the morning the horse was found in the stable, quite wet, particles of ice and snow frozen to him, and his feed little eaten, as though he had been there only a short time. The young man was nowhere to be found. Parties of men searched the fields, and dug into the deep drifts, until at length the quest was abandoned.

On February 12th, as the farmer looked from his window he saw a fragment of clothing in a drift near the house, and on examination the body of his son was found there, having lain seven weeks there undiscovered. Water running under the snow had encased the body in ice, and it lay at full length on its face, frozen stiff, and perfectly preserved. The discovery overwhelmed the family with grief. Similar sorrow has been caused in other houses by spiritual catastrophes. Young men full of promise, almost Christians, have gone into city life, and under its chilling, benumbing influence have fallen into a state of spiritual death.

A Mysterious Poisonous Plant Caused the death of two youths in Pennsylvania recently. They resided in a suburb of York, and went out together on February 12th to catch driftwood on the Codorus Creek. One cake of ice which floated near the shore was observed by the boys to have embedded near its surface a root which they supposed to be sweet amaria. This root is sweet, succulent, farinaceous, and palatable. The lads hooked in the ice, secured the root, and dividing it began eating greedily. In an hour afterward they were seized with violent fits of vomiting, headache, and convulsions, causing both most terrible misery. They ejected from the mouth quantities of white frothy matter, deeply tinged with blood, and neither seemed possessed of any of his faculties after the convulsions set in. Medical aid was promptly summoned, but the active workings of the poison would not admit of any emetic or antidote. Their bodies and facial muscles were contorted into every conceivable shape, and their suffering increased constantly until death.

The name of the plant is unknown, and the boys were too ill to give any clue to its appearance. The sad event will however make other boys in the neighborhood more careful in eating such things. Would that the fate of those who go to eternal death through their fondness for poisonous literature, might deter young people from perusing it.

Dr. Deems wore an Eastern Headdress Something like a Turkish fez, when he landed in England on his return from his tour in the Holy Land. In this guise he inquired from a Londoner what omnibus he should take to convey him to a distant suburb, where a minister lived on whom he wished to call. The Londoner, assuming from the Doctor's headgear that he was a native of an Oriental clime, said to him, "You speak English very well." When Dr. Deems arrived at his destination he received a warm welcome, the Christian minister recognizing in him a closer bond than the faultless pronunciation of their common tongue, that bond of brotherhood which unites all lovers of the Lord Jesus. Writing of him in an English journal the minister said, "We were not long in discovering that Dr. Deems is a man of remarkable intelligence and peculiar devoutness of spirit; he is, moreover, able to combine all that is most delightful in social relationship with the preservation of a deeply sacred feeling. We were struck with this thought again and again, for though we often laughed at his wit, we were constantly reminded that he was a devoted minister of the Gospel."

A Portrait of Mr. Philip Phillips, the Singing pilgrim, will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with a sketch of his life. This renowned worker in the Christian field who, as Dr. Talmage said in a recent announcement, "has sung his way clear around the world," has spent a very eventful life, the details of which are exceedingly interesting, and include incidents of visits to the Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, British India, Palestine, Egypt, Italy, Austria, and Great Britain. Mr. Phillips commences an engagement on March 14th at the Brooklyn Tabernacle where he will assist Dr. Talmage in his revival services.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he said, My presence shall go with thee and I will give thee rest."—EXODUS 33 : 14.

Will God go with Sinners?—The Mediation of Moses—The Divine Presence Promised—I. The Benefits Derived from it—1. An Acknowledgment of the People—2. Implies Preservation and Protection—3. Direction and Guidance—Judicious Stupidity—4. Real Worship—5. Communion—II. Its Demands—For Reliance—For Use—Care Lest it be Lost—III. The Blessing Appended to it—Rest—Will You Rest in the Grave?—The Rest of the Tired Laborer—Present Rest Given—The Chained Enemy.

MAY the inexpressibly precious promises of our text be fulfilled to every one of you throughout the whole of your lives. What could heart desire, or mind conceive beyond the heaped-up blessedness of my text? God's presence and God's rest—a ring of finest gold set with the choicest pearl. The benedictions are worthy of God Himself, and such as only His boundless love could have uttered. Think them over, and use them as food for your souls; with them you may well be content even if the preacher's lips should be as a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. You do not need any sermon: only let the Holy Spirit speak these words with power, as coming directly from the great Father's lips to you, and your inmost soul will be satisfied as with marrow and fatness.

"Enough, my gracious Lord,
Let faith triumphant cry;
My heart can on this promise live,
Can on this promise die."

"My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

It is instructive to remember that a very short time before this promise was given, the Israelites had greatly grieved their God by setting up an image of gold, before which they prostrated themselves, saying, "These be thy gods, O Israel." They had seen the greatness and glory of God at the Red Sea, and during their journey in the wilderness up to that time, and yet they were so be sotted that they bowed in worship before the image of an ox which eateth grass.

We do not marvel that the living God was angry, but we are filled with astonishment that, after such wanton provocation, He should, nevertheless, turn away His wrath from them and say to them—for the promise was not to Moses only, but to them as a people—"My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." Will God, then, go with sinners, with those who have provoked Him so grossly, with those who have sinned against light and knowledge in so shameful a manner? Will He put away the iniquity of great offenders, and speak comfortably unto them? Yes, He will, for He is slow to wrath, and bears with our ill manners for many a day.

There is a secret, which must never be for gotten—namely, that Moses had made mightily prevalent intercession for the people, crying with many tears, "Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written." He had gone up into the fiery mount, even up into the eternal presence; and there he had in will—though it was not accepted in deed—offered himself as a sacrifice for the nation in that memorable sentence, "If not, blot my name out of the book which thou hast written."

If then we should carefully search to the bottom of things we shall find that it was by virtue of the Mediator that this promise was given to Israel, and God thus spake to Moses and the people. Atonement had been made, intercession had been offered, and hence was guaranteed and rest was promised. This is the only ground upon which God can dwell with you and with me and give us rest: an Advocate, one of a thousand, has stood in the gap, presented His life for our life, obtained favor of the Lord, and turned away indignation by the power of His intercession. God in Christ Jesus has come down to dwell with sinful men; and that presence will never be removed from us, for He saith, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come unto you."

It may be that I am addressing some who are about leaving this congregation for other assemblies at a distance; and, if so, I hope I may be the bearer of seasonable comforts. I have spoken to some just now whose faces we may not perhaps see again, who are going far away, to their great sorrow, and to our intense regret. I saw the tear when they bade good-by to us, and to the house they have loved so well. Go in peace, and God be with you, my beloved. What more can I say? You are going to leave your native land: whether you shall ever return to it again is written in the decree of Providence, but is all unknown to you. Little need you mind, for we are all exiles, and are journeying toward the dear fatherland, where we shall be at home forever.

Others, it may be, are now making a very important change in life: shifting their habitation, or looking out for another occupation altogether. Many of us here who are serving the Lord are going forward to fresh work, planning new service for the Lord. At such a time this word will be peculiarly precious to all in a changing state, if the Holy Spirit will lay it home to their hearts: "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." Come, then, ye who bid farewell to old England's shores, ye who move to a strange family, ye who in any sense remove your tents and advance toward the unknown land—come, I say, and listen to these gentle accents, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

We will think of the subject in this way: First, what are the benefits of this presence? Secondly, to be practical, what are the demands of this presence if we come to enjoy it? And then, thirdly, what is the choice blessing which is appended to this presence—"I will give thee rest?"

I. First, then,

WHAT ARE THE BENEFITS

of the divine presence which is here promised? "My presence shall go with thee."

1. The first is manifest in the chapter. It is the acknowledgment of the people as being peculiarly the Lord's. Notice, Moses puts it thus, "Wherein shall it be known here that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight? Is it not in that thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth." This clearly shows that the presence of God with His people is God's way of acknowledging them, and saying to all mankind and to themselves, "These are my people, and I am their God."

Now, my dear fellow-believer, what clearer acknowledgment of you by God can you conceive of than that God should be present with you? I think you cannot ask a surer, better seal than this; and if you have it not I cannot see what can be a token of peace to you at all. Is God never with you? Are you never conscious of His presence? Let me ask you to judge your case as if it were mine: can I be a sheep in His fold if the shepherd never comes to me? Can I be a child of the family if I have never had my heart warmed with my Father's love, and have never heard my Father's voice speaking comfortably to me? The saints are married unto Christ, but that were a strange conjugal union in which there was no sort of converse or communion whatsoever.

If I go forth to the business of the day and never recognize God; if I come home at night and have never seen God's hand with me; if I go to my bed and never, ere I sleep, have a kind word from Him, then, surely, I cannot be one of His: I lack the acknowledgment which the great Father must and will give to His own children.

2. Secondly, it is by that presence that we are preserved and protected. When Israel came out of Egypt the Egyptians followed hard behind them. Pharaoh was fierce to slay them or to drive them back again; but he could not touch them. They came not nigh one another all that night, because the Lord descended and like an impenetrable shield of darkness turned Himself upon the enemy, while like a sun He turned the brightness of His glory upon His people. The presence of God enabled Israel to pass through the sea on dry foot, and that same presence brought down the floods upon their foes and swept them away.

I think every child of God must acknowledge how safe he has been when he has enjoyed the divine presence. When you get out of that presence you are liable to temptations which in the divine presence scarcely come to you, or, if they come, they are shaken off as trifles which have no power over you. When we dwell in God the baser passions lie still—like the beasts in Noah's ark, they cause no uproar; but when God is gone those baser passions rush to the front, and the inferior appetites and propensities try to get the mastery over us, and cause us all sorts of trouble.

In the commonest transactions of life we shall blunder and transgress if we move without the Lord, for the presence of God is the sole protection of saints. Our sanctity depends upon communion with God. Like the moon, we are bright while the sun shines on us; all our glory is borrowed from our Lord. Oh, how blessed is the promise, then, if we view it in that light, for we all wish to be preserved from the defilement of the world, and this is the one golden method of sanctity, "My presence shall go with thee."

3. There is a third privilege which the presence of God brought to Israel, and brings to us: it is that of

DIRECTION AND GUIDANCE.

Their route lay through a wilderness without a track-way, and they could not have known which way to go except the fiery cloudy pillar, which was the index of the presence of God, had gone before them. Their path was a very strange one as it was, winding in and out, backward and forward; but "He led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation." Such is our pathway to the skies, a maze, a tangle, to ourselves; but all plain to the All-wise. You and I know nothing of what is going to happen to us between here and heaven; nay, we cannot tell what will occur within an hour; but some amazing blessing may come.

I have no doubt you, my brethren, have had in your own lifetime days of surprises. You have been jogging along the ordinary road of life pretty comfortably, you never thought of what was going to happen; but you have come to a place where the road suddenly diverged, and from that instant new scenes have opened up before you. You hardly knew whether you were to go to the right or to the left, and you were at your wits' end as you pulled up, for there was no sign-post, and no mark to guide you. At such times, if the presence of God has been with you, you have not been left to ask the way; but that ancient promise has become true in your experience. "Thine ears shall hear a voice behind thee saying, This is the way: walk ye in it."

If God were not there it would have been superstition; but as God was really there, and you are one with whom He has become so graciously familiar that He gives to you the Urim and the Thummim, and reveals to you his light and his truth to guide you, there was no superstition or fanaticism in it. Oh, the soft, sweet guidances of the royal presence; they have made my life radiant; like all His other gentlenesses, they have made me great. "He leadeth me," and yet again "He leadeth me," is one of the most joyous notes of my song of loves.

Ah, if the Lord be not with us, it is extraordinary what muddles we make. I have sometimes had very, very difficult things to do, and I have accomplished them with ease under the Lord's own eye, but if I am without my Lord's presence I give very bad advice, and I most judiciously do very stupid things, and most prudently follow a course which everybody would say was prudent, but which turns out to be imprudent. I have noticed—and I often have to bless God for it—that when I have felt myself to be quite done over and nonplussed, I have simply asked guidance, and something has occurred to me which I had never thought of before; or something which I had thought of and rejected, but which was the best, has occurred strongly to my mind again; or somebody else has come in and taken the leadership and put me aside; but somehow or other God has been glorified, and I have been happy when I have had His presence.

I am sure that every believer will find it so in daily life; wherein the first thing is not to have common-sense and to be wise, as some say, but to have a sense of God's presence, which is better than common-sense, and to trust in Him for guidance, which is better than being shrewd. He will make the young men wise and prudent; He will give to babes knowledge and discretion, if they are but willing to be led by His divine instruction. You will find it so if you have His presence with you; but if you have not, you will do just as the Israelites did about the matter of the Gibeonites, which seemed too simple to pray about. You will be taken in with those mouldy crusts and those clouted shoes, and those crafty rascals that say, "We come from a far country," and without taking counsel with God you will find yourself in fellowship with a brood of scheming Canaanites, who will entangle you and do you no end of harm. You will say, "Oh, but they are such nice old people, and it is wonderful how religiously they talk, and how nicely they persuade me to their side." Yes, when Satan would deceive, his traps are very simple ones, such as you would never think to be traps at all.

When you are quite clear about a thing pray about it: when you are in difficulty do as you like. I believe in that fine piece of advice—"When it is a fine day in this country carry an umbrella with you. When it is raining hard do just as you like." I put it into another shape, and beg you to remember it. "Why," you say, "the matter is as plain as the nose on my face." Then pray to God about it, for the nose on your face may bring you trouble. He that trusts to his own understanding may turn out to have very little understanding to trust to. Take plain matters to God. Get into the presence of God, and keep there, and see all things in the light of that presence: that will be to you instinct, common-sense, judgment, wisdom.

4. We have thus seen that rich blessings are found in the presence of God—divine acknowledgment, divine protection, and divine direction; but there was another thing that Israel had by virtue of the presence of God, and that was, in the wilderness. Their sacrifices could not have been presented if God had not been among them. There would not have been the tabernacle, with all its appurtenances, if God had not been there. God would not have commanded them to build Him a house that He did not intend to inhabit, and He would not have instituted ordinances which He did not mean to fill up by His presence. If it be imaginable that there should be a tabernacle with all the outward gear of it, and sacrifices even until rivers of the blood of fed beasts should be poured out, yet it would have been all an empty, hollow sham if God had not Himself been there.

No worship will do us good, or can be accepted with God, except the Lord be present with us in it. When you live in the presence of God how delightful worship is! You can wrestle with the angel and hold him when you are sure he is there; but if he is not there you cannot wrestle with him, or even hold him. You can go forth to preach right bravely when you go in the strength of the Lord God to make mention of His righteousness, even of that only; but if the Lord go not with the minister what a vain-glorious place the pulpit is and what empty stuff our talk must be.

5. Once more, If God had withdrawn from Israel there would have been no communion with Him. God's presence meant communion with God. The Israelites could speak with God through their priests when He was in the midst of them, but if He had departed all fellowship would have closed. And is not that one of the greatest enjoyments of a child of God—that he can speak to his Father whenever he desires it? No child, I think, as a rule asks leave to speak to his father, but feels an unquestioned freedom on that point.

I did go some time ago into a house where I sat with the head of the family, and heard a hum ble knock at the door: it was his wife, who asked if she might come in, but her lord and master spoke somewhat sharply, and she went away. I heard afterward one of the girls come to knock at the door to know whether she might come in, and I wondered at it, because it is rather unusual nowadays for a man to be lord enough, but this gentleman was lord too much by a long way. I thank God that I have never seen more than one instance in which a wife or a child was called upon humbly to knock at the door before she could come into the majestic presence of her husband or her father.

I have always enjoyed the respect of my sons, but it has never occurred to them to ask leave to speak to me. Yet many professed Christians treat their heavenly Father in that way: they are afraid of Him, and dare not tell Him all their hearts. But this is just the sweet privilege of a dear child, that he may turn his eye to the great Father whenever he pleases, and have a private audience with the King of kings at any hour of the day or night.

Strangers may not do this; strangers must get an introduction; strangers must come with a great deal of ceremony if they want to see a king, but the little prince does not need any usher of the black rod to introduce him to his sire. The believer's relation to his Father is a key which opens every door. We are on familiar terms with the great God, as it is written, "I will dwell in them and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." In another place He puts it thus: "They shall be My sons and daughters." Oh, sweet word—"My sons and daughters." This is a privilege which is secured to us by the presence of God.

That is the first point.

II. The second head shall not occupy much time, but I hope that it will be hammered out into a lifelong sermon, preached by yourselves. What are

THE DEMANDS OF THIS PRESENCE?

Supposing that the divine presence shall go with us, what then?

Why, first it is needful that we rely upon it. Beloved, if the presence of God be with us, do not let us act as if it were not with us, or as if it were not worth much although it is with us. If God's presence is with us, what have we to be afraid of? Where is the excuse for our spirit being cast down? If God's presence be with us why do we talk about difficulties? That word should not be in our dictionary now that omnipotence is at our right hand. If God's presence be with us, why should we speak about fears? Whom shall we fear? "Thou art the strength of my life. Of whom shall I be afraid?"

Oh, let this presence of God be real to you, if you are enjoying it. Do not talk about it, and then speak as if you were all alone, and go forth to your work, saying, "I am not strong enough." What, not if the Lord is with you? Do set down your God at a right figure in all your calculations; that is to say, if you can find a figure that will represent Him. What is your strength? A unit. Well, if you like, you may make a cipher of it, for that is nearer the truth. But what is God's strength? Oh, you may carry it up to the *n*th, as we say in algebra. You may work it out to the utmost conceivable limit, but you will never get a figure that will come near expressing the power of the presence of God.

"I am with you"—"I," and the universe echoes to the voice, as the words "I AM" roll in thunder peals along the heavens. "I have formed the earth and laid its foundations, and upreared the arches of the sky. I am with you, with My omnipotence, omniscience, all-sufficiency." Well, if that be so, rely upon it; stay yourself upon God, and do not play the fool by being dismayed and cast down.

In the next place, if we have His presence, let us use it. Every now and then we meet with persons who have thousands of pounds, and yet are half starved. We have heard of two great lords who were spending the evening together at a coffee-house, and the bill came to an odd sum and they quarrelled about who should pay the odd farthing, till one of the waiters said, "Come up here! Here are two lords worth fifty thousand a year each, and they are quarrelling about a farthing." That was a strange sight; but have you not seen Christian people behaving quite as inconsistently? They have the revenues of the universe to spend, and yet they starve themselves by the little enjoyment that they dare to take? Of heavenly food they live upon a crumb a day.

They are just like the elder brother who said to his father, "These many years do I serve thee; neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends." You remember his father's answer. He said, "Thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. If you have not eaten all the goats, it is your own fault. You might have been as merry with your friends as you liked, for all that I have is thine."

And so may the Lord often reproach His people. "I am with you, but you do not use me. You do not exercise faith in me as to the mountains which lie before you, which should become plains if you left them to me. You do not leave me your sycamine trees, for me to pluck them up by the roots. I can do all things, and here you are using this poor feeble arm of yours with all its wasting, aching sinews, when there is an everlasting arm which would be made bare for your defence, and which would shake heaven and earth rather than fail to bring you deliverance." Why, brethren? Why are we so slow to believe? Oh, if you have the presence of God, utilize it.

And then, next, if you have the presence of God, do not grieve Him: do not lose it. In the presence of a king men behave themselves. Have you never known, as a boy, when you have been up to some little trick, some one has said, "Hush, here is father coming;" and you have stopped your game at once. Oh, how reverently, how cautiously, how jealously, how holily ought we to behave ourselves who are in the presence of God!

And, oh, when you have the presence of God, do take care to glorify Him all that you possibly can. Does He deign to dwell in you? Then lay yourself out for His honor. Seek out those who have lost His company, and go and cheer them. Find out all the daughters of sorrow, all the backsliders and wanderers, and all the poor sinners that are on the wild mountains, and seek to bring them where you are yourself—into the presence of the gracious Three in One. I think that if we do not work at any other season, we certainly should do so when we are abiding in the light of His countenance.

Thus you see that the presence of God has its demands.

III. My time has gone, and therefore I must say only two or three words about that last word of promise. What is which is appended to this presence? "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

In this particular text we must confine the "rest" to the end of the journey, for Israel were to have their rest in Canaan; and so the promise was, "My presence shall go with you through the wilderness, and I will give you rest in the land that floweth with milk and honey."

Beloved, it were no narrowing of the promise if we were to limit it to that sense to-night. If God's presence be with us here, we shall be in God's presence hereafter, and there we shall have rest. To those who work very, very hard, as some of you do, the thought of an everlasting rest is very pleasant. But perhaps some of you have never been converted. I want to put this thought into your mind: Will you rest? Will you rest at last? They will lay your bones in the cemetery, and apparently you will rest; but will you rest?

OH, WILL YOU REST?

Do you think you can rest if you die with unforgiven sin? Can you rest if you die unreconciled to God? Ah, no. "There is no peace, saith my God, unto the wicked. They are like the troubled sea, which cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." Only think if that should be your portion forever and ever—never to rest, but to be like the troubled sea, foaming, raging, and tossed about throughout eternity! God grant, dear hearer, that such a fearful unrest may not be your portion. But oh, if you will trust in Jesus, and value His presence with you here, what sweet rest there will be above!

I have heard some people speak about the rest of heaven as though it were only a bribe to lazy people. They sneer at the idea of rest, but those people who do not desire rest are unacquainted with hard work. I am persuaded of that. Your lackadaisical ladies and gentlemen, who never did a stroke of work in all their lives, and could not if they tried, may despise but to many of us that Scripture is most pleasant, "There remaineth a rest for the people of God."

HEAVEN AS A REST,

The idea of service is, undoubtedly, very sweet—eternal service—very sweet to the strong, active young Christian; but I tell you that when you get older, and when your heads often ache with anxious care, and oftentimes you are worn down in the service of your Master, you will get more inclined to look upon heaven as a place of rest, and you will thank God that the Holy Spirit was not quite so hard as these fine ladies and gentlemen, but did speak to us of heaven as a place where the saints shall rest from their labors and their works shall follow them.

We do not know where we shall go between now and heaven, but we shall get home at last, and then we shall rest. We do not know how much more work we have to do, we cannot tell how often the burden will press our shoulder; but we shall rest one day. "I will give thee rest." Here is a "shall" and a "will." "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." Ah, poor toiler, you shall rest. O poor aching eyes, ye shall rest when ye shall see the King in His beauty. O poor aching brain, thou shalt rest when thou shalt have nothing to do but to joy in God, and praise Him day and night in His temple.

But I think that under the Gospel dispensation we may take this promise in a far wider sense. "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest," even now; for "we which have believed do enter into rest." While we are believing we obtain rest, and this is the kind of rest. We have not the rest of inactivity, but that of peace: the Israelites kept journeying on, and yet the Lord was their dwelling-place.

We rest in this way: we are perfectly at ease about everything. As to the future, what have we to do with that? We have not come to it yet. God arranges things to come. As for the present, we "cast our care upon him, for he careth for us." As to our sins, they are gone, dead, buried, lost, and never will be seen again. They cannot be found, for God Himself has cast them behind His back. As for the devil, he is a chained enemy. As for the world, Christ has said, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." As for the needs of the body, He has said, "Thy bread shall be given thee, and thy water shall be sure." As for the needs of the soul, Christ is ours, and all things are ours in Christ. As for our eternal safety, "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified." He will glorify us as certainly as He has justified us.

"All that remains for me
Is but to love and sing,
And wait until the angels come
To bear me to the King."

"My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

JOHN BOWLING, COACHMAN.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER II.

IT is well worth remarking that when John's temper was up, and he thought himself badly used, it was a common practice of his to grow violently benevolent. It wasn't that he thought anything of himself—oh dear no! it was the horses, poor beasts, and their feelings. Opponents of temperance had better make a note of that. Perhaps they would write a tract, entitled "Beer and Benevolence; or Kindness Kindled by the Cup."

I fear, however, that in John's case, his benevolence to his beasts was too often immediately connected with too great a want of it to his master to carry great weight with it. Sometimes, indeed, he was wont to attribute great vindictiveness of spirit to his employers, and to think that they were harboring deadly designs on the poor animals. Neither should it be forgotten that when John was in a good temper, which is only another way of saying that he was unaffected by strong drink, he was wont to give his master a much better character; going so far as to say that he had a good place and intended to stick to it.

Indeed, it must have been so, for John was the most trying of servants when a little overbalanced. At such times he would act in the most self-willed manner. Nothing could please him. And to see John in a fit of the sulks, obeying his master's commands under protest, as it were, and throwing out dark hints as to what would happen if his judgment were overlooked, was a caution. It did try his master exceedingly.

Poor John! he was very miserable; and never more so than when he looked back on his past ill-temper and his moods of grumbling. But he stuck to the cup. Who will be surprised to hear therefore that one fine day John received his dismissal, and with the lamest of characters to help him to another place?

"Cab, sir? Cab, sir?"

I had just come back from my summer holiday, heavily laden with luggage, when the above cries from many lips reached my ears. I ran my eye along the cab-stand in order to pick out, if possible, an obliging face. Who does not know the red-faced cabby, and the dispute which is pretty sure to occur with that beer-drinking individual when you have reached your destination? Before, however, my eye had travelled very far, a tall, portly figure attracted my attention by its seeming familiarity.

"Surely, that's John Bowling," I said to myself.

Though stripped of all livery, and dressed with great meanness, I was not mistaken in the man. It was really John Bowling.

"What a come down!" I thought.

Of course I hired John, who at my call at once recognized me, though somewhat sheepishly, as if he were greatly ashamed of being found sitting upon a cab-box, and driving one sorry-looking nag, apparently used up long ago. Poor John! One could see with half an eye that he had seen better days. The way in which he handled the reins, and grasped the whip, told that plainly enough.

As I was alone, I determined to ride on the box by the side of John, in order that I might hear a part of his later history if he would tell it me.

"You see, sir," said John, after a little drawing out, "when I left the squire's, I left with rayther a poor sort of character, don't you see? So I had to drop down to one 'oss, and to be thankful for that. That didn't improve my temper as you may suppose, sir, and as I couldn't keep out of the public, why, I suppose, I got a regular bear of a fellow. So 'twa'n't very long afore I got turned off there too. In my next place I got down another step. I'm sorry to say I got the sack there too. I gave the 'oss ('twas always wanting medicine, that 'oss; I never seed such a rattle-bones), well, I gave that 'oss wrong stuff, and nearly killed 'im. After that I couldn't get a place at all, and had to take to this line; and this is the biggest tumble of all. 'Tain't my own, sir; I hires it at so much a day, and what I gets over I keeps. 'Tain't much of a living though, sir."

"Bowling," I said, "why on earth don't you give up the drink? It's been your ruin. Come, now, do make up your mind. Although you are not strong enough, there's one who will help you—the Lord Jesus, I mean."

"Well, sir, I've tried; but I'll try again. 'Tain't much good though, I fear."

Here a sudden thought struck me. "You're off on Sundays, I hope, John?"

"Yes, sir; I'm glad to say I am."

"Well, I want you to go every Sunday evening to the hall, near the place your cab was standing to-day. There's preaching going on there, and I'm sure it will do you no harm to drop in. Besides, you can wear any clothes you like, and nobody will notice."

"I'll go, sir," he said emphatically; and after-results showed that he meant it.

What were these after-results? I will tell you.

I was standing one day, about twelve months after, near the same spot where John Bowling was first introduced to my readers, when who should I see, resplendent in the brightest of livery, and seated behind two horses more magnificent if possible than the ones already noticed, but John Bowling. I could hardly believe my eyes at first. The figure was, however, unmistakable. There could be but one John Bowling in the land.

Ascertaining, with some little difficulty, whose was the carriage he drove, and the mews in which he put up, I bent my steps thither at the time he would likely be at home.

I was met by John's old hearty smile, which, before a word had been uttered, spoke volumes for his sobriety. I confess, however, I was not altogether prepared for what he did say.

"I thank God you ever directed me to that preaching place," he said. "I went on the wery Sunday after I met with you, and it was good, sir. Leastways, I call it good now. For, you see, it made me wretcheder than ever at first. There was a little chap there who did all the talking, and as he went on, if he didn't go and turn me inside out. Such regular back-handers I never had in my life. They were regular floorers that little 'un gave me. I tell you, sir, I never thought of the drink being a sin afore. I'd thought it to be a misfortune—a sort of crack-brained thing, but that God ever took any notice of it was quite a revelation to me. I seemed to see it all so clear that night.

"Well, of course I went again; I couldn't help it. And then, sir, the little feller did take on so much 'cause we'd treated the Lord so shameful, and did beg so hard we wouldn't do it again, and show'd us how to keep from doing it, that I just gave in. I say, sir, it was rare good of the Lord Jesus to think about me, wasn't it now? I can't understand it at all, but I believe it, sir. And, somehow, now He's allers coming into my thoughts, and I'm allers hearing His voice a saying, 'John Bowling, I love you; John Bowling, I died for you;' and it make me so happy to think He died for my sins. Do I believe it? Bless you, sir, how can I help it when He said it with His own lips? Aye, I do believe it; and intend to believe it to the end of my days, I do.

"Well, sir, to go on with my story, when I got what folks call 'converted,' I began to look up a bit. I asked God to send me a place, and here I am. Do I take any drink now? Why, sir, rayther not; I'd be a born idiot if I did. No, no, sir; I thinks I knows a thing or two better than that. No, I've told the Lord I'd give it up, and I have given it up; and, God help me, I don't intend to have anything whatsomever to do with it to the end of my days.

"I says now to my brother coachees, says I, 'Give up the drink. It's a bad thing for the temper, and makes you as cantankerous as two sticks. If you care for your character, and wants to keep a good place when you've got it, give up the drink.' And I tells 'em too, says I, 'If you don't mind, drink'll not only lead to losing your place down here, but when you come to die you'll lose a place up in heaven too.'"

THE SEVENTH WEEK.

By T. B. Baines, Esq., of Leeds, England.

The Beginning of the Week—The Treaty with the Jews—The Crowning Iniquity—Paul's Characterization—Identity of the Prince—The Outer Court Unmeasured—The Middle of the Week—The Closing Half.

At the beginning of the last "week" (Daniel 9:27) the prince who governs the final phase of the revived Roman Empire makes a treaty with the mass of the Jews, who have then returned to Jerusalem, rebuilt their temple, and reinstituted their sacrifices. A minority, however, the saints or the elect, refuse to join in this treaty, and are subjected, therefore, to fierce persecution. After three and a half years the prince stops the sacrifice, speaks blasphemies against God, and changes times and laws. False Christs also arise, working great wonders, and deceiving all but the elect.

The crowning act of the prince's wickedness is the setting up of some abomination, or idol, which brings down desolating judgment. Then the saints flee, without a moment's delay, from the city. The three and a half years of untold tribulation follows, a time which, if prolonged, must end in the total destruction of the race. But for the elect's sake it is shortened. After a fearful shaking of the nations, the Son of Man appears, and the pre-appointed judgment overtakes the prince, "the desolator." Then follow the other judgments on the Gentiles and the apostate Jews, the gathering of the elect Israelites yet scattered over the earth, and the final establishment of the Messianic kingdom, together with those elect, or saints of the Most High, whom the prince had recently persecuted.

A passage in Paul's epistles helps to throw still further light on this subject. The Thessalonians, passing through a period of severe trial, thought "that the day of the Lord was come" (2 Thess. 2:2). I give what is admitted to be the true rendering of the passage, though widely differing from the authorized version. The apostle assures them that "that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time.

The person here described is identical with the little horn. He is like him in wickedness and blasphemy, he lives at the same epoch, before the advent of the day of the Lord, and is cut off at the same time, destroyed "with the brightness of His coming." He sits in the temple of God, which, as already seen, is at this period rebuilt in Jerusalem.

The Roman Empire in its last stage will be renewed in a ten-kingdomed federal form under the presidency of the personal antichrist energized by Satan. He will be assisted by another agent, called a "two-horned beast" or "false prophet," described in Revelation 13 as persuading "them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live. And he had power to give breath unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed" (13:14, 15). Where this image is set up does not appear, but as the man of sin sits in the temple of God, as he is a false Messiah, and therefore in connection with the Jews, as the presence of Christ in His temple at Jerusalem was what the Jews expected, and as the beginning of the beast's blasphemies and diabolical power is contemporaneous with the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the holy place, it seems more than probable that this miraculously speaking image is the abomination, or idol, foretold by the prophet, at the erection of which all the saints were to make their escape from the city.

Then the personal descent of Christ takes place at the end of the final three and a half years, and the beast and the false prophet are destroyed and Satan bound for 1000 years.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK, March 4, 1881.

A Scene in Washington—Depressing Weather—A Radiant Inauguration—Lincoln's Inauguration—God Manipulating the Nation—Gen. Hancock's Noble Conduct—God Can Spare Men and Parties—Revivals of Religion—Precursion of Glorious Results—A Minister's Contention in New England Tranquillized—A Noted Scoffer Received into the Church—"Oh! for More Prayer."

AT half-past ten o'clockthis morning I left Washington, coming through from Petersburg, Norfolk, and Richmond. Our National Capital never saw such inauguration crowds as to-day, or so much good humor under so much disadvantage. The weather was a meteorological monstrosity, the coronation of discomfort, the carnival of slush, the apotheosyation of mud, the jubilee of sleet, the desolation of fine broadcloth, the consternation of millinery. Thirty-six triumphal arches adrip with drizzle drozzle.

I wish you could have seen the piled-up cords of humanity asleep in the depot at Washington, as I arrived from Richmond at two o'clock this morning. Yet universal disposition to make the best of everything. The depots, the sheds, the barns, the hallways turning out upon the streets a vast multitude, bloodshot from sleeplessness this morning. Many hungry, more tired, all wet. I congratulate those who had the opportunity of being there. I still more heartily congratulate those who were not there. Military and civilians, old and young, black and white, men, women, and children, Republicans and Democrats, all caught in the rapids of this quadrennial excitement.

But notwithstanding the stress of weather, it is the

the country ever witnessed. Compare it with the time that Abraham Lincoln rode to the capital under General Scott's anxious guardianship by the United States troops, the new President having just before entered into the disguise of the Scotch cap and muffler in complete incognito. Compare it with four years ago, when it was uncertain whether Hayes or Tilden would stand in the White House, and the whole air was portentous with stories of apprehended bloodshed. This nation, during your life and mine, never saw the 4th of March in such grand, complete, and magnificent good humor. No one last Monday night suspected that anyone would be tempted to throw the President's train off the track. No one to-day was listening for the crack of Booth's pistol.

This tempestuous March day has been full of national sunshine. Praise God for the pacification of our national perturbations. New York and Ohio and South Carolina and Louisiana troops I saw on Pennsylvania Avenue, marching in the same battalion. Now let us put off our hypercritical habit in regard to public officials, and give the incoming administration a fair chance. We will ourselves be happier for expecting that all things will come out well. It is evident that God has this nation under manipulation and guidance. If He could take us safely through 1776 and 1812 and 1864 and 1876, He can take us through anything.

All the adverse prophecies have failed, and on the 4th of March, 1881, the two political parties of the country joined in one inauguration, the defeated candidate for the Presidency in the line doing honor to the successful candidate. There was never anything more beautifully done than when General Hancock to-day rode in the line. It only remains for us to commend to God the incoming administration. We are commanded to pray for all in authority, and let us as individuals and as churches discharge this solemn duty. God is on our side, and the important question is whether we are going to be on God's side.

Every man, every party, every nation has a mission to perform. Refusing to perform it, down he goes, and down it goes. God said to the House of Stuart: "Make the English nation free, God-fearing, and happy." House of Stuart refused. Down went House of Stuart. God said to the House of Hapsburg: "Rule Austria in righteousness and open the prison doors until all captives shall go free." House of Hapsburg refused. Down went House of Hapsburg. God says to political parties in this day: "By the principles of Christianity, remodel, govern, educate, and save the people." Refusing to do this, down must go the political party, burying in ruins its disciples and its advocates.

God can spare all the politicians of this day, and can raise up another generation who shall do justice and love mercy. If God could spare Luther before the Reformation was done, and if He could spare Washington before free government had been fully tested, and if He could spare Howard before more than one out of a thousand dungeons had been alleviated, and if He could spare Robert M'Cheyne just as Scotland was gathering to his burning utterances, and if He could spare Thomas Clarkson while yet millions of his fellow-men had chains rusting to the bone, then He can spare any man, and He can spare any party. That man who through cowardice, or blind idolatry of party, forsakes the cause of righteousness, goes down, and the armed battalions of God march right over him.

Oh, Christian men, in the light of this brightest 4th of March in all our American history, make up your minds what it is your duty as citizens to do! Remember that the highest kind of a patriot is a Christian patriot. Massachusetts had its Governor Briggs, Ohio had its John M'Lean, New Jersey had its Theodore Frelinghuysen, and God hasten the day when in all our departments of public service there shall be men who love God and hate unrighteousness. Consecrate yourselves first to God, and then you will know how to consecrate yourselves to your country. There is opening before us such a scene of national prosperity as we have never yet imagined. God hath not dealt so with any nation, and there is no country under the sun that stands to-day in so much sunlight as this American nation.

The grand and the glorious religious event of the week is the discussion which I hear everywhere in regard to

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

I heard it in Washington amid all the turmoil of politics; I heard it in Richmond, I heard it in Norfolk, I heard it in Petersburg. Moreover, in all those cities religious services are to-night being held, and were last night held, and are every night held. This expectancy of great results, this longing for the coming of the Holy Ghost, this looking for a great shaking of the dry bones is the precursion of grand and glorious results.

Now I think the time has gone by when people ought to be afraid of revivals. I remember the time when if more than five or ten persons connected themselves with the Christian Church at one time it was considered alarming. It was considered a far better state of things if at Holy Communion, which would come once in three months, there were one or two or three souls. Indeed, there were those who would throw overboard all the results of Christian revivals, because they feared that some chaff might be among the wheat. As though a sea captain with five thousand bushels of wheat on board should throw everything into the sea because into the five thousand bushels of good wheat there had somehow got a peck of chaff.

Now, when a man tells me he is afraid of revivals, I come inwardly to the conclusion that he knows nothing about the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. I have more faith in conversion in revivals than in a cold state of religion in the Church. If a man comes in when the religious feeling is down to zero, he never gets warmed up. I have noticed that those who come in during great awakenings are more apt to be permanent in their religious impressions, and more earnest in the Christian service. So if you should bring me two men, the one brought in during a great religious awakening, and the other at a time when there was no especial religious zeal in the Church, I would choose the former if I wanted some great mission discharged, some hard service performed, some exhibition of heroism for God.

There is one grand anticipation arising from the fact that the ministers of Jesus Christ seem to have got done quarrelling. There is nothing that so hinders the Christian religion and the advancement of the Church of Christ as belligerent ministers of religion. In New England, many years ago, there was a large company of clergymen present at some ecclesiastical court, and there was great contention, and the pastor of the church where the meeting was being held felt that the convocation, instead of being an advantage to his church, would be a damage, stood up in the back part of the church, and while the contest was most angry, cried out: "Brethren, let us sing, let us sing salvation." And they all joined in the words:

"Salvation, O! the joyful sound,
'Tis pleasure to our ears;
A sovereign balm for every wound,
A cordial for our fears."

And when they got through with their singing, they had got through with their contention.

Now we want in all the churches of Jesus Christ in this land, and in all lands there is wanted, a great shout of salvation. Ministers of religion need to see eye to eye, and to be sympathetic in Christian work, each man feeling that he has in his own field a tremendous responsibility, and that after he has done all his duty he still finds a great deal of work left undone. But

HOW ARE WE TO FORWARD RELIGIOUS INTEREST IN OUR CHURCHES?

We are to forward it by a realization of the superior value of the next world to this, and additional appreciation of the fact that time is short and eternity is long, that what happens to us in this world is of very little importance compared with what shall happen to us in the next world. We need to measure the height, and the depth, and the length, and the breadth of all these considerations. We need also by earnest prayer to implore God for His mercy upon our churches—earnest, continuous, faithful, old-fashioned prayer. There are those who scout the idea of any religious advantage coming to the world, or any advantage of any style, through supplication of God's people; but those who scoff at such things after a while are themselves brought to prayer.

Tyndall has joined the Episcopal Church! After scoffing at the Christian religion, or holding it up in a scientific way to derision, and wanting a prayer test, and demanding of all the Christian Church that they come up to that prayer test, and if certain prayers were not answered in a certain way, therefore he was disposed to conclude there was nothing in prayer and nothing in religion—that man, whose whole influence has for years been antagonistic to the Christian religion, and especially antagonistic to the idea of prayer. in the Episcopal Church now every Sabbath, I am told, says: "Good Lord, deliver us."

Ah! my friends, there comes a time when people are compelled to pray; if not in one style of service then in another. The time will come when we will have to pray, and blessed be God there are so many who once scoffed at prayer who are now offering up supplications before the Lord, day and night, for the coming of His blessing. What religious influence is in reserve for us I know not. In this large assemblage to-night I take intimation that God is coming to bless and to save. In a little meeting in Philadelphia one young man arose and said: "Pray for me;" and from that one desire for supplication a great interest broke out, and a hundred souls flocked into the kingdom. And if there is a person in all the house to-night who feels an anxiety to find the religion of Jesus Christ and to start on a better life, it is a bright and beautiful intimation of the coming of the Holy Ghost.

O Lord revive Thy work in the midst of the years make known, in wrath remember mercy. There are two hundred thousand souls in Brooklyn to-day waiting for the simple invitation of the Gospel, and when the Church of Jesus Christ shall be able in full confidence and faith to go forth and preach the Gospel in all its simplicity, and present the invitation of Christ to the hearts of the people, there will be a flocking in of thousands and tens of thousands, and all the churches of the city will be incompetent to hold the multitudes.

Oh, for more prayer! Oh, for more consecration to the divine service! Let us all begin to-night with new zeal to serve the Lord. The time going so rapidly away, "what thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

The Vindication.

"I TOLD Claude what the doctor had said, but he answered: 'Oh," said Alice, "that doctor is a fool, don't believe him; you have nothing the matter with you; you will be all right when the warm weather comes.' And then Claude went out, and he did not come home till past midnight; he is always out till quite late every night. I do not know where he goes; he never will tell me, and he is always so tired and cross when he comes in. Well, that night I lay awake thinking the whole time, and oh, Mrs. Stanley, I was so frightened. I knew the doctor was right, I felt that I had not long to live, and then I asked myself, 'where am I going?' I must be going somewhere. Oh, Mrs. Stanley, I felt that night, and I feel now, that the Bible is true; my own heart tells me so. I cannot doubt, now that I am dying. I made up my mind that night that I would send for you, but since then I have been putting it off. I was afraid you would not like to come, we have seen so little of each other; but then, yesterday, I thought I would just write and tell you, for there is no one else I can think of who would be able to help me."

"I am very glad you have sent for me," I said, taking her thin hand in mine; "and now, what was it you wanted to ask me?"

"I want you to tell me very simply," she said, "how to be saved; tell me what I must do to get rid of my sin—oh, Mrs. Stanley, I have been so very wicked, what must I do? I will do anything I can, if I only know what it is."

"There is nothing to do," I said, "nothing at all; if you feel your sin, and long to get rid of it, there is nothing to do."

"Nothing to do!" she said incredulously; "oh, yes, Mrs. Stanley, there must be something to do!"

"No," I said, decidedly "there is nothing to do; but there is something to take!"

"Something to take!" she repeated, in somewhat of her old manner. "I suppose you mean that I am to take salvation; but that is so very indefinite, Mrs. Stanley. I know all those set phrases so well; but they mean nothing to me. What is salvation, and how am I to take it?"

"You are quite right," I said, "have nothing to do with set phrases; they are hollow and worthless. You have to deal, not with dead words, but with a living Saviour, Mrs. Ellis. It is the Lord Jesus whom I want you to take—as your own Saviour. I want you to take Him as the One who can alone save you from the guilt and power of your sin, and who can alone give you the right to enter heaven. He comes to you, and He says: 'Take Me, take My love as your own; look upon Me as the One who has died to save you, and then you need not fear.' You understand how it is that He is able to save you, Mrs. Ellis, that He has been punished instead of you; that your sins have been laid on Him, and that He has suffered the penalty that your sins deserved!"

"Oh, yes," she said, "I know all that with my head; I know it theoretically, but I want to be able to put it into practice. How am I to be quite sure that Jesus has done that for me; how am I to know that He has taken my sin away?"

"Because God's Word tells you so," I said; and I took my Bible from my pocket and read, "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."

"Then what is there left for me to do?" she asked.

"Only to accept the Lord Jesus as your Saviour," I said. "Go to Him and say to Him, 'Lord Jesus, I do thank Thee for bearing my sins; I trust myself to Thee to be saved. I want to be forgiven through Thy death, and because Thou hast been punished in my place.'"

"Is that all?" she said.

"That is all!" I answered; "you cannot do more. One of my husband's tenants was in great trouble a few months ago; he was not at all a rich man, and he had got into some rather serious difficulties with a neighbor of his. My husband heard of it, and when he had been told the whole story he felt that the man was to be pitied. The poor wife came and pleaded with tears in her eyes that he would help them, so my husband went to the trial to see what could be done. The sentence was pronounced—the man was to pay £20, or failing that, he was to go to prison. The poor man could not have paid even £5, for he was very badly off, so he was quite prepared to be led off to prison. But at that moment my husband stepped forward, and laid down the £20. What was left for the man to do? Nothing, but to come forward and to say with tears in his eyes, 'Mr. Stanley, I thank you kindly, sir; I shall never forget it as long as I live!'"

"I see," she said; "I see it all now; and is that just what I have to do?"

"Exactly," I said; "you must go to the Lord Jesus and say, 'Lord, I have nothing with which to pay. I am a great sinner, and owe a great debt, but Thou hast paid it all; I look upon Thee as my Saviour, and I shall never forget it as long as I live.' It is quite touching to see that poor man's love for my husband now; he tries in every way he can to show his gratitude."

"I see," she said; "and we love Him because He first loved us. Oh, Mrs. Stanley, thank you so much!"

I did not leave the house until I had reason to believe that Alice had indeed taken the Lord Jesus as her own Saviour, nor until she could tell me with a smile on her thin, wasted face, "I am not utterly miserable now, for I have a sure hope for the future; He has forgiven me."

I did not see Claude once, though I was with Alice for several hours. Perhaps he purposely kept out of sight, and, I must confess, I was glad, under the circumstances, not to meet him, for I felt very angry with him for his heartless neglect of his poor little wife.

I returned home by the evening train, and then came the contrast. My husband was at the station to meet me, and we drove back together to our happy home. On the way I told Howard of my visit to Alice, and of the conversation I had had with her. He was very much interested in all I told him, and when we had talked it over for a little time he said:

"I have a letter for you in my pocket, May, which came by the evening post, and I think I have been very good not to open it, for I am most anxious to hear the news contained in it."

The letter was from Evelyn Trafford. I took it from him and opened it.

"Oh, Howard," I exclaimed, as I glanced at the contents, "I am so very glad!"

"Yes, and so am I," he said; "I know what it is about. There was a letter for me from Charlie by the same post. He has been staying at Alliston Hall for a week, and it seems to be quite settled now. How nice it will be for you to have your friend Evelyn so near. Carrington Hall is only five miles from us; you will be able to meet as often as you like."

"Evelyn is so very happy," I said, as I handed him the letter, "and she seems to have quite forgotten that she said she would never marry any one who squinted; I have no doubt now that she would agree with me, that in spite of it, Lord Moreton is a very handsome man."

"I am very glad it is so nicely arranged," said my husband. "More than one good thing came out of our journey to Palestine, little wife! Do you remember that it was my conversation with Miss Trafford near the Damascus Gate which first made her look more favorably upon poor Charlie—the 'stupid, uninteresting man!' she called him then."

As he said this we turned in at the gate, and drove through the shrubbery to the house.

How beautiful everything looked that evening! The rhododendrons, the lilacs, and the laburnums were in bloom, and the evening sunshine was streaming across the distant hills, and casting a golden light over everything.

"Oh, what a contrast, Howard!" I said, as we stood together at the window that evening.

"A contrast to what?" he asked.

"A contrast to the wretched lodging I have been in to-day. I always felt that mine was the happiest home in the world, but I feel it more than ever to-night."

"Are you really happy, little wife?" he asked.

"Happy! oh, Howard," I answered, "what a question! You know, surely, you know how very happy I am!"

"You are not more happy than I am, May," he said; "I little thought when I met you first on the roof, at Brindisi, what bright days were in store for me!"

"Oh, Howard," I said, after a pause, "just think if that wretched lodging that I saw to-day had been my home! And it might have been!"

He knew what I meant, for I had told him of Claude's letter.

"Yes," he said, "it might have been, if you had not resisted the temptation put before you that day, and gained a victory over yourself. But you are not sorry now, May, that you decided as you did; you think you were right, do you?"

"Right! oh, Howard," I said, "I feel as if I could never be thankful enough that I chose as I did; God has been very good to me!"

"Yes, little wife," he said, "the Lord never overlooks or forgets any self-denial for His name's sake. You chose His love, His favor, His smile, in preference to an earthly affection; you chose to forsake an earthly love for His sake, and He did not forget it. I am sure those words of our Lord's are true, May: 'There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands' (in short, anything dear to his heart), 'for my sake, but he shall receive an hundredfold in this present time;' or, as another Gospel has it, 'manifold more in this present time.'"

"I have indeed received the hundredfold, Howard," I said.

"And then that is not the end," he said, "for, after all, the second part of the promise makes the first part sink into insignificance. 'And, in the world to come, life everlasting.' Yes, May, there is a brighter home in prospect. Earth's homes, the dearest and best, are only for a time—Heaven's homes are for an eternity. I came across a verse to-day, which I thought very beautiful:

"'What joys are lost, what promises are given,
As through this death-struck world we roam,
Awhile we think that Home is Heaven,
At last we find that HEAVEN is HOME.'"

"And we shall be together there, Howard," I said, "with no fear of separation."

"Yes, thank God!" he answered; "this bright, little earthly home is to us a faint foreshadowing of our heavenly home, where we shall be together with the Lord."

"Yes," I said, "a happy, earthly home now, in this present time, and a brighter, more glorious home awaiting me above, to be mine throughout eternity; was I not indeed right in my choice?"

THE END.

Too Late for the Leap.—Some Time ago a ship's crew stood with speechless terror upon a rugged rock in the midst of the sea. A lifeboat, rowed by strong hands, approached the rock, but was kept at some little distance by the beating surf. It was only by leaping at the precise moment when the boat rose on the swell of the wave that there was any chance of escape. Among the shipwrecked crew was a woman, who stood prepared to leap. "Quick! quick!" was the cry. "Leap now, leap now!" She hesitated for a moment, and then sprang off; but in that moment the boat was drawn back by the retreating wave; she sank into the sea, and was never seen again.

The position of sinners is like that of the shipwrecked crew, and is one of great peril. Their state is justly described as "one that lieth down in the midst of the sea." They are exposed to the billows of the divine wrath, and are in danger of perishing; but, thank God, the lifeboat has come to the rescue, and there is room on board for all who accept the deliverance which it offers.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S.S. Lesson for March 20. Golden Text Luke 1 : 78. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ST. LUKE in his Gospel treats of the Lord Jesus as Man, while St. Matthew represents Him as King, St. Mark as Servant and St. John as God. The human side of the Lord is set forth in St. Luke, all the parables in this Gospel concern "a certain man," not "a certain king" as in St. Matthew (Comp. Luke 12 : 16 ; 14 : 16 ; 15 : 11 ; 16 : 1, 19 etc., with Matt. 18 : 23 ; 22 : 2). Thus it is only natural that St. Luke should dwell more upon the details of Jesus' birth and of that of His forerunner John the Baptist.

We find grouped around the cradle of our Lord, several who may serve us as examples of faith and of faithfulness. Zacharias, Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, with "all them that looked for redemption, in Jerusalem," formed a little band of faithful believers, true to their God in the midst of a religious people whom John the Baptist called a "generation of vipers," and the Lord Jesus called "hypocrites," "blind guides," "fools and blind," "serpents," "generation of vipers ;" and of whom He testified "they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders ; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. But all their works they do to be seen of men." And again, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites ! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men ; for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in. . . . ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers," etc. (Matt. 23).

This little group must have lived very near to God in order to resist the dulling, deadening influence of the majority of professing believers in their day. They took part in the temple services which were ordained of God for the whole people, but to them alone were they a reality ; they sung the Psalms of David in common with others in the congregation, but the deep communing with God which their author knew, and which is expressed in them, was shared by these alone, while the voices of the other singers fell cold and meaningless upon the ear of faith. And yet they did not separate themselves—the outward Jewish church was crumbling to ruins, they saw its decay, and knew they had no power to stop it, but they looked for redemption and for the Redeemer. In the midst of a dead externalism they walked with God ; among those whose thoughts were filled with the things of time and sense, they lived a life apart and unknown to those who surrounded them. Their one idea was God's Redeemer.

"Fear not, Zacharias : for thy prayer is heard." The answer to his prayer was the birth of Christ's forerunner. "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, and whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come unto me." Both Zacharias and Elizabeth received communications from God with regard to His coming Son. To Simeon it was revealed "by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ," and Anna was divinely guided to enter into the temple at the very moment when the child Jesus was presented unto the Lord, and Simeon was in the act of blessing His parents. Each of these waiting ones had distinct and individual intercourse with God about the great subject which the angels desire to look into, but which was neither understood nor desired by those around them. They thought, spoke, acted and lived in another world than theirs, apart in spirit perhaps from those in their own houses and families.

We are fast approaching the time of the second coming of our Lord, and the external church in our day is falling into ruins. Simeon "waited for the consolation of Israel," we are waiting for the Church's Bridegroom. Those who have studied the construction of the great Pyramid in Egypt believe that there is ground to conclude, from measurements which they believe to indicate the length of the several dispensations under which men have lived, that the very next year, 1882, will be the one in which Christ will take away His people. Some historical expositors of prophecy, who have much studied the Scripture dates, make the coming of our Lord to be in the decade of years which we have already commenced. In any case "the Lord is at hand," in any case let our souls cry out to Him, "Come Lord Jesus."

The expectation of their Redeemer had left its mark upon these four precious souls. Zacharias and Elizabeth were "both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless ;" Simeon "was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel ; and the Holy Ghost was upon him ;" Anna "departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers day and night." To such souls could God make known, not only that which they might share with the shepherds, "Unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord," but He could also reveal to them that which Christ should be to Israel and to the Gentiles. The communications of our God to us are in proportion to our capacity to receive them. The shepherds were seekers perhaps for personal salvation, and God revealed it to them in the birth of a Saviour. Zacharias bore the burden of his fallen nation upon his heart, he knew the Messiah was coming, but how should the "disobedient" people be prepared for Him and be turned "to the wisdom of the just." God's revelation to Zacharias was that his own son John should be the instrument to effect this work. Simeon seems to have had a wider area upon his heart ; he saw God's salvation to be "prepared before the face of all people ; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of My people Israel." Instead of wasting their words in complaining of the fallen condition of the Jewish worship, instead of condemning the priests and Levites, these faithful ones remained silent to men, but they bore the burden of their God in secret, and they were permitted to behold the dawn of the Sun of Righteousness arising with healing in His wings.

In all the details which St. Luke alone gives us of the birth and boyhood of the Lord Jesus, we see that His outward circumstances were exceedingly poor : announced only to a few shepherds, born in a stable, laid in a manger, His mother poor, although related to the High Priest's wife, His presence not missed during the space of three days by the company with which He had come up to Jerusalem, all this speaks of an external nothingness. Paul wrote to the Galatians, "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ he formed in you" (Gal. 4 : 19). If Christ is really formed in us, if His divine nature transposes and replaces our own old nature, there will be something analogous to Christ's birth in our experience. We shall learn to regard ourselves, our person, as a very stable, as the most unworthy place for the dwelling of such an Inmate ; pride, self-conceit, must give way when Christ is formed in us. To the world we shall be as He was, "with no form or comeliness," with no beauty which they can desire, for God recreates us after His model and tastes and not after man's.

In our course of lessons for the past quarter, after those which treated of the circumstances immediately surrounding the birth and childhood of our Lord, we considered the preaching of John the Baptist and the preaching of Jesus. Taking the two examples which we have had in our lessons from Luke 3 and 4, we might have said that John the Baptist was a more successful preacher than the Lord Jesus. Multitudes who came out into the wilderness to the austere preacher of the desert, yielded to the influence of the Holy Ghost, "confessing their sins." At Nazareth, on the contrary, although for a time His hearers were under deep impression, yet "they resisted the counsel of God against themselves," and they sought to slay Him who came to save them. There He was, waiting to be trusted ; ready to do His mighty works, and they would none of Him. But Jesus preached elsewhere than in Nazareth and it was testified of Him, "Never man spake like this Man" (John 7 : 46), for "He taught them as one that had authority and not as the scribes" (Mark 1 : 92). But Jesus, who never bore witness of Himself (John 5 : 31), yet bore witness of John, as we have seen in one of our late lessons, saying of him, that among those that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than he.

But it was prophesied, "Unto you that fear My Name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in His wings" (Mal. 4 : 2), and truly our blessed Lord manifested Himself as the great Healer. Of all the many sick who came to Him, who was sent away unhealed? His path was marked by the restoration of all who came in His way. We read, "When the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases, brought them unto Him ; and He laid His hands on every one of them, and healed them. And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, thou art Christ the Son of God" (Luke 4 : 40, 41). In our course of lessons we considered the healing of the leper, of the paralytic, of the woman who touched the hem of His garment.

We learned in our last lesson but one, how our beloved Lord made Himself, and was reproached for being, "the friend of . . . sinners." Are we learning to obey His command, "Follow Me," so that we too are the friends of sinners in His name? Does our presence, do our words, speak life and hope to souls which are dead in trespasses and sins? Do they learn from us, not only that they ought to, but that they can, lead new lives by the power of a crucified and risen Christ? Do they turn to us with confidence, because they see that what we say is a living reality to us? If we truly live as lights in the world, our very presence must drive away the darkness.

An Injured Limb Healed in Answer to Prayer. The following incident is related in The Herald of Camden, Me., by Mr. Henry F. Thurston, who is indorsed by the Rev. C. E. Libby as a gentleman of character and good standing, and a member of the Free Baptist Church in Rockport :

In the spring of 1880, Mrs. Sylvia Thurston, (the step-mother of the narrator), while returning home from church, stepped into a hole in the road, and was thrown with such violence to the ground that her back was severely injured and the bones of her ankle and foot were wrenched out of joint. The injury sustained by the foot was so great that it was almost impossible to replace the bones in any kind of position. For two months she suffered intensely from a fever brought on by the injuries to her back, and it was three months before she could sit up. But when she had recovered from the fever she was unable to walk save by the aid of crutches. The broken leg was useless and never ceased to pain her. It was swollen from the toes to the knee and was colored a dark purple. The circulation was almost stopped, and the leg and foot became cold. The foot was bent out of position so that only the toes touched the floor.

The doctor said it must be cut off or it would mortify, or else wither away and die. About this time her stepson came from Rockland to take care of her. One day he was telling her of a lame man down East who was healed by the prayers of Fred McKenney, evangelist, from Portland. They determined to pray for the restoration of the impotent limb, and both kept their determination. That night the foot was so bad that even the drawing of a sheet over it gave her intense pain. In the morning the foot, ankle, and leg were in all things like the other, and as strong.

A Scotch Sailor's Experience.—At a Recent meeting in Edinburgh, Scotland, in connection with the revival services of Major Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. MacGranhan, a man about forty years of age rose and said : "I am a sailor, and have been a drunkard all my life. On being paid off from a ship a few weeks ago I received over £35, all of which had gone in drink and vice. I came into the meeting on the previous Friday, and was convicted of sin. Just there," he said, pointing to a place in the hall close to where he stood, "I accepted Christ as my Saviour, and I got deliverance from the drink. God took away the taste for it ; but I have been much on my knees praying for grace to be still delivered, and I humbly ask the prayers of God's people that I may continue to be kept." Other testimonies followed ; and a lady at a subsequent meeting said to a Christian worker, "That man's experience was just like mine."

More Detailed Reports of the Disaster to the British army in South Africa on February 27th have been received. They show that the cause of the defeat sustained, was not, as was at first alleged, negligence in not taking up to the summit of the Magela mountain a sufficient supply of ammunition, but that General Sir G. P. Colley was outmanœuvred and fairly beaten. The British troops had taken up a position on the crest of the hill, and were confident that their position was impregnable. The Boers adopted the desperate course of storming the position, and were met and repulsed with the bayonet. They re-formed, and falling upon a weak place in General Colley's line, penetrated it, and were thus able to attack their former antagonists from the rear. The British troops were smitten with panic, and rushed in disorganized condition down the hill. The slaughter was not so great as was reported. Thirty-five officers and 693 men were engaged. Three officers were killed, nine wounded, and seven taken prisoners. The total of the killed was 83; wounded, 122, and taken prisoners or missing, 50. The Boers had the courtesy to send into the British camp, under the protection of a white flag, a letter of condolence to Lady Colley on the death of her husband, expressing their regret for the bereavement they had inflicted upon her. General Sir Frederick Roberts has been appointed to succeed Sir G. P. Colley in command. He is an experienced officer, having distinguished himself in the Indian Mutiny in 1857, and in the recent Afghan war. His portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 13, 1879.

Preparations for Enforcing the Coercion Bill in Ireland indicate that the power intrusted to the Irish executive will be judiciously used. Mr. Forster, the Secretary for Ireland, has himself visited Dublin to assist in the consultations on the subject of proclaiming districts and arresting individuals. While some of the law officials deem suspicion fairly pointed at an individual to be sufficient to justify his arrest, Mr. Forster insists that evidence must be adduced such as would influence his mind in the capacity of juror, and that a prima facie case be established against the accused. The Dublin Gazette contains proclamations for the counties of Clare, Cork, Galway, Kerry, Leitrim, Limerick, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo.

A Sensation in the British Parliament was produced on March 3d by a speech from Mr. Dillon, one of the Land-League leaders, who defended his advice to the Irish to resort to armed insurrection. He said, If he were an Irish farmer he would keep a rifle to shoot landlords. He wished the Irish had proclaimed civil war. It is expected that Mr. Dillon will be arrested under the Coercion Act, for violent speeches delivered at meetings of the Irish farmers of which the remarks he made in Parliament give but a faint idea.

The Difficulties in which the Gladstone Ministry in Great Britain is laboring are increased by the war in the Transvaal. There is a general demand in Great Britain that the prestige of the army should be restored by decisive victory before propositions of peace are entertained, yet the policy advocated by Messrs. Gladstone, Bright, and Chamberlain when they were not in office requires a speedy close of the war, and a concession of the liberty and independence the Boers demand.

Sincere sympathy with the victorious Dutch farmers is expressed in many quarters, which is evoked by the conviction that they are a brave people fighting for their homes and liberty against a tyrannical foreign power, but there is evidence that they have been troublesome neighbors to the British in South Africa for a long time, and that England would not have interfered with them had they refrained from molesting the Colonists. Dr. Livingstone, the missionary explorer, suffered at their hands when in South Africa, his house being wrecked by the Boers and his property entirely destroyed. Another complaint against them is that though they fight for liberty, they engage extensively in the slave trade. Dr. Livingstone, in 1852, addressed a memorial to the British Government on the subject, in which he described an attack made by them upon the Chief Sechele, which resulted in the carrying off into slavery of 200 women and children. The Doctor stated: "Of the women and children captured, many of the former will escape, but the latter are reduced to a state of hopeless slavery. They are sold and bought as slaves, and I have myself seen and conversed with such taken from other tribes and living as slaves in the houses of the Boers." He also stated that he saw in captivity among the Boers large numbers of Bechuana children, who had been educated in his own Sunday-schools, and afterward torn from their homes by the ruffians who composed the Dutch commandes.

An Earthquake is Reported from Ischia an island in the Mediterranean Sea belonging to Italy. A cable despatch says: The loss of life by the earthquake is appalling. One hundred and two bodies have been found at Casamicciola up to the present, and many others are under the ruins of the buildings. In the village district of Lacco alone thirteen houses were destroyed and five persons killed. Three hundred houses have fallen at Casamacciola. The government is sending relief. The News' correspondent at Naples says 110 corpses have been recovered, and 67 wounded have been sent to the hospitals.

The Spanish Authorities appear Determined to suppress gambling in their capital. Count Xiquena, the new Governor of Madrid, having ascertained the locality of the disreputable haunts took the precaution to lock up ten district inspectors of police in his office to prevent the gamblers getting warning of the projected movement against them. He then, with the Chief Constable, went out in the dead of night and surprised twenty-four gambling-houses, seized all the money visible and arrested the players and owners of the establishments. Xiquena then sent a stern warning around to all the clubs and casinos in Madrid, threatening the occupants with the penal code unless gambling was instantly stopped.

The President of the French Republic has administered a rebuff to Mr. Parnell. M. Grevy's name was placed on the list of a Committee of Congratulation appointed to wait on the French author Victor Hugo, but when he found that Mr. Parnell's name was also on the list he declined to allow his own name to remain or to act with the Irish agitator. Marshal MacMahon, the ex-President, has also turned a deaf ear to Mr. Parnell's appeals for sympathy. Meanwhile M. Rochefort, the Communist editor, lauds the movement in his columns, and Victor Hugo gives it his approval, believing that "through Ireland, socialist ideas would find their way into England."

A Sunday Desecration Bill was Moved in the British House of Lords on February 23d, by the Irish Earl of Dunraven. Its object was the opening on Sundays of all national museums and picture-galleries. The argument urged for opening museums and galleries of pictures, was that such places were preferable as places of Sunday recreation to drinking-saloons. This attempt to do evil that good might come, like all such schemes, is foolish and wicked. The frequenters of the saloons would not be drawn away from their accustomed haunts by the attraction of pictures or museums filled with curiosities, whether ancient or modern. But the vendors of drinks under the name of refreshments would be multiplied in the vicinity of such places of resort on the Sunday, and many would be drawn away from churches, who would thus lose the benefit of public worship. The amount of labor necessary to watch over the picture-galleries and museums would, moreover, add much to Sunday toil, without any countervailing advantage. The decay of religious influence on the masses is sufficiently alarming, without any aid from the British Legislature. The House of Lords very properly rejected the bill.

Anarchy Reigns in Peru. The Chilians, find no one in Lima with whom they can negotiate a treaty of peace. A telegram dated February 24th, says, "Two or three efforts have been made to hold a meeting of distinguished citizens to discuss matters and form a provisional government, but they will not attend. The majority of the Peruvians acknowledge they are badly beaten, and that they cannot hope to make headway against the Chilians, but false pride prevents their stepping forward and acknowledging this fact, and making the best terms they can in order to prevent the country suffering further loss. Perhaps, also, fear has a little to do with their hesitancy. Many of them think the lives of those who sign a peace will be in danger directly after the Chilians leave."

All persons holding property belonging to the Peruvian Government have been ordered to send in inventories of such property. All arms and ammunition are to be delivered to the Chilians. They are blowing up all the forts and such guns as are not of recent manufacture. Admiral de Petit Thouars, of the French Navy, as senior officer of the station, and in command of the foreign squadrons, has had a somewhat warm discussion with General Baquedano, at which he had occasion to repeat to him the determination of the foreign powers to prevent at all hazards the destruction of Lima, in which so many millions of foreign capital are interested.

The Arcot Mission, India, which has Been established for twenty years, has been requested by the patrons of the high caste school for boys in Vellore to assume the management of it. Those high caste gentlemen not long since despised the missionaries, and regarded social intercourse with them as contamination. Now they commit their children to their care. Recently a still more signal triumph has been won. Gentlemen of the highest caste requested the missionaries in charge at Vellore to organize a school for their daughters. The invitation was accepted and the school was opened, a large number of native gentlemen being present. On that day twenty girls were enrolled as pupils, and in one month the number rose to one hundred and four. Many of these children had had no intercourse with Europeans, and "were not a little frightened when left for the first time by their parents or friends." Twelve of these girls are Brahmins. This movement is very significant, for these girls of the highest caste have been most jealously secluded from all intercourse with foreigners, even from many of their own race. The mission is not asked to visit and teach them in the guarded privacy of the Zenanas, but to instruct them openly in a public school.

An Engine Driver on Fire.—On February 18th the driver of a train was approaching the platform of the Wimbledon station in England, and was attending to his duties before the furnace, when the fire suddenly burst forth and enveloped him in flames. His clothes, being greasy, blazed fiercely, and the passengers waiting at the station were horrified to see the driver hanging over the side of his engine shrieking for help. The brakes were applied, and one of the guards going to the engine managed with his cloak to put out the flames. The driver was then carried to a hospital, where he was carefully treated, but without much hope of saving his life. Is not this an illustration of the way in which destruction shall overtake the wicked? "Behold, they shall be as stubble; the fire shall burn them; they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame" (Is. 47 : 14).

"How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" said the group of prisoners of war, who, sitting dejected on the banks of the Babylonish river, laid aside their musical instruments and gave themselves up to melancholy. But the task, too exacting for the exiled Jews, other men in these last days, rejoicing in the liberty wherewith Christ makes His people free, have voluntarily undertaken. They have been glad to carry to those who sit in darkness the glorious message of light and life, and to preach and sing the praises of Him whose entrance to this world of sin and sorrow was celebrated by an angelic choir, singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good-will toward men."

In the Kingdom of God there is opportunity for the exercise of that "diversity of gifts" which emanate from "the same Spirit," and if one were called upon to point to the distinguishing characteristics of the era in which we are living, one of the most prominent would be, the influence Gospel singing has had in the great religious movements which have swept over the Church. Not only has the sweetly solemn, inspiring song softened and prepared the heart for the reception of the word preached, but God has often blessed the song alone, to the conversion of sinners. In this country and in Great Britain, wherever Messrs. Moody and Sankey have gone, the singing of Mr. Sankey has been blessed almost as signally as the preaching of Mr. Moody.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the pioneer in the work of attaching the graceful courser of music to the Gospel chariot, has also enjoyed an abundant measure of God's favor and blessing. Not content with the harvest of souls God gave him in America and Great Britain, he has carried the melodious message to less favored lands, and under southern skies, and in tropical climates; in countries newly settled, and in lands famous before America was discovered or Britain had emerged from barbarism, he has raised his voice in celebration of the triumphs of the cross. In very deed singing "The Lord's song in strange lands."

The story of Mr. Phillips's life is one as full of interest as those detailed in the pages of romance. It is a constantly moving panorama, and as we follow his footsteps we tread the streets of great cities such as New York, Boston, Cincinnati, New Orleans, and San Francisco, and the rural ways of western villages; we see the strange scenes of the Sandwich Islands, and the busy young life of Australia and New Zealand; on to London, Liverpool, Edinburgh, and Dublin, and the centres of Old World civilization, on again to Rome and Jerusalem and Egypt, and the classic lands of bygone days, and still further to the unfamiliar Asiatic scenes of Calcutta, Delhi, and the banks of the Ganges, where idolatry and superstition still exercise their malign influence. Space forbids even the most imperfect description of such a life, so full of activity and change, we can but indicate briefly some of its more salient features.

Philip Phillips was born in Chautauqua County, New York, on August 13th, 1834. He was the tenth of a family of fifteen children.

HIS FATHER AND MOTHER

were distinguished for their earnest practical piety. Of his mother, who died one year after the birth of her fifteenth child, and when Philip was under ten years of age, he speaks in words of tender loving recollection. Her teaching and her prayers, he assures us, are to this day fresh in his mind, and he remembers distinctly her taking him, as she did each of her children, separately to her room and asking God's blessing upon him.

One memorable incident illustrates the ready tact with which this devoted woman seized any opportunity offered her, to impress on her offspring the nearness of God and the privilege of prayer. Philip when a little child was playing on the lot, and gambolled into the circle one of his father's men was mowing. The scythe struck his foot, inflicting a wound from which the blood flowed freely. He was carried into the house and his mother quickly bound up the injured member, but the little fellow, overcome by the sight of the blood, tremblingly asked: "Mother, how soon will I die?" "I don't know, Phillie," she said, "but don't you think we had better pray?" and there and then the mother and her little boy knelt in prayer to God. Her death was a bitter affliction to the large family of young children, and none felt it more than little Philip. He was sent with one of his brothers to the house of an uncle, but the divorce from the old farm only aggravated his grief, and he was allowed, in response to his piteous entreaties, to return to his loved but now desolated home.

In 1849, Philip being then fifteen years of age, he was apprenticed to a farmer who engaged to "instruct him in the art of farming and dairying," to clothe him and provide him with food and send him to school three months in each year. He also covenanted in the indenture to give Philip, at the end of his term of six years, "a new Bible and two suits of clothes; one to be of a common quality and one to be a handsome suit." Philip appears to have fulfilled his part of the agreement to the satisfaction of the farmer, for, observing his passion for music, the farmer resolved to gratify it. Returning to the house one evening, Philip found a melodeon in the sitting-room, and on making eager inquiry as to the instrument, he received for answer: "Well, Philip, what is the use of having money if you cannot use it? We have bought this melodeon for you, but you must not neglect your work on account of it." The boy's heart was full to overflowing.

But a more memorable event in the young man's life, even than the possession of his first musical instrument, was one that occurred soon afterward. Protracted meetings were held in the Baptist Church of Delanti, N. Y., where the farmer and his family attended. Philip was first attracted by the singing, but after a few meetings the Holy Spirit awakened him to anxiety about his soul. His bashfulness kept him from accepting the minister's invitation to go to the seat where other anxious souls were prostrated in prayer. He put it off day by day, every night resolving that the next evening he would go to the front, but still he struggled on alone, his courage failing him as the time came. One evening after the last hymn had been sung the minister said: "Let us repeat that verse; I feel that some persons here to-night are grieving the Spirit." The verse was repeated, and Philip, feeling himself indicated, walked up to the minister's platform and asked for prayer. Before he went home that night he had given his heart to God.

The Good Templar movement was about this time attracting public attention, and Philip Phillips entered with energy into the work. His fine voice was in request, and he was invited to assist at the formation of many new lodges. Additional stimulus was thus given to musical studies, and his employer became conscious that Philip's proper place was not at the drudgery of farm work. He suggested that the young man should take up the profession of music teacher, and with the product of his efforts to pay a man to take his place on the farm. Philip accepted the offer gladly, and in 1853 he opened his first singing-school at Allegheny, N. Y. The engagement was carried out, and at the end of the term, when Philip was twenty-one years old, he discharged the obligation, and started in life with his knowledge of music as his only capital. During the next few years his time was given exclusively to his profession.

THE FIRST REVIVAL WORK

in which Mr. Phillips engaged, was at the Baptist Church of which he was a member, and of which Rev. A. Wheelock, D.D., was pastor. The services lasted many weeks, and during that time Mr. Phillips presided at the organ and was busy among the awakened souls. He went from seat to seat talking with the young men he knew, and in cases where he believed an impression had been made inviting them to his rooms for further conversation and prayer. Many souls were born again under his instrumentality.

An invitation was sent to Mr. Phillips at the conclusion of these engagements to sing in Ohio. He accepted, and his first service in that State was held in the Baptist Church at Marion. Here he met with Miss Olive M. Clark, the lady who afterward became his wife. Mr. Phillips's first published work, "The Cantata of Esther," was brought out during his Ohio visit. This was followed in 1860 by "Early Blossoms," of which upward of twenty thousand copies were quickly sold. This success encouraged him to settle in Ohio, and he accordingly opened premises in Cincinnati. In the Queen City success attended him, and he brought out "Musical Leaves," a book which reached a circulation of 700,000 copies. It penetrated everywhere, and its chords might be heard in churches and schools, on the city street, and in the military camp. Next appeared the "Singing Pilgrim," founded on John Bunyan's inimitable allegory. The book was enthusiastically received, and Mr. Phillips acquired by the authorship of the work the name by which he is known, the world over, of "The Singing Pilgrim."

Besides his ordinary professional engagements and his literary labors Mr. Phillips, during his Cincinnati residence, devoted himself to active Christian work. He sang gratuitously in Sunday-schools, in Soldiers' Hospitals, and in connection with the United States Christian Commission. When the close of the war came, he sang at the final anniversary of the Christian Commission in the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C. President Lincoln was present, and at the conclusion of the service he sent up a note to Mr. Phillips asking him to repeat one hymn which had particularly impressed him. The concluding words were:

"Go and toil in any vineyard,
Do not fear to do or dare;
If you want a field of labor,
You can find it anywhere."

God had other work for Mr. Phillips to do than the mere acquisition of wealth and fame, and as often happens, He turned his attention to that work by a series of events which the world names misfortunes. In the year 1865 all Mr. Phillips's property was destroyed by fire, and subsequent attempts to renew a business career ended in disappointment and disaster. Thus detached from commercial pursuits, Mr. Phillips gave himself unreservedly to the Lord's work, and in that work held himself ready to go wherever he might be called.

In 1868 Mr. Phillips visited

for the first time. There he found his fame had preceded him. His books were on every music-stand, and his melodies were sung everywhere. His first invitation was from the Sunday-school Union Committee, and for them he sang in the London Jubilee Hall. Subsequently he sang at the Crystal Palace Temperance Fete before an audience of forty-two thousand people, again, at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, which was crowded to its utmost capacity, and in the Mission Halls of the British metropolis, notably among the outcasts in Whitechapel. From London he went northward, and during his visit he gave sixty-seven evenings of sacred song.

During this visit, also, he compiled, at the request of the Sunday-school Union, his "American Sacred Songster," of which over a million copies have been sold. So thoroughly were Mr. Phillips's services appreciated by the British public that a pressing invitation was given him to continue his work, and four years afterward he complied, giving one hundred and fifty services for the benefit of the Continental Sunday-school Union Fund for establishing Sunday-schools on the Continent of Europe. The fund was increased by the profit on these services to the extent of five thousand dollars.

An urgent invitation was forwarded to Mr. Phillips while in England to visit the Pacific coast, and on his return to America he crossed the Continent and making San Francisco his headquarters, he went from place to place, returning to San Fran-sco each week for his Sunday services. He orked during this visit in connection with Mr. oody, who was at that time preaching on the Pa- fic coast. Tours followed his Californian labors, the Western and Southern States and in the ritish Provinces, in all of which he was received ith enthusiasm, and where the songs were instru- ental in the conversion of souls.

AROUND THE WORLD.

A pressing invitation to visit Australia had been nt to Mr. Phillips by persons who had listened him in Great Britain and who were anxious that s voice might be heard in that new country. he invitation was accepted, and Mr. Phillips de- rmined to make his visit an opportunity for visit- g the Mission stations which form a belt of light ound the world. He sailed from San Franciso arch 8th, 1875, and the following three years ere passed amid constantly changing scenes and varying circumstances.

The first halt was at the Sandwich Islands. he vessel remained in port only twenty hours, t during that time a service was arranged by the issionaries, one of whom, Mrs. Webb, was found be a sister of Dr. Hastings of New York. An vitation was received from the King, and Mr. hillips visited his Majesty, who had but recently re- rned from his visit to the United States. At the rvice of song a large and intelligent audience was thered, and the mission fund was increased om the proceeds to the extent of one hundred llars.

Thence the voyagers sailed for New Zealand, here a short stay of eight hours was made id a service of song held. Melbourne, Australia, as the next city visited. A very cordial recep- on was tendered Mr. Phillips in this rapidly im- roving city, and during the whole period he re- ained in Australia the enthusiasm with which he as received was unbounded. A visit was paid to allarat, Creswick, Geelong, Castlemaine, and her large cities. At Sydney, the capital of New outh Wales, Mr. Phillips found himself, on the h of July, face to face with a large audience iefly composed of English people. The associa- ons of the day, no American citizen can forget, herever he may be, and Mr. Phillips after briefly lling the attention of his audience to the glorious niversary, sang our national anthem, the audi- ice joining in the chorus, and then, with beauti- l significance and propriety, followed the triumi- ant strains of the hymn which may be called the hristian's national anthem :

" Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Doth his successive journeys run,
His kingdom spread from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more."

Sydney has a population of 100,000 inhabitants, id song services were held with success in several arts of the city. In the market of the city during r. Phillips's visit an amusing interchange of per- nal criticism occurred. A colonial dealer of im- ense corpulence excited in the American visitor astonished smile. The man resented the implied dicule, and retaliated by some uncomplimentary marks about the dimensions attained by the ankee nose. National credit being thus defend- d, good humor was restored. The American trav- ler was much gratified and amused a few days ter when, after a drive out in the bush, he alighted t an isolated house many miles from any town, and as greeted by the strains of " Yankee Doodle," histled by a magpie who had spent a day or two me time with some American visitors, and had cked up the national air, which he whistled cor- ctly and with spirit.

Mr. Phillips prolonged his visit to the colony un- l October 7th, at the urgent request of his friends, nging almost every day in one or other of the laces of worship. The next place visited was the sland of Ceylon where the visitors were entertain- d by the Superintendent of Missions. Here some f the peculiarities of the climate were brought to te notice of the party by the advice of the mis- onary when the time for retiring came, to look round the room before going to sleep and espe- ally under the pillows, as a deadly cobra had a few venings before located itself in an adjoining cham- er. An appreciative audience of three hundred people was gathered for the song service and man- ifested evident pleasure. Three days' sail brought the travellers to Madras, where a Sunday was spent to the mutual pleasure of singer and hearers.

At Calcutta old friends in the Missionary Amer- ican Home extended a cordial welcome to the visi- tors, and arrangements were made for a singing cam- paign in India. During the campaign many sights were seen distressing to the Christian's soul, and reminding him how much yet remains to be done for Christ in that land of superstition. A wretched fakir was visited on one occasion, who every day for sixteen years had tortured himself by sitting over a slow fire. Idolatrous observances of other kinds bore witness to the prevailing spiritual darkness. The natives could only be induced to attend the services with difficulty, but would stand without the building listening to the music which could be heard through the apertures left under the over- hanging eaves for ventilation; but Mr. Phillips was glad to learn before leaving the country that in more than one of the Mission stations at which he sang, his gospel songs had been the means of doing good.

From India the party set out for the Holy Land, where Mr. Phillips made an extended tour, singing in Jerusalem, Joppa, Nazareth, and other places of sacred associations. From Palestine the route lay through Egypt, thence to Italy and Austria, Germany, and Holland, and so to Great Britain where a third singing tour was made.

So appreciative were Mr. Phillips's British friends of his services and so large were the pecuniary re- sults various religious organizations achieved through his efforts, that a testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver tea-set, was presented to him, accompanied by an address setting forth the esteem in which he was held. The following day, July 13th, 1877, Mr. Phillips and his family em- barked for home from which they had been absent over three years, thankful to God for the preserving mercy which had kept them from danger and harm, and had enabled them to labor successfully for Him.

Mr. Phillips, as already mentioned in these pages, commenced on Monday last a series of song services in Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle. We may hope that the blessing of God on his efforts, so signally manifested elsewhere, will attend him there, and many souls be won for Jesus.

THE LATE HENRY MOORHOUSE.

By John Hambleton.

DURING the great awakening and revival in Lancashire, beginning at Liverpool, 1854, when Reginald Radcliffe, Edward Usher, and John Hambleton were thrust into the vineyard of Christ, and laborers in hundreds were being pressed into the work, under the power of the Spirit of God, the two latter were sent on to Manchester and the surrounding districts, working always in the open air and any open door which presented itself. Richard Weaver, John Street, and many others, were carried as by force into the great evangelistic work, moving on like a mighty tide through the various Lancashire towns. Halls, theatres, cir- cuses were afterward engaged, and the work rolled on like as though Heaven had let down a great net for the ingathering of souls.

At this time (about 1859–60), two lads, one named Thomas Castle, a little pugilist, the other, his companion, Henry Moorhouse, were, uncon- sciously to themselves, watched and known by the Spirit of God as two young fishes in the ocean of sin, shortly to be caught in the great Gospel net. Richard Weaver was preaching at the Free Trade Hall, when Thomas Castle was there without his companion Henry, and was there brought under conviction of sin, and then led to Christ. His heart immediately went out after his companion, Henry Moorehouse, whom he endeavored to bring to the various rooms and places in the town where the Gospel was preached. He found him at one time in a public-house, and brought him up to Weaver's house to be prayed for. Henry soon after this enlisted in a militia regiment, but his father bought him off.

One evening he was passing a room where a Gos- pel meeting was being held; he went half-way up the stairs, and listened to the service; he turned back under conviction, and was in deep trouble of soul for three weeks. His former companion, Thomas Castle, found him in this state, and led him to another room, where he was fully brought to the Lord.

These two again became companions for a short time in the Lord. They wanted now to find employ- ment and to live honestly, and provide things hon- est in the sight of all men, but it was several weeks before they could get anything to do.

The natural business qualities of Moorhouse now began to stir in his mind. He said—

" Tom, how much brass [money] have you got in your pocket?"

" Just a halfpenny," said Tom.

" Well," said Henry, " I've got twopence-half- penny; that makes threepence. We'll set up in business; let's go to the swag-shop in Shude-hill."

So they went with their small capital to a shop which supplies hawkers of thread, tape, scissors, etc., at wholesale prices. This gives it the desig- nation of " swag shop." The swagman took the threepence and gave them their goods, each taking a part of the stock. Henry's stock was soon sold, but Tom had no gift for business, so Henry took the other part, and soon sold out, bringing a profit of ninepence. Away to the swagman again. Nine pennyworth of goods were soon sold again, at a profit of eighteenpence. Thus they lived and worked, buying and selling, and at the end of the week they had thirty shillings each, after all ex- penses.

At this time, one of the brethren who had en- gaged the room for preaching, and whose business was a bazaar and toy shop, with Birmingham jewelry, etc., offered Henry a situation as salesman in his shop, which he took joyfully, leaving the pedler business to his companion, who soon failed in it, not being gifted in buying and selling. He, however, found work at a sawmill, and lived a con- sistent Christian life for about two years, but was suddenly killed by a piece of wood thrown from a circular saw. Henry in a very short time increased the business of his employer, who had all confi- dence in him, trusting him with everything.

But Moorhouse soon developed talents for speaking the simple Gospel, and at the circus he began to tell of Jesus who had saved his soul. His affectionate manner and his boyish appearance were a power in the hands of the Lord for the win- ning of souls.

It was under the following circumstances that Henry Moorhouse left Manchester for Liverpool: His employer took out a license to sell goods by auction, and night after night Harry kept a crowd of people in the shop, selling, and entertaining them with witty words, which was hurting his testimony for Christ. One evening T. B——, a man of short sentences and strange action, entered the shop just as Henry was knocking down some article. He cried out, " Thou ought to be out with thy Bible for souls, and drop that hammer for the devil!" He instantly left the shop, and his words fell as a hammer on the heart of Henry, who became con- scious of being switched off the true line, and con- vinced that he must forsake all and follow Christ.

This was his last auction. The Spirit of God impressed him to go at once to Liverpool, and he came to my house and slept there. He told me the circumstance, and how he had left his situation; but his employer had paid £10 for the license, and would it be right to leave him thus? I inquired if there were any wages due to him. He told me there was about £10 due to him. Then I said, " It is plainly from the Lord that you are called to leave all secular work, and go into the Lord's work. Let your employer keep your wages and do as he please about the license. 'Go thou and preach the kingdom of God.'"

Moorhouse obeyed the call with the result so well known. Besides the good done through his Bible carriage movement, his evangelistic services in London and country towns received the blessing of God, and many a poor outcast, bankrupt in purse, in character, and in hope, is now rejoicing in Jesus through the blessing of God on the plain but earnest appeals of Henry Moorhouse.

OUTSIDERS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Delivered on Sunday Morning, March 13, 1881.

" Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold : them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice."—John 10 : 16.

No Monopoly in Religion—A Reminiscence of Boyhood—Christians not Reckoned in Statistics—The Heavenly Shepherd Finding His Sheep—I. Among Non-Church-goers—Churches Like Skeleton Leaves—Like Armories—Mr. Ancient and the Wrecked Steamer—II. Among Rejecters of Christianity—An Experiment Invited—The Testimony of Laymen—The Sahara of Doubt—The Calm Land of the Gospel—III. Among Those Flung of Evil Habit—Prodigals too Easily Given up—The Only Limit—Put Your Trust in God—The Gospel-hardened Sinners—The Bars of the Fold Falling—A Dying Nobleman's Lamentation.

There is no monopoly in religion. The grace of God is not a nice little property fenced off all for ourselves. It is not a king's park, at which we look through a barred gateway, wishing we might go in and pluck the flowers and look at the deer and the statuary. It is a father's orchard, and there are bars to let down, and gates to swing open.

In my boyhood days, next to the country schoolhouse where I went, there was an apple orchard of great luxuriance, owned by a very lame man who did not gather the apples, and they went to waste by scores of bushels. Sometimes the lads of the school, in the sinfulness of a nature inherited from our first parents who fell through the same temptation, would climb over the fence and take some of these apples, and notwithstanding the fact that there was a surplus, and all going to waste, the owner of that orchard, reckless of making his lameness worse, would take after these lads, and shout, " Boys, drop those apples, or I'll set the dog on you !"

Now there are Christians who have a severe guard over the Church of God. They have a rough and an unsympathetic way of treating outsiders. It is a great orchard into which God would like to have all the people come and take the richest and the ripest fruit, and the more they take the better He likes it. But there are those who stand with a hard and severe nature guarding the Church of God, and all the time afraid that some will get these apples when they really ought not to have them.

Have you any idea that, because you were baptized at eight months of age, and because you have all your life been surrounded by hallowed influences, you have a right to one whole side of the Lord's table, spreading yourself out so nobody else can sit there ? You will have to haul in your elbows, for there will come a great multitude to sit at the table, and on both sides of you. You are not going to have this monopoly of religion. " Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

McDonald the Scotchman has on the Scotch hills a great flock of sheep. McDonald has four or five thousand head of sheep. Some are browsing in the heather, some are on the hills, some are in the valleys, a few are in the yard. One day Cameron comes over to McDonald and says, " McDonald, you have thirty sheep ; I have been counting them." " Oh, no !" says McDonald, " I have four or five thousand." " Ah !" says Cameron, " you are mistaken ; I have just counted them ; there are thirty." " Why," says McDonald, " do you suppose that is all the sheep I have ? I have sheep on the hills and in the valleys, ranging and roaming everywhere. Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

So Christ comes. Here is a group of Christians, and there is a group of Christians ; here is a Methodist fold, here is a Presbyterian fold, here is a Baptist fold, here is a Lutheran fold, and we make our annual statistics, and we think we can tell you just how many Christians there are in the world ; how many there are in the Church, how many of all these denominations. We aggregate them, and we think we are giving an intelligent and an accurate account ; but Christ comes, and He says, " You have not counted them right. There are those whom you have never seen, those of whom you have never heard. I have my children in all parts of the earth, on all the islands of the sea, on all the continents, in all the mountains and in all the valleys. Do not think that these few sheep you have counted are all the sheep I have. There is a great multitude that no man can number. Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

Christ, in my text, talks of the conversion of the Gentiles as confidently as though they had already been converted. He sets forth the idea that His people will come from all parts of the earth, from all ages, from all circumstances, from all conditions. " Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

I. In the first place I remark, the Heavenly Shepherd will find many of His sheep among those who are

NON-CHURCH-GOERS.

There are different kinds of churches. Sometimes you will find a church made up only of Christians. Everything seems finished. The church reminds you of those skeleton plants from which by chemical preparation all the greenness and the verdure have been taken, and they are cold, and white, and delicate, and beautiful, and finished. All that is wanted is a glass case put over them. The minister on the Sabbath has only to take an ostrich-feather and brush off the dust that has accumulated in the last six days of business, and then they are as cold and beautiful and delicate as before. Everything is finished : finished sermons, finished music, finished architecture, finished everything.

Another church is like an armory, the sound of drum and fife calling more recruits to the Lord's army. We say to the applicants, " Come in and get your equipment. Here is the bath in which you are to be cleansed, here is the helmet you are to put on your head, here are the sandals you are to put on your feet, here is the breastplate you are to put over your heart, here is the sword you are to take in your right hand and fight His battle with. Quit yourselves like men.

There are those here, perhaps, this morning, who say, " It is now ten, fifteen years since I was in the habit, the regular habit of church-going." I know all about your case. I am going to tell you something that will be startling at the first, and that is, that you are going to become the Lord's sheep. " Oh," you say, " that is impossible ; you don't know my case ; you don't know how far I am from anything of that kind." I know all about your case. I have been up and down the world. I know why some of you do not attend upon Christian services.

I go further, and make another announcement in regard to you, and that is, you are not only to become the Lord's sheep, but you are going to become the Lord's sheep to-day. God is going to call you graciously by His spirit ; you are going to come into the fold of Christ. The sermon this morning shall not be so much for those who are Christians. I have preached to them hundreds and thousands of times. The sermon that I preach this morning is going to be chiefly for those who consider themselves outsiders, but who may happen to be in the house of God this morning ; and the chief employment of the Christian people in the church this morning will be to pray for those who are not accustomed to attend upon Christian sanctuaries.

When the steamer Atlantic went to pieces on Mars Rock, why did that brave minister of the Gospel, of whom we have all read, go out in the lifeboat ? Why did he not stay and look after the passengers that got ashore, wrapping flannels around them, and kindling fires for them, and preparing them food ? There was plenty of work to be done on the shore for those who had already escaped. Ah ! that brave man knew that there were others who would take care of those, and so he said, " Man the lifeboat ! Pull away, my lads, pull away ! Yonder is a man ; there is a woman freezing in the rigging. Pull away !" I see the oar-blades bend in the strong pull of the oarsmen. Then they come up to the wreck. The woman is frozen. She drops into the wave—alas ! poor woman—and washes out to sea. But then Mr. Ancient says, " There is a man yet hanging to the rigging. Pull away, my lads ! pull away ! They come up, and he says, " Hold now there f minutes, and we will save you. Steady ! stead Now give me your hand. Leap ! Thank God is saved ! Thank God he is saved !"

So there are men in the breakers. They h made shipwreck of life. While we come out save them, some are swept off—swept off bef we can reach them—and there are others still ha ing on. Steady there among the slippery plac Steady ! Leap into this lifeboat ! Now is y chance for Heaven ! This morning some of y are going to be saved. Far away from God, y are going to be brought nigh. " Other sheep h I which are not of this fold."

Christ says that ministers of the Gospel are be fishers for men. Now when I go fishing I not want to fish in anybody else's pond. I do want to go along Hohokus Creek, where there ten or fifteen men fishing, and drop my line j about where they are dropping their lir I should like to get in a Newfoundland fishi smack and push out to sea fifty miles beyond breakers. I do not think the Church of God ga a great deal when you take sheep from one f and put them in another fold. It is the lost sh on the mountains you want to bring back—the sheep on the mountains. And they are com to-day.

You are now this morning in the tide of Ch tian influences. You are going to be swept your voice is going to be heard in prayer ; you going to be consecrated to God ; you are going live a life of usefulness, and your death-bed is gc to be surrounded by Christian sympathizers ; devout men will carry you to your burial w your work is done, and these words will be chise for your epitaph : " Precious in the sight of Lord is the death of His saints." And all history is going to begin to-day. " Other sh have I which are not of this fold."

II. Again I remark, the Heavenly Shepher going to find many of His sheep among those v are now

REJECTERS OF CHRISTIANITY.

I do not know how you came to reject Christian I do not know whether it was through hea Theodore Parker preach, or whether it was r ing Rénan's Life of Jesus, or whether it through some sceptic in the store or factory. it may be—probably is the case—that you v disgusted with religion and disgusted with Ch tianity because some man who professed to b Christian defrauded you, and he being a mem of the Church, and you taking him as a repres ative of the Christian religion, you said, " V if that's religion, I don't want any of it."

I do not know how you came to reject Christ ity, but you frankly tell me you do reject it ; yo not think the Bible is the Word of God, altho there are many things in it you admire ; yo not think that Christ was a divine Being, altho you think He was a very good man. You " If the Bible be true, the most of the Bible be t I nevertheless think the earlier part of the B is an allegory." And there are fifty things th believe you do not believe. It would be a joy for yo grant me a favor. If any of your friends cam you and wanted an accommodation, and you c accommodate them, how glad you would be.

Now I am going to ask of you a favor. I a you to oblige me. The accommodation will you nothing, and will give me great happiness. course you will not deny me. I want you as an periment to try the Christian religion. If it not stand the test, discard it ; if it does, receiv st let me introduce Him to you. I do not ask to take my word for it. I do not ask you to the advice of clergymen. Perhaps we clergy- may be prejudiced; perhaps we may be speakrofessionally; perhaps we may preach because ure paid to preach; perhaps we may give you ng advice; perhaps we are morbid on that sub- ; so I do not ask you to take the advice of gymen.

Well, now, will not just let Him come and try His power on soul?

Take the ice of men who are prominent in secular affairs, hese men whom I have mentioned, and others o immediately occur to your mind.

You see I do not scoff at scepticism. I never ffed at scepticism. I had a good reason for not ffing. I have been a natural sceptic. I do not ow what the first word was that I uttered after ering this world, but I think it must have been vhy?" There were times when I doubted the stence of God, when I doubted the divinity of rist, when I doubted the immortality of the soul, en I doubted my own existence, when I doubted rything. I have been through the whole curricm of doubt, and you can tell me nothing new out it. I have come out from a great Sahara ert into the calm, warm, sunshiny land of the spel. I know about the other land. I have n there. You can tell me nothing new about and I know all about the other condition of ich you do not know anything—the peace, the mfort, the joy, the triumph of trusting in God, d in Jesus Christ whom He has sent. So I am t scoffing in regard to it.

There are some things I believe you do not; t there are some things that I believe and you believe. You believe in love—a father's love, mother's love, a wife's love, a child's love. Now me tell you, God loves you more than all of them gether; and you must come in, you will come in. rist looks in all tenderness, with the infinite nderness of the Gospel, into your soul, and He ys, "This is your time for Heaven;" and then e waves His hand to the people of God, and He ys, "Other sheep have I which are not of this ld."

III. Again I remark, the Heavenly Shepherd is oing to get many of His sheep among THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN FLUNG OF EVIL HABIT.

It outrages me to see how soon Christian people ve up the prodigal. I hear Christian people lk as though they thought the grace of God were chain of forty or fifty links, and when they had n out then there was nothing to touch the depth f a man's iniquity. If a man were out hunting r deer, and got off the track of the deer, he ould hunt amid the bushes and the brakes nger for the lost game than he will look for a st soul.

They say if a man has had the delirium tremens twice he cannot be cured. They say if a woman has fallen from integrity she cannot be redeemed. All of which is an infinite slander on the Gospel of the Son of God. Men who say that know nothing about practical religion in their own hearts. How many times will God take back a man who has fallen? Well, I cannot give you the exact figures, but I can tell you at what point He certainly will take him back. Four hundred and ninety times. Why do I say four hundred and ninety times? Because the Bible says seventy times seven. Now, figure that out, you who do not think a man can fall four times, eight times, ten times, twenty times, one hundred times, four hundred times, and yet be saved.

FOUR HUNDRED AND NINETY TIMES!

Why, there is a great multitude before the throne of God who plunged into all the depths of iniquity. There were no sins they did not commit; but they were washed of body, and washed of mind, and washed of soul, and they are before the throne of God now forever happy. I say that to encourage any man who feels there is no chance for him.

Good Templars will not save you, although they are a grand institution. Sons of Temperance will not save you, although there is no better society on earth. Signing the temperance pledge will not save you, although it is a grand thing to do. No one but God can save you. Do not put your confidence in bromide of potassium, or anything that the apothecary can mix. Put your trust in God! After the Church has cast you off, and the bank has cast you off, and social circles have cast you off, and all good society has cast you off, and father has cast you off, and mother has cast you off, at your first cry for help God will bend clear down to that ditch of your iniquity to help you out. Oh, what a God He is! Long suffering and gracious!

There may be in this house this morning some whose hand trembles so with dissipation they could hardly hold a hymn-book. I say to such, if they are here, "You will preach the Gospel yet; you will yet, some of you, carry the Holy Communion through these aisles, and you will be acceptable to everybody, because everybody will know you are saved and purified by the grace of God, and a consecrated man, wholly consecrated. Your business has got to come up, your physical health is to be rebuilt, your family is to be restored, the Church of God on earth and in Heaven is to rejoice over your coming. "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold." If this is not the Gospel, I do not know what the Gospel is. It can scale any height, it can fathom any depth, it can compass any infinity. I think one reason why there are not more people saved is we do not swing the door wide enough open.

Now there is only one class of persons in this house about whom I have any despondency, and that is those who have been hearing the Gospel for perhaps twenty, thirty, forty years. Their outward life moral, but they tell you frankly they do not love the Lord Jesus Christ, have not trusted Him, have not been born again by the Spirit of God. They are Gospel-hardened. The Gospel has no more effect upon them than the shining of the moon on the city pavement. The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before they.

They went through, some of them, the revival of 1857, when 250,000 souls were brought to God. Some of them went through the great revival we had here immediately on the opening of this Tabernacle, 328 souls one day standing up here in these aisles to take the vows of the Christian. Some of them went through the great awakening of last spring in this church, the mightiest awakening I ever saw. Still unpardoned, unblessed, unsaved. They were merely spectators. Gospel-hardened. After a while we will hear that they are sick, and then that they are dead, and then that they died without any hope. Gospel-hardened.

But I turn away from all such with a thrill of hope this morning, to those who are not Gospel-hardened. Some of you have not heard, perhaps, five sermons in five years. This whole subject has been a novelty to you for some time. You are not Gospel-hardened; you know you are not Gospel-hardened. The whole subject comes freshly to your mind. I hear some soul saying, "O my wasted life! O the bitter past! O the graves I stumbled over! Whither shall I fly? The future is so dark, so dark, so very dark. God help me."

Oh, I am so glad for that last utterance! That was a prayer, and as soon as you begin to pray, that turns all Heaven this way, and God steps in, and He beats back the hounds of temptation to their kennels, and He throws all around the pursued soul the covert of His pardoning mercy. I heard something fall. What was it? It was the bars around the sheepfold, the bars of the fence around the sheepfold. The Heavenly Shepherd let them fall, and the hunted sheep of the mountain come bounding in, some with fleece torn of the brambles, and others with feet lame from the dogs, but bounding in. Thank God! "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

O WANDERER, COME HOME

to thy God this day, and although the storm be in the air and the day be dark, it will be the brightest day you ever saw. Come into the fold of thy God this day. Has no one given you this invitation before? I give it to-day. I have authority for doing so. In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ I offer pardon and peace and life of Heaven to this entire auditory.

God forbid that any of you should have the lamentation of the dying nobleman, who had had every opportunity of salvation but rejected all, and who wrote or dictated these words: "Before you receive this, my final state will be determined. I am throwing my last stake for eternity, and tremble and shudder for the important issue. Oh, my friend, with what horror do I recall the hours of vanity we have wasted together; but I have a splendid passage to the grave. I die in state, and languish under a gilded canopy. I am expiring on soft and downy pillows, and am respectfully attended by my servants and physicians. My dependants sigh, my sisters weep, my father bends beneath a load of years and grief; but Oh, which of these will answer my summons at the high tribunal? And which of these will bail me from the arrest of death? While some flattering panegyric is pronounced at my interment, I may be hearing my just condemnation at a supreme tribunal. Adieu!"

Mr. Moody Related the Following Incident at one of his San Francisco services:

There was a celebrated preacher in the South who went to a place where they told him if he dared to speak they would rotten-egg him. But he went right on. He said he wanted to tell them a story. A man in Texas went to town and sold a drove of cattle; he put the money in his saddle-bags, got on his horse, and started for home, his dog with him. He got tired after awhile, and laid down under a tree and went to sleep, laying the saddle-bags by him. After awhile he awoke, took up the bags, got on his horse and rode off. But his dog kept barking and running back, and would not go along with him and keep quiet. So he finally, in his anger, took out his revolver and shot the dog, and rode on. But the more he thought about what he had done the more he was troubled. He turned his horse and rode back, and found that the dog had dragged himself along until he reached the tree where he had slept. There he was dying, but by his side was his master's bundle of money, which he had dropped and was going off without, and which his faithful dog had lost his life in trying to save. "Now," said the minister, "I am here like that dog, to tell you of the treasure you are losing. Rotten-egg me if you want to." But they didn't: they heard him gladly.

FRED GREENWELL'S DEATH-BED.

George Henry Greenwell was an independent gentleman who many years ago occupied a substantial-looking house in the best part of a town, in Devonshire, England. In the hunting season he entered with great zest into all the excitement of the chase, and prided himself upon being as well versed in all the punctilios of polite society as any man in the country. Nor had he neglected more solid and valuable accomplishments. His library was one of the best in the district, and his judgment on any matters of literary or general interest was deemed worth consulting even by men of more than average shrewdness and culture. But he was a thorough worldling. Whenever he conversed on sacred themes he did so with a tone and manner which made it only too clear that he regarded them simply as matters to be talked about, but by no means to be treated as of any practical significance.

He had a clear, cold, logical mind; and, but for one fact, it might have been concluded that he had no affections whatever; that fact was the love which he bore to his only son Fred, a youth whose gifts and amiable disposition had greatly endeared him to his father's heart. He was often heard to say: "I don't know what I should do without that boy. Since the death of his mother he has been my main comfort; and the hope of his becoming an able man and doing credit to the family name is one of my most cherished possessions."

Mr. Greenwell had also manifested a strong desire to have his son kept free from cant and religious assumption, which terms, on the lips of Mr. Greenwell, were simply synonymous with Christian profession of any kind. Fortunately for the youth, one of his schoolmasters was a man who knew how to distinguish between divine realities and their base imitations; and the naturally open and receptive spirit of his pupil often led him to speak to the boy "of the one thing needful." Better still, the lessons of the schoolmaster were backed up by a singularly pure and blameless life which Fred could not help contrasting with the example he saw at home.

In one respect Fred decidedly resembled his father—viz., in the zest and spirit with which he entered into out-door exercises. A winter of more than usual severity having afforded many inviting opportunities to skaters, Fred, with all his usual ardor, had joined the throng that crowded a well-known sheet of water a few miles from his home. The ice was thick and the frost keen, but, by some means, a little boy had got into the water, and Fred, in his efforts to save the lad, received several cuts and bruises by collision with the sharp angles of the ice, and sustained such a shock to the nervous system as rendered him almost totally helpless.

A doctor was sent for, who pronounced Fred's injuries to be of the most serious kind, although he quite thought that the youth and natural strength of the patient would, with the aid of skill and care, carry him through. Two days after this hopeful opinion had been given Fred was evidently much worse, and the doctor was again sent for in the utmost haste.

In an agony of grief Mr. Greenwell said to that gentleman on his arrival, "Doctor, I fear your hopes about Fred are likely to be disappointed. He has passed a terrible night, and seems to be sinking. If you can save him, no reward which I could confer would be too great." Pale and agonized, the father could say no more. The doctor saw at a glance that the worst fears respecting his patient were only too well founded. Even he, though long accustomed to similar scenes, was deeply moved.

With great calmness Fred said to Mr. Greenwell, "Father, I know you love me, and have always been ready to do anything you thought likely to make me happy, but oh, father! how terrible would have been my position now, if I had had no advice but yours." Here the sufferer broke off, and for several minutes was unable to utter a word more. Presently, though with great difficulty, he added, "Father I am brought face to face with death and eternity. I can and do look forward to the future without alarm, nay, with unspeakable gladness, for I have learned what you never taught me, my need of Christ and Christ's love to me. I cannot ask you to pray for me, for you do not believe in prayer, but, father, will you not pray for yourself, that He who has given such a blessed hope to your son may open your eyes and be to you all that He is to me."

Mr. Greenwell was literally struck dumb. All his clearness of faculty, fulness of information, keenness of logic, and speculative daring availed him nothing in that supreme moment of anguish. Overwhelmed with grief and self-reproach, he withdrew into an adjoining room, where the question forced itself upon him, "Can it be that in a universe of such marvellous adaptations there is no reality corresponding to the awful want that now stands revealed before me?"

For the first time in his life Mr. Greenwell felt his utter helplessness. He went back to the chamber of death, and grasping the hand of his dying son, exclaimed, "Fred, Fred, are you quite sure that the love of Christ is a reality? Have you no misgiving? Is it really a fact that a loving Presence supports my boy now I can do nothing for him?" "Yes, father," said Fred, "my mind was never clearer than it is now, and I know whom I have believed." Then came a paleness yet more deathly, and a cold perspiration that told of the nearness of the end. Summoning all his remaining strength for a few more words with his father, he added, "I not only know that Christ has saved me, I am sure that He will save you and be your eternal portion if you will let Him." These words were almost choked in the utterance, but an expression of calm confidence and gladness on the face of the dying boy gave them unspeakable emphasis, and carried them home to the father's heart.

Many years have passed since Fred was carried to what was thought a premature grave; but "he being dead, yet speaketh." His solemn words of entreaty and of assurance were ever remembered by his father, who from that time never rested until he found rest in Christ. God blessed the testimony of the father as He had blessed that of the son, and the great hereafter alone can reveal how many have owed their first desire after God to the words and example of George Henry Greenwell.

THREE GREAT COMING EVENTS.

By P. W. E.

II. The Hour of Temptation; or, The Great Tribulation.

The Seventieth Week in Daniel—God's Day of Vengeance — The Seven Seals — The Seven Trumpets—Antichrist's Seven Years' Covenant with the Jews—The Covenant Broken in the Middle of the Week—War in Heaven—Antichrist's Usurpation of Divine Power on Earth—The Two Witnesses—Babylon the Great—Her Overthrow—End of the Tribulation.

THIS hour of temptation is the time intervening between the coming of the Lord for His saints and His coming with them. It is also known as the seventieth week in Daniel's prophecy,* therefore a cycle of seven years, commencing after the Church has been caught up into heaven. The Scriptures referring to this period occupy portions of the Psalms, Prophets, and the New Testament, especially the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, and the most of Revelation.

During these seven years God, by means of very severe judgments, prepares the way for Christ's earthly kingdom. He subdues His enemies and purifies His people. With the end of the third chapter of Revelation the Church disappears from the earth, "The things which are" pass away and "the things which shall be after these" are presented to our view. After this, God is not seen in the character He has ever manifested toward the Church, but in that in which He reveals Himself in the Old Testament Scriptures. The Church and all the saints have been raised, and are glorified in the presence of God; the work of judgment is about to begin, and the "lightnings and thunderings and voices" issuing from the throne, announce that God is seated on a throne of righteousness, and not, as now, on a throne of grace through righteousness.† A sealed book of judgment is His hand, and no man is found worthy to open until Christ, the Man of God's counsels, appear the One to whom all judgment is committed "Son of Man."‡

As "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root David," He is to execute God's judgments a carry out His government on the earth. This does under two characters—that as the slain Lam and as the Man of God's choice.

As long as the Holy Ghost is in the world, the is a restraint laid upon the power of evil. B when the Church is caught up to be with Christ t Holy Ghost no longer makes His abode on earth and then the "letting," or hindering power "taken out of the way:"‖ Thus man's self-will no longer restrained by the Holy Ghost, wh Satan's malice is aroused by the knowledge "th he hath but a short time." Human presumpti and rebellion against God now become a resistle torrent sweeping away all obstacles in its headlo course.

Christ first appears as the slain Lamb, and such he opens which he has received from God. See Rev chaps. 6-8, ver. 1. The first four seals usher judgments of conquest, bloody wars, famine, a widespread devastation and disease. The fift seal shows persecution to be raging; and a pray for judgment rises from the souls of the martyr saints, which announces that the day of grace over and the day of retribution has begun.

On the opening of the sixth seal, as if in answ to prayer, there is a general shaking of the powe of the earth, and universal consternation prevail There is no repentance, no cry for mercy, mere a terror of vengeance, and a frantic desire to e cape, as is shown by their hiding "in the de and in the rocks of the mountains," and sayin "to the mountains and rocks, fall on us and hi us from the face of Him that sitteth on the thron and from the wrath of the Lamb."§ This horr is premature, as the judgments of the great day wrath have but begun. All this corresponds wit the famine and wars, persecutions and pestilence foretold in our Lord's discourse as "the begi ning of sorrows."¶

Then a pause of great significance occurs. Th judgments that follow are of a more terrible cha acter, and a special election of God is signifie marking those who shall pass through them with out suffering death. Twelve thousand are seale in the forehead from each of the twelve tribes c Israel; and a countless multitude of Gentiles though not thus sealed, are shown as passin through "The great tribulation," and obtainin the victory, having "washed their robes and mad them white in the blood of the Lamb."¶ The lin between Israel and the Gentiles appears again which during the Church period was obliterated.

After this respite, the seventh seal is opened Rev., chap. 8. Then another and more dreadfu series of judgments fall upon the world. These ar introduced by seven trumpets sounded by seve angels, and during the time of these judgments Christ is no longer seen as the Lamb slain, bu in angelic character as "the Messenger of th Covenant." As such He offers up the prayers o the saints; and the answer is the fire of God consuming judgment cast on the earth, which also shows that the day of Christ's patience is over, and the day of vengeance has begun.

THE TRUMPETS

follow in rapid and dreadful succession. The first four announce wars, tumults, delusions, and anarchy, spread over a third part of the world, referring most likely to the Roman Empire, which has been revived. But the worst is still to follow, in the three last trumpets, which bring "woe, woe, woe to the inhabitants of the earth."

The first of these woes seems to be infernal in character, spiritual darkness, accompanied with torment of conscience worse than death, judicially let loose, for the judgment of the Israelites who have not the seal of God in their foreheads. "One woe is past; and behold, there come two woes more hereafter."* The second of the three woes falls apparently on the Roman Empire, and is called for by a voice from the altar of intercession. It is a fearful scourge, having a Satanic character, in inflicting horrible slaughter and misery on the region it visits.

During the course of this woe other purposes of God are manifested.† A strong angel, whom we recognize as Christ Himself, comes down from Heaven and takes possession of sea and land, and swears by Him who liveth forever that there shall be "time no longer;" but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished."‡

Before the peal of the last trumpet, we see Jerusalem once more inhabited by Jews, with the temple rebuilt and the temple-worship re-established. For particulars on this point, let us turn to Dan., chap. 9. At the beginning of that week or cycle of seven years, there is to be a person who "shall confirm a covenant with many for one week. This covenant is to be made with the majority of the Jewish people. The person is "the prince that shall come," mentioned in the previous verse. That prince is the prince of the people that destroyed Jerusalem. The Romans destroyed the city; thus the prince must be the head of the Roman Empire, who is to appear upon the scene in these closing days of the times of the Gentiles.

A covenant is concluded between him and many of the Jews, who will then have returned to Jerusalem and revived their old sacrifices. There is a remnant, however, the elect Jews, who refuse to join in this treaty, and on account thereof are subjected to cruel persecution. In the midst of the week the prince stops the sacrifices and changes times and laws. This last half week, when wickedness and misery culminate, is three and a half years, or "a time, times and half a time," or "forty and two months," or "one thousand two hundred and three score days," expressions which frequently occur in the description of those fearful events, preceding the restoration of Israel and the establishment of the reign of the Lord on the earth.

The crowning act of the prince's wickedness is the setting up of some abomination, or idol, which brings down desolating judgment. Then the elect remnant flee, without a moment's delay, from the city, as told by the Lord in His discourse.§ This remnant, under the symbol of a woman, flees "into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand, two hundred and threescore days."‖ The time has come to this remnant of which it is written, "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her. And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor (trouble) for a door of hope."¶ It is here, in the wilderness, in the deep valley of tribulation, that He unfolds to them the greatness of their sin, shows them the riches of His mercy and leads them to true repentance and faith in Him. Out of this they come purified and fitted for Jehovah's blessing.

About this same time,

takes place in heaven. "There was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not. . . . The great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. . . . And when the dragon saw that he was cast into the earth he persecuted the woman . . . . . and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

We now see the dragon in direct antagonism to the woman. But he works behind the scene, through his agents; for Satan seeks to work by craft, and himself to remain unobserved. God has a people whom he purposes to place above all the nations of the earth; Satan has a people too. God has an anointed Ruler of the world whom He will invest with his own authority; Satan will have such a ruler also. God has His Christ, the Lamb, whom He will bring forth as the Deliverer of Israel; Satan will have his Antichrist, his false Lamb, who will pretend to be the deliverer of Israel, too. He whom Satan places at the head of the civil government is called in Revelation the Beast. This beast seems to be he who will be the head of the Roman Empire. These facts we gather from Rev. 13:13; 17:10, 11 and Daniel 7:2-7.

Satan and his human tool become the objects of religious worship. 'And they worship the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worship the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him? And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name, and His tabernacle, and those that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations; and all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."* We here see civil government is received directly from the dragon, and allegiance and worship rendered to him and his instruments.

But this is not all.

is brought to the scene. And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon" (ver. 11). Looking like a lamb; he bears the external appearance of the Messiah. But to those who know the voice of the true Messiah, there is a great difference. They recognize it as the voice of a dragon. There is a hideous feature about this new and degrading idolatry which at once marks Satan's power, and explains the greedy reception of the delusion by the multitude.

"And he," this second beast, "had power to give breath (not life) unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, the name of the beast, or the number of his name."†

There is a striking resemblance between this false Christ here described and "the man of sin," mentioned by Paul. He informs the Thessalonians, that before Christ shall come with His saints, "that man of sin will be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."‡

While this beast and this Antichrist are using their Satanic power and miraculous deception, God sends "two witnesses; and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth."§ These two witnesses have the characteristics of Moses and Elijah. They are Jewish, and have power over fire, rain, and can turn water into blood and smite the earth with plagues. "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them and kill them. And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified."

While the people of the earth are rejoicing over the downfall of these two witnesses and sending "gifts one to another," "the Spirit of life from God entered into them," i.e., the two witnesses—"and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them. And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them." Caught up to heaven, like Christ Himself, in a cloud, the express emblem of divine presence. "And their enemies beheld them." What a sight! More appalling than the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast, and pointing to a still more terrible doom. In the same hour was a great earthquake, the tenth part of the city fell and seven thousand men were slain. "The second woe is past; and behold, the third woe cometh quickly" (ver. 14).

Had we time and space, we might speak of the seven vials, but as they seem to be parallelisms with the seven trumpets, we will briefly refer to on whose forehead was written "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and abominations of the Earth."*

We first have the beast, who is a great Roman prince, and during the last three and a half years of his reign, he receives his power directly from Satan, and uses it to carry out Satan's persecution of the godly remnant of the Jews. We next have the false Christ, or Antichrist, a pretender to Divine character and worship; outwardly like a lamb, but with the voice of a dragon. He enters into league with this prince, which is described as "a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell;"† and finally, with his leagued help, puts down all Jewish rites, and exalts himself as an object of worship. This is the religious apostasy of the Jews.

And lastly, comes Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots, whose seat is not at Jerusalem, but at Rome. "The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth."‡ This woman is not a person but a system, which is the Roman Catholic Church; "the woman which thou sawest is that great city" (ver. 18). Out of the Roman Catholic Church all other churches have sprung, and here the Holy Spirit calls her the mother of harlots.

Thus at the close of this week of tribulation we have all the Satanic powers of earth combined against the Lord and His Anointed. "The heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us."§ All nations will gather against Jerusalem to battle, "and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished."‖ "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."¶

All these events are included in the hour of temptation. Satan works, through his agents, "with all power and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness." Such, then, is "the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world." The climax will be, when the Son of Man comes in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory and all His saints with Him.

An American Missionary in China has Recently been placed in charge of a hospital. Some time ago the wife of the Governor-General of the Province of Chili, China, fell sick, and Miss Howard, an American missionary physician, as a last resort, was called to attend her. She was cured, and the Viceroy, Li Hung Chang, full of gratitude, opened a public dispensary, and placed Miss Howard and Dr. McKenzie in charge of it, with no restrictions. This movement, which is unprecedented in China, has developed into a hospital, which has just been opened in a fine building in the native style, costing $6000. The wealthy Chinese contributed freely. The ceremonies of the opening of the hospital were graced by the Viceroy and several nobles.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Efforts Were Made Last Week to Effect a compromise between the two great parties in the Senate, so as to organize the committees. Owing to the death of Senator Carpenter and the removal of Senators Blaine, Windom, and Kirkwood to the Cabinet, the Democrats are temporarily in a majority, but it is believed that when the vacancies are filled there will be a tie between the two parties. Each party fully appreciates the advantage of obtaining possession of the committees, who practically control legislation in that chamber, but it is obvious that the attempt of either party to monopolize the power would lead to a struggle which would be renewed whenever the absence of any Senator left the party to which he belonged in a minority. In order to avoid so undesirable a state of affairs as the time of the Senate being wasted in party skirmishes, a proposition has been entertained to arrange the forty committees on an equitable basis, which shall be maintained throughout the Congress. Senators Bayard and Allison are understood to have taken an active part in the arrangement.

An Extra Session of Congress is Advocated by an influential section of both parties. There are many reasons for the project, the principal one being that a refunding bill ought to be passed at the earliest moment possible, to avoid serious loss. As the late bill was killed by a Republican veto, Republicans especially are anxious that the responsibility for the payment of the high rate of interest may not rest on the party.

The Formal Unveiling of Mrs. Hayes's Portrait in the Executive Mansion, took place March 8th. It occupies the panel next to the one where the portrait of Martha Washington hangs. Miss Frances E. Willard, President of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, was introduced to the President and Mrs. Garfield, after which, stepping forward with the President to the front of the picture, she turned, and, in a few appropriate words presented the picture in the name of the women of the nation. The President received the picture, saying, "I have observed the significance which you have given to this portrait from the standpoint you occupy, and in connection with the work in which you are engaged. What you have said concerning the evils of intemperance meets my most hearty concurrence. I have been, in my way, and in accordance with my own convictions, an earnest advocate of temperance, not in so narrow a sense as some, but in a very definite and practical sense. These convictions are deep, and will be maintained. Whether I shall be able to meet the views of all people in regard to all the phases of that question remains to be seen. But I shall do what I can to abate the great evils of intemperance. I shall be glad to have this picture upon these walls, and shall be glad to remember your kind expressions to me and my family, and in your efforts to better mankind by your work. I hope that you will be guided by wisdom, and that you will achieve a worthy success." The company were then presented singly to the President and his wife. Miss Ransom, on behalf of the ladies, asked for a meeting with President Garfield's mother, which was accorded.

The National Banks who, Prompted by alarm at the fifth section of the Funding Bill, deposited legal tenders to enable them to withdraw their circulation, have applied for permission to replace the deposits with the bonds they hold. The Cabinet, having considered the application, decided to reject it, and have informed the banks that the process of retiring that amount of currency legally begun must, under the law, be continued. The banks will therefore be compelled to suffer inconvenience; but this inconvenience will only be of a temporary character, and will not necessarily involve a permanent contraction of currency. It is true that the eighteen millions of lawful money which have been deposited will not be returned but, the banks can at any time deposit new bonds and take out additional circulation, or can even return the identical bonds they withdrew.

The Invitation Proffered to ex-Secretary Schurz, by a section of the citizens, to visit Boston, and the expressions of commendation they give of the policy he pursued while in office, must not be accepted by the public as an indication that Massachusetts has withdrawn from the position she occupied on the Ponca question. A letter was sent on Friday to Senators Dawes and Hoar, concluding as follows:

"In view of the fact that some of our eminent citizens have publicly addressed the Secretary of the Interior in approval of his entire administration of Indian affairs as well as of the other interests of his department, thereby taking issue with your action so far as you have felt compelled to oppose his course, we desire to say that their letter to him does not, in our judgment, represent the sentiment of Massachusetts."

The letter is signed by the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, seven of the eight members of the Executive Council, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, and a large number of the members of both branches of the Legislature, the Mayor of Boston, and about four hundred other prominent citizens.

In Answer to Many Questions, and to Correct misunderstandings on the part of the public, the Bible Revision Committee make the following statement:

"1. The Revised New Testament will be published by the English University presses in May next, in different sizes and styles of binding, at corresponding prices.

"2. The American Committee give their sanction to the University editions as containing the text pure and simple.

"3. The Committee have no connection with any of the proposed reprints.

"4. The publication of the Revision will be precisely on the same footing as the present authorized version — that is, protected by copyright in England and free in this country.

"5. The American Committee will present to every old and new contributor of not less than ten dollars toward the expenses of their work a memorial copy of the best University edition in royal octavo, handsomely bound and inscribed. This offer holds good till next May, and the copies will be forwarded free of expense as soon as received."

The Revision Committee will not sell the book, but booksellers in all parts of the United States will have imported or reprinted copies for sale at prices varying from twenty-five cents to several dollars.

A Stringent Temperance Law, Designed to give effect to the constitutional amendment adopted in Kansas, has passed the Legislature. Under this law only druggists can sell intoxicating liquors, and they must give good and sufficient bonds that they will sell it only for "medical, mechanical, and scientific purposes." All evasions of the law by giving liquor away to customers are to be construed as selling, and all clubs for procuring liquors and dividing among the members are treated the same as places of common sale. All places where intoxicating liquors are sold are declared a common nuisance, and the proper officers are required to close them. It is made the duty of sheriffs, constables, and county attorneys to enforce the provisions of this act, and they render themselves liable to punishment if they neglect to do so.

The bill was passed by a large majority. In the House the vote stood 100 to 29; in the Senate, 29 to 9. In order to take no unfair advantage of those who have invested in the liquor business under the old law, the new law does not take effect until the first of May. An association of citizens has been formed, with branches throughout the State, to see that the law is effectually executed.

Of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Work in San Francisco, a correspondent of a New York journal writes: "There has never been a revival of religion on the Pacific coast like the one now in progress. The work has extended to the interior towns and cities of California. Besides Messrs. Moody and Sankey, Mr. Hallenback and Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins have been constantly engaged in holding meetings. The congregations at the ordinary services of all the evangelical churches have greatly increased in numbers and devout attention. The regular church prayer-meetings in many localities are thronged with converts and inquirers."

Sunday Observance has not been Considered a prominent characteristic of the City of New York, but it appears there are limits to the forms in which the Lord's Day may be desecrated. Permission was asked from the superintendent of police for two regiments of soldiers from Washington to parade up Broadway to the regimental armory, with music, on Sunday, March 6th. The superintendent promptly returned answer that the law imperatively forbade such processions on Sunday, and that it must be obeyed; and forthwith took measures to enforce its obedience. The procession did not take place.

An International Sunday-school Convention will be held in Toronto on the 22d of June. Many European delegates are expected. The general subject to be discussed by the convention will be "The New Century in Sunday-school Work," the motto being, "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before." Reports will be presented from every country represented, of the progress of Sunday-school work.

A Day of United Supplication for a Revival of religion was recommended by many of the Brooklyn pastors, and was fixed for Wednesday, March 9th. The service was held in the First Baptist Church at Clinton and Pierrepont Streets, and lasted from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. The church, seating 2100 persons, was thronged. Addresses were delivered by various clergymen, and earnest prayers offered for the outpouring of the Spirit.

Two Railroad Accidents, One of Which was of a peculiarly distressing character, occurred on March 1st, on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railway, in which at least ten lives were lost and over thirty persons badly hurt. The first accident occurred to the west-bound passenger train from Chicago, which was behind time, and was running slow in consequence of a bad track. At a point six miles west of Macon a broken rail was encountered, and the engine, baggage car, two coaches and one sleeper were thrown from the track and badly demolished. It was dark at the time, and the cars, in leaving the rails, turned completely over.

As quickly as possible a huge fire was built and telegrams sent for assistance to Brookfield, where a wrecking train was immediately despatched for the scene of the passenger-train accident, with orders "to run wild."

The train carried doctors and helpers, and when about ten miles from Brookfield, in crossing Brusle Creek bridge, the structure gave way and the whole train was precipitated into the creek, the engine falling on the car and completely demolishing it. Every person on the train was more or less injured and several killed.

An Innocent Man was Lynched in Colorado cently. He was a member of a respectable family siding at Westminster, Md., and had gone to olorado on a prospecting tour. As no news was ceived from him after he set out for the West, quiries were made through a United States army aplain in Colorado. Intelligence has now been ceived that he was lynched by a so-called Vigi- nce Committee. He had purchased some mules nich had been stolen, and when the committee und them in his possession they condemned him death, and refused to listen to any explanations. e assured them he could easily establish his inno- nce, but they would not believe him, and he was nged on the nearest tree. In view of such a ime we may well cry as David did, "Let us fall to the hand of the Lord, and let me not fall into e hand of man" (2 Samuel 24 : 14). These self- nstituted judges rejected an innocent man's ap- al for justice, while the all-wise Judge grants rdon even to the guilty if they have accepted re- mption through Christ.

A Valuable Production Spurned.—It is Re- orted that a wild plant, called the Creole tea- ant, grows profusely on high lands in Loui- ana. The planters have tried for years to ex- rminate it as a pest, but it has lately been dis- overed that it yields a woody fibre closely resem- ling jute, but of a much finer quality. It is claimed at the process of preparation is very simple, and r less expensive than that of jute or ramie. It is ot the first time that men have been known to de- ise that which they afterward learned to be of al- ost priceless value. The majority of the world re so intent upon the acquisition of wealth or ume, which they can enjoy only in this life, that ey neglect the Gospel message that would insure eir happiness throughout eternity.

The Details of a Prayerful Struggle were elated last week at the Fulton Street prayer-meet- g. A minister said he was holding Gospel tem- erance meetings during the winter, in a city not r from New York. One of these services was at- nded by a young lady who was the daughter of ealthy parents moving in the best society. But is daughter had yielded to the fascination of rong drink, and sometimes would get away from ome unseen, and satisfy the awful cravings. lore than once she was seen to be under the influ- nce of liquor by police officers, who knew where he lived and took her home. Attending the Gos- el temperance meeting referred to, she was deeply mpressed, and going home she wrote out a solemn ledge on the fly-leaf of a small Bible, and signed . Passing the house soon after, the minister was urprised at being hailed from the window, and sked to come in. He entered the house, and in he parlor found mother and daughter in great nguish. The burning, awful thirst had come pon the daughter, a craving that she knew not ow to resist. She must drink or die. The minster roposed prayer, and they all knelt and continued heir supplications until victory was given, and the empted one said the craving had passed away.

Delegates from America to the World's Con- erence of Young Men's Christian Associations will eave New York on July 16th. Early notice is given f the fact because one hundred berths have been ngaged on the excursion steamer for the delegates, nd if more than one hundred intend going, and refer making the trip in company, the extra berths nay now be secured on advantageous terms. The onference will be held in Exeter Hall, London, August 3rd–8th. Applications should be addressed o Mr. H. B. Chamberlain, 52 East Twenty-Third Street, New York City.

Steering in the Fog is an Operation at- tended with danger, but an incident mentioned in the Christian Intelligencer indicates how even in a fog, dangers are sometimes avoided. A passenger on board a coast steamer, find- ing that Cape Hatteras had been passed during the preceding night, when the fog must have prevented any observations being taken from the stars, inquired how the ship's course had been so accurately followed. The captain explained that where sight failed, another means of ascertaining the proximity of danger existed. "We learned our position last night," he said, "by the lead. Our soundings told us when we were off the cape, and when we had passed it." So in the journey of life the believer often walks by faith and not by sight. He needs not to examine perilous places, such as the theatre and the ball-room, to ascertain whether he may safely approach them ; indications of their character are plentiful in their neighbor- hood, and the watchful Christian heeds the warning.

Mr. Railton, the Commissioner of the Salva- tion Army contingent in America, has been recalled by the chief of the army in Great Britain. Opera- tions have been commenced in Ireland, France, and Australia, and General Booth finds the strain on his mind so great in directing these movements that he is in sore need of assistance. Mr. Railton has been in the front of the battle from the com- mencement and General Booth feels constrained to call for his services at headquarters. As soon as a successor can be sent out the commissioner will return to England. The movement in this country, in spite of the severe weather, which renders open-air meetings impossible and entails a heavy expenditure for heating the halls, is making progress. Difficulties within and without the force have been raised by the enemy of souls, but the army make light of them and say that they meet with similar obstruction everywhere.

While New York, Brooklyn, and Other Large cities are deploring the fact that a large proportion of the inhabitants never attend a place of wor- ship, a city in the South presents a record which deserves notice. It appears that Richmond, Va., has a population of 63,000, of whom about 26,000 belong to some one or other of the churches. Of these about 20,000 are Baptists —over 14,000 being colored Baptists. The lead- ing colored church is the largest in the country, having a membership of between three and four thousand. While we know that the mere fact of regular church attendance is not sufficient evidence of vital godliness, yet it is obvious that religion is more likely to be found among church-goers than among those who habitually stay away. It is therefore worthy of record that in at least one of our cities a large proportion of the population are identified with some religious community.

The Rev. J. S. Inskip, Who is Now on His tour round the world, thus describes an annual meeting of the Methodist Conference of North India in the month of January : "It was somewhat sin- gular to listen to debates in the Hindoostanee and our own language alternately. Occasionally the entire proceedings were conducted in the vernacu- lar of the country. All the brethren have acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to speak it fluently. It was not a little amusing to see Bishop Merrill giving the most patient attention to the de- bates, and adding, as the contest ended, 'I pre- sume you are all in order and have been speaking to the question, which if the brethren please we will now take.' We frequently thought we could discern an indication of great satisfaction in the countenance of the bishop whenever the perform- ances, in what to some of us was an unknown tongue, ended."

A Saloon-keeper in Chicago is Being Sued for twenty-five thousand dollars by the wife of an inebriate. A few years ago the husband ranked among the best of American painters ; now he has wrecked his reputation, art, and fortune through dissipation, and has twice recently been sent to the Bridewell for drunkenness. His wife claims that the defendants sold him the liquor which resulted in that drunkenness and the subsequent imprisonment and shame. She has brought suit for a sum which at first sight appears large, but is moderate when consideration is given to the sum her husband might have earned and to the degradation in which his dissipation has sunk his family.

A New Pledge has been Added to those already in use by the Business Men's Society for the Encouragement of Moderation, in New York. It has issued a pledge binding the signer not to drink liquor when absent from home. This is another step in the direction it was hoped the society would take; the final goal being total ab- stinence.

THE HEROIC IN CHRISTIANITY.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, delivered on Sunday morning, February 20, 1881.

"For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again."—Luke, 6 : 32–34.

Brethren in Christ, every word which proceeds out of our Master's lips is precious to us. We make no distinction between His promises and His precepts, but prize every syllable above rubies. A doctrine from him we value beyond the much fine gold, and a command is equally high in our es- teem. Whether His teaching be practical or doc- trinal, whether it be intended to guide the feet or to encourage the heart, we are equally rejoiced at it.

"All his words are music, though they make us weep ; Infinitely tender, infinitely deep."

All the discourses of Jesus are the words of God to our soul, whether they convey to us instruction, warning, rebuke, invitation or consolation. As all His garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, so are all His words most sweet to our taste.

We have not so learned Christ as to be pickers and choosers when the fruits of His lips are before us. Yet have I known professors of that sort, who would fain rend the Master's vesture that they might have only the softest part of it to be a pillow for their idle heads. "That," they say, "was a Gospel sermon, sweet food for our souls," because it happened to tell of what Christ has done for us ; but on the next occasion they cry out, "That was not a Gospel sermon ; it was legal ; it laid a burden upon our shoulders," because it dared to tell of what Christ has commanded us to do for Him.

Such men, it seems to me, accept Christ for a servant rather than for a Master. They are glad that He shall do this or that for them—that He shall, in fact, gird Himself and wait at their table while they sit down to meat ; but if they had learned better they would have chosen Christ for a Master, and would have been willing to gird them- selves at His command and wait on their Lord, counting it their honor to be servants of so divine a Prince. Feeling certain that you are not of that order of religious cavillers, but that you will accept anything that comes from Christ, I am glad to have a practical subject this morning.

Brethren, in the matters of which I shall have to speak in the name of the Lord, taken, as I am quite certain, from His own words, there will be some things strange and unusual which may possibly sound harshly in your ears. Be not as- tonished, for the Gospel is one of those thoughts of God which are not our thoughts : the whole system which Christ has ushered in is foreign to men, being as far above them as the heavens are above the earth. Our Lord's kingdom is not of this world, else would His servants do many things which now they forbear to do.

The conduct of the subjects of that kingdom must not be measured by the manners of others ; for they are a people as peculiar as the kingdom to which they belong. We have heard persons say, "I do not see it to be my duty to be so precise ; it is not customary." What have you and I to do with custom? If things are right, but not in fashion, let us start the fashion ; and when it is the fashion to do wrong let us be desperately unfashionable. Our Master, evidently, from the verses before us, did not come into the world to teach us to conform to the ways of our fellow-men ; but He would have us go far beyond the ordinary conduct of our fellows. He asked in His sermon on the Mount, "What do ye more than others?" He ordains a standard far above the common standard of mankind when He says again and again, "What thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same."

I allow in other men what I would denounce in myself. I could approve in some men actions which to me also would be lawful but would not be expedient, upon the higher rule of glorifying God in all things. When I have heard of certain deeds of unconverted and unenlightened men I have excused them, saying, "Poor souls, considering who they were, and where they were, their conduct is not so heavily to be blamed;" and yet if I had behaved one half as badly there would have been rebellion and presumption in the deed. For favored children there is a different law from that which governs common subjects ; that which is passed over in strangers is atrocious when it comes from a bosom friend. You are not under law, but under grace ; and being under grace, you feel the force of a constraint even holier and higher than mere law could put upon you.

If you are what you profess to be, my brethren, more is expected from you than from any other men beneath the sun, and therefore I shall throw aside all hesitancy in setting before you and asking of you what we never can get from sinners, nor from men of the world. Know ye not that your Lord has said, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven?"

If I were called to address an ordinary company of men and women upon feats of valor, I might speak with bated breath if I exhorted them to heroism in war ; but if I had lived some thousands of years ago, and had been called upon to talk to Spartan warriors, all equipped for battle, men graved and scored with the scars of conflict, I should set no bounds to my exhortations ; I would bestir them as a lion arouses the young lions and urges them to the prey. I should tell them that their name and parentage should not be disgraced by the idea of defeat, but that they must expect victory, and seize it as their right. No orator would have spoken to Spartans as to Bœotians : it was their very life and business to fight, and deeds of prowess were therefore to be looked for from them.

Is it not so with you, ye followers of the Crucified? Your martyrs and confessors call upon you to lead a life beyond that of common men. I say all this, because to certain of you a sort of apology may seem needful for the strong things that may be said before you at this time. May God's Holy Spirit come upon you, and make you strong enough for all the strong things, glorifying himself in your weakness.

I. Our first observation in plunging into our discourse is this. Much that is naturally good may fall far short of Christian character. Do not make the mistake of saying that moral excellence is not good. I could wish that some who call themselves Christians were in certain respects as good as others whom I know of who have never borne the Christian name. It is always right to speak the truth, and truth obliges me to say as much as this. This ought to make professors very seriously in earnest to judge themselves, lest they should mistake natural amiability and morality for the fruit of the Spirit of God. If the question be whether our character is the offspring of nature or of grace, it will be a sad thing if the verdict should turn out to be that it is the dead child of nature finely dressed, but not the living child of grace divine.

Observe the three things mentioned in the text against which there is no law, but of which much is to be spoken in commendation. These acts are good, but they do not come up to Christ's standard. The first is, "If ye love them which love you." It is very proper and seemly that kindly feeling should awaken kindly feeling in return ; that to those who are friendly to us we should be friendly also. We say "Love begets love," and it is natural that it should do so. Yet I am sorry to say that, though this is no more than a natural excellence, it is not by any means so common as to be universal. There are children who do not love parents who toiled and slaved for them in their childhood, but who grow up to exhibit a strange hardness of heart to the authors of their existence. I know brothers who do not love the most affectionate and amiable of sisters, and it is grievous to have to add that there are many husbands, brutal husbands, who do not love their wives, who are sacrificing their lives out of love to them and their little ones. I blush to think of the many instances which I could quote, but there is no need ; you know it is so.

Thousands have never reached so high as this standard. "If ye love them which love you." But even if we reach as high as that it is by no means a great attainment : is it? Our Lord says that sinners also love those that love them. Grace is not needed to make a man the loving husband of a tender wife ; grace is not needed to make affectionate sons and daughters ; we see them all around us. I am sure it does not require grace in the hearts of the bulk of you to make you feel kindly toward those who treat you in a friendly manner ; "sinners also love those that love them." You have all come as far as that, and such feeling is good, the more of it the better ; yet it is not up to the mark of Christ's teaching if it stands alone : it is not that for which the Holy Spirit has begotten us again : it is not that for which Christ has shed His precious blood.

exists than that which loves them that love you ; here it is—we are to love them that hate us, and despitefully entreat us. Can you love those who will not mention your name without grinding their teeth in envy, or sneering in scorn? Can you love those who have belied your character, who have done the best they can to ruin you, and who will do the same again? Can you feel toward them an earnest desire for their present and eternal welfare? If you could do them good would you delight to do it, and repeat the deed until you had made them too happy to be malicious, too much indebted to continue at enmity? This would be glorious indeed, especially if you could keep clear of all selfish motive in such a contest of love, and should do it all, not because you want to seem a hero or to be something great, but simply because you delight to do good, and feel it to be a pleasure to do that good where it is most needed, namely, where the spirit of enmity has the greatest power.

The next thing, in the verses before us, is grateful return. "If ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye?" It is a very right thing that if persons have served us we should endeavor to repay the benefit. By common consent "one good turn deserves another." I am sorry to say that though this is a very ordinary sort of virtue it is not the commonest thing in the world, for you may help others if you like, but I have heard that they do not always help you in return.

It is certainly a horrible thing that men should be ungrateful ; but yet supposing that you, dear hearer, are grateful, and have lately taken special pains to do good to one who aforetime was good to you, what thank have you? You have done what you ought to have done, and no more ; you have paid an old debt as every honest man should do, but this does not prove you to be a Christian, for Christianity includes this and rises above it, like an Alp above the surrounding plain.

Followers of Jesus are called upon to do good to those who have done them harm. You know the old saying, evil for good is devil-like, evil for evil is beast-like, good for good is man-like, good for evil is God-like. Rise you to that God-like point. If a man has taken the bread out of your mouth, seize the first opportunity to help him to a livelihood. If he has bespattered you, be ready to forgive him, but say not a word against him. Watch for a time, when by great kindness you may heap on his head. "Hard teaching," says one. I know it is, and harder doing, but it is blessed doing. It is a high virtue ; nevertheless, to this we must come if we are to be the followers of Christ.

Again, you note in the thirty-fourth verse that mention is made of helping others in a neighborly way with the expectation of their returning the friendly deed. "If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye?" Temporary help is often rendered in the expectation that, if ever we are in the same need, we shall only need to ask and receive like aid. A neighborly sort of barter, which goes on all around, and ought to go on ; but there is nothing very wonderful in it, for, after all, it is a sort of laying by in store, making your neighbor your banker for awhile. I help you and you help me—a very proper thing to do, and the more of such brotherly and neighborly co-operation the better, but still there is nothing so very virtuous in it. "What thank have ye, for sinners also lend to sinners to receive as much again."

You as a Christian are to rise to something higher than this—namely, to be ready to help without the expectation of being helped again, ready to aid those who, you are certain, could not help you, who are too poor ever to come to your rescue ; ay, and ready to help those who would not help you if they could, who may even return your kindness with words of falsehood and acts of unkindness. Can you rise to this? for this is to be a Christian, this is to be like your Heavenly Father, who sendeth His rain upon the just and upon the unjust, who causeth His sun to shine upon the field of the churl as well as upon the garden of the liberal ; who gives, and gives, and gives, and receives nothing in return.

Thus, brethren, I think I have shown you that there are certain good things in the world which, nevertheless, do not reach to the standard of Christian virtue. This holds good of all religious actions. You go to the house of God ; so do the heathens go to the house of their god. You spend certain times in prayer ; so do the Mohammedans. You are very devout ; so are Parsees. You are known to be a religious man ; so were a great many who have turned out to be rogues. You are a deacon, or other church officer ; yes, so were certain bank directors, who were none the more honest for that. But you are a preacher, yes, and so was Judas, who hanged himself, and so went to his own place. Religious acts count for nothing unless there is a true heart at the back of them. These things ought we to have done, but if we leave heart work undone nothing is done.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE HEROIC STANDARD.

II. Secondly, dear friends, I want you to notice that Christian virtue is in many respects extraordinary, and might be called heroic. To illustrate this, I will confine myself to the Gospel according to Luke. In the passage that we have been reading we have evidently a form of virtue which is quite out of the ordinary range of men's thoughts. It concerns love. "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." In the point of love, kindness, consideration for men's needs, and desire to do good, the Christian life is to rise above every other, till it becomes sublime.

Heathen moralists recommended kindness, but they did not suggest its being lavished upon enemies. I have been somewhat amused by the caution of Cicero. He says, "Kindness must not be shown to a youth, nor to an old man : not to the aged, because he is likely to die before he can have an occasion to repay you the benefit ; and not to the young man, for he is sure to forget it." Those of us who are middle-aged may value the orator's generosity as we like, but we may reflect that he only recommends its exercise toward us because we are likely to be good debtors, and pay back what we receive, perhaps with interest. That gentle laugh which ripples over the congregation is the best refutation of such barefaced selfishness. Our Lord bids us seek no reward from men, and He assures us that then a greater reward will come. We shall by shunning it secure it. We shall find a reward in being unrewarded.

Next read Luke 9 : 54, 55, and you will see that the Christian is to rise above human passion in the matter of gentleness. James and John, when Christ was not received by the Samaritan villagers, said, "Wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them?" But Jesus rebuked them and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. And they went to another village."

A Christian should be ready to give way; he should be quiet, peaceable, gentle. If in trying to do good, he wishes to bless certain people, and they refuse to hear him, let him not grow indignant and denounce the offenders, but let him change the scene and carry his message to those who perhaps are hungering for it. He may go round again very shortly to those who repulsed him and find them in a better mind. Be gentle, brother; soft words are hard to answer. They refused you at first, try them again; at any rate, be not provoked, for then they will have conquered you.

In the elevation of his joy the Christian is also to rise above all other men. He may rejoice as they do in the common bounties of Providence, but that joy is to hold very secondary rank. Even in his own success as a Christian worker he takes but measured satisfaction. Read Luke 10 : 20, and see what is the source of his truest delight: "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven." Is not a believer a wonderful being, since even spiritual power and victory over the devil do not excite him, but he finds his joy in a fact which is quite out of himself and fixed by the unchangeable decree of God?

The Christian is heroic, next, in his fearlessness. Turn to the twelfth chapter, verse 4, and there find Christ saying to His disciples: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear; Fear him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell." The genuine Christian stands not in fear of public opinion, and dreads not the frown of those whom God frowns upon.

The true believer is to be willing to bear reproach; ay, and to bear much more than reproach, as saints of God have done time out of mind. So far from flinching from suffering, we are not even to give it a thought as to how we shall speak if we are brought before kings and rulers, for a part of the Christian's heroism is to lie in his calm self-possession. The same man who is so gentle that if men will not listen to him he goes elsewhere, is so steadfast that he cannot be silenced: bold as a lion he stands before his accusers, and he is not troubled as to how he shall put his words together, for he relies upon the indwelling Spirit whom the world cannot receive because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him. Relying upon that Spirit he speaks when the time comes to speak, and it is the right word, as his adversaries are compelled to confess; or he is silent while it is time to be silent, and even in that silence there is an awe which is felt by those round about him. After this fashion is he to play the man.

See how far the true believer is lifted up as you turn to Luke 12 : 22, where the Lord bids us cultivate a holy ease of heart as to all temporal things. The rich man finds his wealth in his bursting barns, but the believer finds his treasure in the all-sufficiency of his God. The Saviour says, "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things."

See, brethren, the Spirit of God is to lift us up above all fretful cares: we are to feel that the Father will provide for us in this world, and that Jesus will never leave us comfortless. Because He is our Shepherd, and we cannot want, we are to dwell at ease, and lie down in green pastures, like a peaceful, restful flock. Covetousness is not to approach us, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. The desire to heap together a vast mass of wealth prevents the enjoyment of that which is already gained, and this must not come near an heir of heaven. As to temporal things, we are to be constantly calm, content, grateful, and trustful, relying upon the bounty of our God. This freedom from anxiety constitutes a main part of the Christian character, and is so uncommon as to lift its possessor far above men of the world.

Another point in which Christian heroism is seen is in humility and in delight in service. Turn to the fourteenth chapter and see our Lord's directions to His disciples not to seek out the highest, but rather the lowest, room, for, saith he, "whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." Habitually a Christian man is to have a modest esteem of himself. He is never to be known as one who is forward, self-seeking, self-asserting. Men who are highly esteemed by themselves are seldom justified by the verdict of their fellow-men. No, a Christian man is to be one who is ready to do anything for the good of others, however lowly the service.

That is not the Christian spirit which turns even the kingdom of heaven into an arena for ambition, but that man has the mind of Christ who becomes the servant of all for Christ's sake. That is not the Christian spirit which, under pretence of seeking liberty in the Church, craves after lordship and self-display. Those who are under this influence will have no rule in the Church of God except their own rule: they are too heady and high-minded to submit themselves to those who are over them in the Lord. The spirit of Christianity is lowly, yielding, easily to be entreated, seeking not itself. This is a chief point in the peculiarity of the peculiar people.

Furthermore, there should be about the Christian a faith which there is not in any other (See Luke 17 : 6). He should have an eye to see that which is invisible, and an arm to lean on that which he cannot feel. He should act upon facts which others may accept as theories but would never dream of risking a shilling upon it. Believers, ye are to be the men who can say to mountains, "Become plains," and to sycamine trees, "Be ye plucked up by the roots." Ye are to work miracles, not physical and material, but spiritual and mental, which are not less, but even more marvellous than wonders of healing or resurrection.

The next verse of this seventeenth chapter shows us that Christians are to be men of service. They are not to think that they came into the world to sit at a banquet, but they are to wait on their Master while he sits at the table. Too many appear to consider that the services of the sanctuary are intended merely to feed them: they never look upon the house of God as a barracks for soldiers, or a place where workmen come together to sharpen their tools; they only regard it as a sacred buttery, a spiritual larder, or a heavenly refectory, where much is to be received and little or nothing returned.

Servants are not supposed to spend their time in doing their own pleasure and seeking their own profit. A man-servant whose whole time was taken up with watching his own health would be of small value to his employer Even so we have something else to do beyond watching over our own inward feelings. To snatch a brand from the burning is better than to warm your own hands; to feed a hungry soul with the bread of heaven is a far higher deed than to eat the fat and drink the sweet yourself. There is more joy in plunging your arm up to the elbow in the mire to find a jewel for Christ than in washing one's idle hands with the scented soap of respectable propriety.

INCENTIVES TO THE EFFORT.

III. I will now close with the reflection that the Christian religion supplies due nourishment for the most heroic life. Bear with me while I show you this in a few sentences. First, the economy of grace requires it. You and I must have been chosen to lead a life higher than that of ordinary men, or else why all this noise and stir at all? We see heaven and earth and hell in motion; God vacates His throne and becomes a man; immortality puts on flesh and blood and dies; the Holy Ghost comes to dwell in these bodies of clay, while angels look on and wonder; surely here is the groundwork and argument of something supremely good.

Think again, brethren, we are helped to holy heroism by the reward which it brings: for our blessed Master, though He bids us spurn the thought of reward on earth, yet tells us that there is a reward in the thing itself. Just follow my text in the thirty-fifth verse: "Love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great." What reward? Why, the reward of having done good. This is quite enough. Therefore do not be so mercenary as to expect to be paid in dirty bronze and tarnished silver, but ask to find your recompense in the spirit by which you are led to do good, and in the smile of your Heavenly Father.

Then, mark you this to fire your ambition: you shall be children of the Highest. Those who can rise into the heroic life shall be as God. The gentle, patient, peaceable, kind, loving, forgiving, affectionate, these shall be known to be the sons of God; and is this nothing? Oh, if there is a grain of nobility in your natures you will make this the highest ambition of your lives, to be like God. What is more than that?

We are expected to be like God because we are His children. "Ye shall be the children of the Highest: for He is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil." We expect to see something of the father in the child. If we are children of God we ought to do what others never think of.

If you are the children of God remember what a Brother you have, and what an example He has set you. He disdained to live unto Himself, for He left the throne of glory to come down to Bethlehem's manger, to a carpenter's shop, and to a servant's life. The other night I heard read at family prayer the story of our Lord at the supper-table: Jesus knowing that He came from God, and went to God, took a towel and girded Himself and began to wash His disciples' feet. Ah, when I thought of Him whom all heaven worships, our blessed, blessed Master, actually coming round with a basin to wash the disciples' feet, I felt my eyes fill with tears, and I sympathized with Peter when he cried, "Dost thou wash my feet?" It seemed a stoop too great for our Lord and King thus to act a menial's part. Is there anything which can seem too mean for you and me after beholding such condescension?

If that sight touch you not, let me remind you of a further scene: he went into Gethsemane, and there He knelt and prayed for you and me until He was covered with a gory sweat, and great drops of blood followed each other to the ground. Is there any pain that we would not face, is there any reproach we could not bear after this for His dear sake? Does not that rouse you? Will you after this be proud and claim honor of your brethren, and grow angry if it be refused?

Come with me once again, for He goes to the cross, and there He hangs. It is your Lord, remember! See, the iron passes through His hand: it is your Lord who is thus maimed! The nails tear through his feet: the feet of your Lord! He wears a diadem as monarch, but it is a coronet of thorns: it is your Lord who is thus crowned! He wears crimson, too; but it is His own blood; and He is your own Lord! He has not a rag else, for they have stripped Him; yes, stripped and scourged your Lord! And they are hissing at Him, jesting at His prayers, and scoffing at His cries—all this at your Lord!

AND WHAT OF YOU?

The other day you were ashamed to own that you were His disciple. Are you not disgusted at such cowardice? You were silent the other day when sinners were blaspheming Him: you were niggardly when His poor people needed help; you refused to give when His Church and His cause knocked at your door. You would not forgive a fellow Christian the other day, and you parted company with one who had been your friend for years, and all for a hot word; and yet you call yourself a Christian!

Yes, and I, too, am a Christian, and have my own private cause for self-humiliation; and that is our Master bleeding there. How can we bear to look Him in the face? What sorry disciples we are! O blessed Master, let thy blood drop on us till thou hast blotted out these many faults of ours and made us like thyself. Amen and amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Luke 6 : 12-49.]

GIDEON'S GOOSE.

A rough, ignorant man was Gideon Green; and it may be supposed that an inveterate love of liquor, and habitual indulgence therein, did not improve his manners or intelligence. Not that there was nothing good left in Gideon. There is a soft, sweet place often lying beneath the rough, hard surface of the coarsest nature. Some one has said, "Every man, like a screw, has a head by which he can be turned, if you know how to find it."

But certainly Gideon was "a hard case." He could earn a fair livelihood at his craft, but then he kept so many "saints' days," in anything but a sanctified fashion. Sunday, as a matter of course, was given to lazy lounging in the morning, idle wanderings in the afternoon, and tap-room boozing in the evening. Idleness and indulgence kept him miserably poor, though his family were by far the greater sufferers. As a boy he had occasionally attended the Sunday-school and the house of God; but for years now his foot had never crossed the threshold of the sanctuary. For observe this fact—a man never attends the public house and God's house on the same day. There is a lingering sense of consistency even among godless men. And even if the man were not, in his own opinion, disqualified for attendance at God's house by reason of his clothes, his companions—yes, even the associates of the pot-house—would never tolerate the hypocrisy of spending the Sunday partly in the tavern and partly in the temple.

Gideon's Sunday clothes were the same as those he wore on working days. His recreation consisted of dog-running and pigeon-flying and drinking. His home was bare of all comforts, and his wife hardly pressed to find food and clothing for herself and two or three little ones.

Then came bad times. Next, a lowering of wages under the pressure of stagnant trade. Then, as a matter of course, a strike against the reduction. The sequel, the almost invariable result, when under evil counsel working men make war against capital at times when the labor market is glutted—surrender after weeks of idleness and loss, the men far worse off than if they had at first bowed to the inevitable. Gideon at last knew what it was to feel hunger. Not only had he and his fellows entered upon the contest at the worse possible time, so far as trade was concerned, but winter was advancing, and all were suffering under its severity. For the first time in his life Gideon Green went hungry, and that in the week before Christmas Day, when provisions were plentiful enough to the eye, and when the prudent and industrious were enjoying "enough and to spare."

Christmas morning came, and with it a sprinkling of snow. The cupboard empty at home, the house barer even than it had been ordinarily, Gideon strolled out across the common.

He came to a turnip field. His mouth positively watered for a taste of the raw vegetable. Looking round to see that he was not observed, he pulled a turnip, and with a positive relish devoured it, and that was Gideon Green's Christmas dinner in 1877.

He strolled on with his hands in his pockets and thought of his condition. Christmas Day! He could hear the sound of bells floating across from the neighboring town and from the church-tower in his own village. The smoke of cheery Christmas fires was rising from a hundred homes around him, and he almost fancied he could smell the appetizing odor of many a tempting and satisfying Christmas dinner. And Gideon Green had feasted upon a Swede turnip! And that, Gideon, that you stole.

The reflection was by no means pleasant, but it was true. Gideon said to himself, "Too proud to beg, but not too proud to steal!"

And then he thought of what might have been. Some of the men who had worked in the same trade were, notwithstanding all difficulties, enjoying their Christmas dinner, surrounded by happy children, well-clothed and well-fed.

If Gideon had but worked industriously, laying by for "the rainy day" that comes sooner or later in every working man's history, he would not have been absolutely penniless and starving on Christmas Day. But "the sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold, therefore shall he beg in harvest and have nothing."

A great enlightenment of Gideon Green's mind took place that wintry day. As the short afternoon sank into night he returned to his home. His wife had somehow or other provided a cup of tea, and a kind neighbor had sent in some food, and oranges and nuts for the children. As Gideon saw the happiness of his children, in the possession of what a few pence had purchased, and thought how utterly indifferent he had been to his own offspring, a new pang smote his heart.

The good impressions thus wrought in the mind led Gideon to resolve that henceforth the "Sportsman" should be abandoned, and that he would spend upon his family that which heretofore he had wasted upon himself and worthless companions.

It was in the first week of the new year that Gideon heard singing in the little village chapel, and crept in just by the door. A tiny place, not holding a hundred persons, lighted by petroleum lamps, and warmed by a stove which was then "fired-up" to a red heat.

The hymn ended, the minister announced his text in these words: "In whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them" (2 Cor. 4 : 4).

Though Gideon did not take away with him much of the sermon, he could not forget those words in the text, "Blinded the minds!" He saw himself in the mirror of God's Word that night. How blind he had been to his own character, to his interests, to his Saviour!

Reflection was followed by conviction, conviction by prayer. And soon the man who had been led first of all to abandon drink was found seeking the Saviour. The pot-house was abandoned, the sanctuary frequented. The wife and children rejoiced in the change, and shared in the blessing.

And now comes the incident which gives its title to these pages. Some seven or eight weeks before the next Christmas, Gideon went to a farmer who was fattening a number of geese, and said he wanted to begin subscribing for a goose. The farmer did not usually transact business in such a fashion, but he had marked with pleasure Green's improved course, and he kindly replied, "Nay, lad, if thee will only go on as thee hast done thou shall have a goose at Christmas and welcome!" "No, no," said Gideon, "I must pay for it, or I shan't enjoy it; and if you will let me pay you a little at a time, I shall get a goose for dinner on Christmas Day. What do you think, farmer, I had for dinner last Christmas?"

The farmer guessed and guessed, but, as may be supposed, all in vain. Then Gideon told how he had dined upon "a yellow turnip, and that I stole!"

The payments were kept up, and the time came for Gideon to claim his bird.

"You'll let me have it alive?" said he.

'Oh, take it as you like," said the farmer.

"I want it alive, because I want to make it speak when I go through the village," said Green.

And the goose was made to speak, so that all Sedgebrook knew that the Greens were going to have goose on Christmas Day.

"And won't I make it speak when I get against the 'Sportsman,'" said Green gleefully. And so the goose told landlord and clients at the public house that Gideon Green had "bought his own goose!"

There was a royal feast in the Greens' cottage that Christmas-tide. "And," said Gideon, with that touch of humor which was native in him, "I invited my old aunt, and when the door of the room was opened, and she saw the goose on the table, she lifted up both hands in wonder, and I could hardly make her believe she hadn't come to the wrong house!"

Now Gideon is trying to pursue a humble, straightforward Christian course. And how many a man might know so glad a change! Happy the change that placed Gideon's goose on the table that was bare a year before; happier still the change which has made Gideon—the idle, godless sot—a humble, sober Christian man.

WHAT A SOLDIER DID FOR HIS COMRADE.

George Clay was a brave and hardy British soldier, who distinguished himself in the last war with China. Though no man could have been more alive to those features of a soldier's life which render it so unfavorable to the maintenance of Christian principles and habits, he had, in the face of great temptation and discouragement, held fast that which is good, and been true to Christ ever since his conversion. To one of his comrades, named Henry Field, as a fellow-townsman and an old playfellow, he was specially drawn.

There was little that was congenial between the two, for Field was godless, prayerless, and wild, while Clay was what we have described him to be. The question often arose in his mind whether he was justified in allowing himself to be known as the friend of a man whom every one knew to be a random scapegrace, without one spark of religious principle, and whose foolish boast it was that he cared for nobody, and that nobody cared for him. As a man is known by the company he keeps, George Clay had many misgivings that his being so much with Field would lower him in the eyes of his fellow-soldiers.

Nor was this a merely selfish consideration. He thought of the religion he professed, and trembled lest any folly or unguardedness of his own should bring reproach upon it. With these motives he had almost made up his mind to have as little to do with Field as possible, and, in fact, to treat him in all respects as a stranger, when his attention was specially drawn one morning, as it had never been before, to the words, "God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. 5 : 8). He felt at once that that passage settled the matter. It was not for him to turn from Field because he was a notorious sinner. Nay, that he now felt to be an additional reason for treating him with every possible kindness, and losing no opportunity of reaching his heart.

There was about Henry Field a good deal of morose arrogance, which made it very difficult for his comrade to broach an unwelcome subject to him; but the redeeming love of Christ had so filled the heart of George Clay that what might otherwise have daunted and repelled him did but strengthen his determination to persevere. He was a conspicuous and impressive example of the truth of the great saying, "Believe in love and you will love and be loved." So many acts of disinterested kindness which could bear no other intepretation had he shown Field, that even his hard, rough nature began at length to respond to the appeals thus constantly made to it. He gradually gained the conviction that George Clay was, in the best sense, his friend, and from the time the conviction took full possession of him he was a ready and attentive listener to all that Clay had to say to him. Daily instruction and exhortation, backed up by a holy life and unfailing personal kindness, by and by gained the victory. Field, as a repenting sinner, fled to Christ as his refuge, and found in Him pardon and peace.

It was not long before the two comrades had special cause for profound gratitude that the change had taken place. While in active pursuit of the enemy, about a month afterward, Field receved a wound which soon proved to be fatal. He could not utter a word, but the soldiers who observed the fatality knew that it would be his wish to see Clay, who was accordingly sent for at once. When the latter arrived on the spot Field had, for the moment, sufficiently recovered to be able to address a few words to his friend. He said: "Thank you, thank you for all you have been to me. This would, indeed, have been a terrible hour but for what I have learned from you. Tell my dear old mother that I died in peace, and that the change she so long prayed for had taken place."

Thus did George Clay, like a good soldier of Jesus Christ, successfully battle with temptation and sin, and thus did Henry Field, in words that will never be forgotten, repay a thousandfold in the hour of nature's extremity the love which had won his soul to Christ.

THE SONG OF THE ANGELS.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, M.A.

"Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, goodwill toward men."—LUKE 2:14.

The Announcement of the Saviour's Birth—What did the Angels Feel?—Fighting a Losing Battle—I. The Supreme Object of the Incarnation—God's Glory—Infinite Greatness Transcended—The Highest Glory of God's Nature—The Grandest Revelation—Man's True Destiny—II. "Peace on Earth"—The Pacific Reign Already Begun—III. "Goodwill Toward Men"—Highest Proof of Divine Love.

SUCH was the outburst of triumphant acclaim with which the hosts of heaven greeted the announcement of the Saviour's birth. The long-expected moment had at last arrived—that point in human history toward which men had looked for many a long, dark, weary age at length was reached, the Desire of all nations had come, and, as the blessed angels looked down upon the plains of Bethlehem, they beheld in the birth of that Infant in the oxen's stall a pledge of the fulfilment of God's grand and mysterious design toward humanity. Already, in their joyful anticipation, they beheld the colossal empire of evil shaken to its very foundation, the supreme and final victory of good already attained, and the reign of the Prince of Peace established on earth.

May we not endeavor to-day to enter into the holy joy of these bright intelligences as they sped down on their mission, and sang this song of triumph?

WHAT WAS IT THE ANGELS FELT?

For surely we may form some conjecture on the subject, although nothing is absolutely revealed. I suppose, in the first place, they were swayed by those emotions which are necessarily excited within us when we witness some grand and splendid undertaking. We can understand what must have been the feelings of the hosts of Israel when they beheld the stripling David going forth toward Goliath of Gath. Some enthusiastic admiration of a similar nature, I suppose, must have been the feeling of those bright hosts of heaven as they gazed upon that Infant in Bethlehem, and contemplated the stupendous purpose of His birth.

And, in the next place, they could judge, I suppose, as we cannot judge, of that strange contrast which must have filled them with wonder. They knew what the imperial glories of the everlasting Son of God had been from all eternity, and they could contrast, as we cannot, His royal state in the presence of the Father with His strange humiliation in the stable of Bethlehem. One moment they saw Him lifted up on high; the next, humiliated and helpless, content to become an Infant of days, a Child but newly born, wrapped in swaddling bands, everything about Him bespeaking poverty, weakness, and humiliation. And, as they contemplated this wondrous contrast between His heavenly greatness and dignity, and saw what His humiliation had been, no wonder that these sons of God burst forth into a song of adoring rapture.

But there was more than even this to inspire their song. They no doubt felt that interest in humanity which is invariably ascribed to them whenever they are mentioned in Scripture. These bright intelligences, of whom we know so little, know a great deal about us, and they take a great interest in us. They hover over us unseen, watching the course of human events, and furthering those great designs of their Sovereign Master, God, by which His own glory is to be revealed and the well-being of humanity secured.

Hitherto they had seen man fallen and helpless—endeavoring, so to speak, to cover a disastrous retreat, but totally prostrated by defeat, and unable to cope with the forces arrayed against him. They had heard the groans of the down-trodden captives, they knew something of that smothered cry of anguish which through long dark ages rang up from a weary world, while still hope deferred made the heart sick, and He for whom men were longing delayed to come. They saw by how many a frail and feeble effort men had endeavored to break the yoke of bondage which still kept them fast. And now the moment of deliverance was drawing nigh. The battle was no longer to be unequal. The Prince of Life has undertaken the conflict, and descends to the arena; and now the great issue is to be decided. A hero has at last been raised up for humanity, and that Champion lay an infant in the stall at Bethlehem, and they worshipped the God who had undertaken the task.

But I suppose it was more than even this. They not only saw at last a Saviour provided for humanity—a Champion to fight man's battle for him—but in their prophetic spirits—we know not how far they are allowed to gaze into the future, but this amount of foreknowledge surely the angels possessed—they already anticipated triumph. They knew that this omnipotent Being whom they worshipped as God had never lost a battle yet and they could trust Him to win this; and so they looked onward to the conflict whatever it might be, with feelings of calm assurance.

The triumph, they were sufficiently enlightened to understand, was not to be won with drawn swords and crushing thunderbolts, but by meekness and humiliation, by sorrow and anguish, by weakness and death; but this much they could believe, and no doubt did believe, that He in whose hands the issues of the battle were placed, and by whom the conflict was to be decided, had never yet been foiled, and never would be. And so, although the campaign had only just opened, and although the first act of the infant Saviour had not yet been performed, they knew the dawn of victory was at hand, and they shouted, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, goodwill toward men."

But, if these were the feelings of the angels,

WHAT OUGHT TO BE MAN'S FEELINGS?

For, after all, these angels were not directly concerned in the momentous issue. It is quite true that they take an interest in all that concerns us, but their interest in such matters is only indirect. We ourselves are the persons directly concerned. Surely it behoves us to endeavor to grasp something like an adequate idea of what was that stupendous undertaking which our Lord Jesus Christ at this time was content to engage in, and what the result has been so far as concerns us personally. And we cannot do better than take our key-note from the angelic song, dwelling upon the various characteristics of our Saviour's enterprise, and His triumphant achievement.

I. The chief thought before us in this song is the supreme

OBJECT OF THE INCARNATION.

The first and foremost object, to which all else is subservient, is described to us in the words, "Glory to God in the highest." Yes, God must come first. Yet does it not seem strange, when first we begin to think of it, that these angels should shout, "Glory to God in the highest," at the very moment when that God was abasing Himself to the lowest depths of humiliation? Surely we might have been disposed to think that they had more cause to shout, "Glory to God in the highest," as they beheld Him taking His seat amid the starry hosts on heaven's central throne.

But no, the thing which called forth the burst of acclamation was the contemplation of the weakness and helplessness of the Infant, and the strange condescension which made the Son of God the Son of man. It was when they looked upon the Infant lying in the manger that they cried out, "Glory to God in the highest!" Surely there is something meant by this; and when we come to turn it over in our minds we see that God is glorified by that Infant—in other words, by the incarnation of His own blessed Son—in a way in which He had never been glorified before, and, so far as we know, could not otherwise have been glorified before. The eternal glory of God would be exhibited, as nothing could exhibit it, by the incarnation of His own Son.

For, observe, however much we may be dazzled by the splendor of some of the Divine attributes, for us there is something higher and grander in God than His omnipotence. His infinite power and majesty had been revealed to the angels from all eternity, or at any rate, from the moment of their own existence, and to these—His majesty and power—no doubt had been offered their tributes of homage and praise. But that which makes them now shout "Glory to God in the highest," is not the exhibition of His power, or splendor, or royal majesty. There is something in God even and it was for this that the chorus of angels sang His praise. It was this that was exhibited in yonder cradle in the stable of Bethlehem. Surely, it is in the moral character of God pre-eminently that His true glory lies; and as these angels gazed upon that Infant lying there in weakness and helplessness, found in fashion like a man, they understood that by that mystery of the Incarnation the moral character of God was to be revealed to those who had lost sight of it, and the love of the Father's heart was to be made known to those who had ceased to believe in it.

More than this, they foresaw that the eternal equity of God was to be exhibited in some mysterious way to all the intelligences of the wide universe, while at the same time His mercy flowed forth in a tide of healing. There was to be provided, through the person of the Incarnate Son of God, as in a wondrous object-lesson, a demonstration of God's eternal and unchanging hatred of sin.

In the history of that Infant, God was about to offer the most stupendous proof of His supreme and unalterable detestation of sin, and of His determination to visit it with a severe and overwhelming penalty. The sin of a world, which had alienated it from God, and cursed and blighted it all through its history, was to come under the judgment of God in the person of Him who was now voluntarily coming forward to take it upon Himself, and who was in a position to do so, first, because He was One with the eternal Ruler and Lawgiver in His own nature, and next because, by the assumption of humanity, He was one with us.

To principalities and powers in the other world, as well as to men on earth, was to be read a lesson from this that should silence forever all slanderous questionings of the righteousness and wisdom of the Divine Government, and vindicate the sanctity and authority of the law by the very act that opened the door of mercy to the sinner.

But that was not all. The glory of God's justice was to be revealed, but His glory would have been but incompletely revealed had this been the only element manifested. The mere exhibition of justice so far shows forth God's moral glory as to justify such an exultant ebullition as burst forth from the angels' lips, but there was more in their song of triumph than this. For after all, is to be found in the fact stated by the Galilean peasant, who only learned it from his Master's life and his Master's death—"God is love."

THE HIGHEST GLORY OF GOD'S NATURE

Here is the brightest ray of all the glories which have their centre in God. Men have speculated about God, and the result of the speculations of some has been a doubt as to whether such a Being existed, while by some He has been clothed in strangely repulsive characters. In our own times the car of Juggernaut has been drawn over the helpless bodies of the crushed and lacerated victims. God has been described even among nations not so barbaric as being devoid of sympathy with man, and always envious of human happiness and well-being.

In one way or other God has never left Himself without witness; but no ancient prophet, however bold, no leader or lawgiver, however wise and devoted, no Grecian philosopher, however broad the grasp of his intellect, ever dared to utter that splendid aphorism, "God is love," until it was revealed from the cradle at Bethlehem and from the cross of Calvary. The angels knew it. They had basked under the smile of His favor; they had heard the voice of His love; they had seen what was going on behind the scenes; they understood the purposes of mercy toward the race of man; and when they saw their actual fulfilment drawing nigh, and in the fulness of time of all about to be made, when they perceived that the Father's heart was to be bared by the incarnation of His Son, no wonder, then, that they sang, "Glory to God in the highest."

THE GRANDEST REVELATION

To be concluded next week.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The Brewer's Carriage—Comment on the Traffic—Return to the Cup—A Helping Hand—Job's Prayer—The Builder's Son—The Tact of Love.

LEANING up against the wall, Hal becomes absorbed in a carriage that is passing by; a handsome carriage it is, its blue surface picked out in silver attracts his attention. The liveried coachman and footman sit bolt upright on the high box. Inside lolls a gentleman, muffled up to his ears in a great-coat of thick cloth, beside a pretty young lady, whose soft, fair hair lies crimped over her white brow, and covered by a little mushroom velvet hat. Very picturesque she is, and she knows it quite well. Her rich sealskin jacket and fur rug contrast very well with her dainty features and bright complexion.

This is the brewer's carriage. He owns the little public-house, and many scores of others like it. Their revenues have brought him his carriage, and have given him his mansion, his park-like grounds, and his young wife. He—or rather his "firm," he would wish you to say—are making beer by the ocean every year. It is carted away in casks and barrels, and perpetually the ceaseless stream pours from his warehouses into the ever-receptive public-house.

He meets bundles of rags as he drives magnificently through the town, who stagger, totter, reel; for they are human beings, looking forward to an endless eternity of miserable woe. God created them in His image; the brewer, the distiller, and the public-house keeper having, by the aid of the great Adversary of men, turned them into the distortions we now behold. But he is accustomed to these sights, and congratulates himself that his business is such a profitable one, "much better than most," as he always says.

Now, looking patronisingly across the road through his gold eye-glass at Hal, as he stands outside the "Ball and Anchor," he says to his wife, "Working man's friend! a very good name for those places. Poor fellow! you see he has got his beer there after a hard day's work. Look at him."

"Is that a regular public-house?" asks the young wife. "Don't the men ever get tipsy in them?"

"Tipsy! what trash. Beer is the best drink a man can have, if he does not take too much," is his immediate reply; and then, by mutual consent, the subject is changed for a more agreeable one.

Hal, after staring hard for a minute or two at the dashing equipage, doubles up that iron fist of his, and three times distinctly he repeats, "Curse him! curse him! curse him!"

By this time Curly has appeared on the scene, and hearing the imprecation, asks, "Whatever is the matter with you! Talking to the daisies? Eh!"

"Daisies, man! it was that there brewer going by. Drove me pretty near wild to see him. Look at his toggery, and this, and that—and all straight off the backs and out of the mouths of hundreds of our poor chaps!" So says Hal.

Poor fellow! he does not know that he is already himself somewhat under the influence of the liquor he has been drinking. The beer was not as simple as it looked. The landlord, finding so good a fish in his net, had gratuitously drugged the draught with strong drops of gin. In this, as in everything the landlord did, there was a purpose. Hal had more money in his pocket than many of the customers. Compared to the "old hands" he was positively rich, for he had not been often the worse for drink. The landlord craved his very soul; he thirsted to catch him in his net.

You say, "there are not many publicans like him." Find me ten that are *un*like him, and you have created an anomaly. Could men and women spend their lives as an innkeeper and his wife must, without some strong propelling force, without some ulterior object in view? They want to get what they can out of these men, and therefore they must make them wicked; for good men will not spend their time and money in the bar-room.

In muttered, hissing tones, Hal says, "I am out of sorts," and turns in again to the little den. Curly is wiser, and goes home.

But while Hal was in the wily "spider's" parlor, what was his wife doing? A polished grate she had burnished until it could shine no more. An arm-chair was at the fire, shoes placed ready beside it, for those tired, wet feet. The kettle singing on the hob made all look bright, but she was uneasy. Turning to the clock over and over again, she wondered what had become of "her man," as she appropriately called him.

"It can't be them public-houses again!" she said; and then turned away from the heart-sickening thought, to quiet the dark-haired little boy, with deep, lustrous eyes, who stood adorned in his white pinafore beside her.

"Come on mother's lap, darling," she said; and then she nestled him fondly to her bosom, while she sang—

"Father! come home to your bonny boy;
Tell him of sunshine,
Tell him of joy;"

and all the time, with one foot outstretched, she rocked the cradle in which the sleeping baby had been housed for the rest of the night; for father generally carried the cradle with baby in it through the doorway into the next room, and placed it on two chairs beside the bed. But to-night, the tea was spoiled, the bacon got cold, the candle burned to the socket, and "father" did not come. Then she knew what it meant, for a terrified instinct told her, and, like a hunted hare, she crouched, and hid, and waited for the footstep she ought to have loved.

If we trace Henry King's history from his return to the parlor, we shall not find it an enviable one. Taproom scenes, though they ought to be looked into more than they are, certainly are not pleasant to describe, and if they were described, perhaps the description would not be read. He came out after some time, staggering. He walked along somehow, until he reached the corner of the road. There he sat down for a time, then got up again and walked into the street.

Then he turned into the "Wise Acre" public-house. Those foul resorts met him at every few yards of every street now. How should he ever get home? Presently, as he tottered across the market square, a hand was laid on his shoulder. Hal turned round with a growl, thinking it was the "police;" but, no! it was only Job Wilks, who worked at the iron foundry close by.

"Come along, old chap," Wilks said; "never mind me. I am only Job. There, that's my arm, I'll steady you home a bit." And so he did. We shall hear more about Job; but at present we only know that in perfect silence he led the disabled foreman to his home, and, opening the door, said to the poor wfe, "Take it easy, missus. Don't let on to him, not just now. I'll call to-morrow. Put him to bed. They've reg'lar done him up there at the 'Ball and Anchor.'"

"Oh!"—it was only a groan—a sigh—of which millions are echoed every night in the British Islands. But what does it matter to us?

It mattered to Job. For he went straight home—straight to the sympathizing heart that shared with him every sorrow, and he said to her, "O wife! do you know the foreman up at the big works? He has gone and got hisself drunk to-night. Whatever will his poor gal do? Let's have our prayer a bit earlier to-night, for my heart aches for 'em, it do. He's been going on so nice and steady lately."

Down they knelt by the cosy fire, and in earnest broken words Job prayed:—"O God! our Father, we thank Thee for this day's good mercies, and we ask Thee to fill us more and more with the Spirit of our Heavenly Master. Make us like Jesus! O Lord! do make us like Him! He never did no wrong. He was so good; and we are so bad." Here poor Job quite broke down. . . . but presently he continued, "Do make me holy, and Anne too.

"And then, O Lord! there's poor old Hal. He's been up at the public again. Do make him a 'stainer. He ain't worth nothing 'thout it; and we do want him to be good. We want him to be a follower of Jesus, and we want Thee to bless his poor missus, too; for it do look bad for 'em to-night." He sobbed on his earnest prayer till his wife interrupted him by saying, "Now let's give thanks, Job; for I know it'll be all right. He's heard us; and it says, 'We know that He heareth us;' and if we know that He heareth us, we know that we have the petitions we desired of Him. We'll sing a bit of praise. Shall we?"

"Do!" said Job, wiping his eyes, as he rose from his knees. "You're a rale 'un," which meant the highest praise that can pass from husband to wife. It meant, "You are a treasure."

So, with quavering voice, Job's wife began to sing—

"I love thee, my Jesus,
I know Thou art mine;"

and with like encouraging words she proceeded until Job's voice had fully formed the needed bass, and the simple doxology was ended.

The next morning Hal was late at his work, and so were some others. They were cross, moreover, and totally disinclined for the usual oath and overbearing manner in which the builder was too fond of introducing himself among them. We need not enter into details, but the greeting was not pleasant. It was scarcely like the salutation of Boaz when he entered the harvest-field, "The Lord bless thee!" answered by the reapers' happy echo, "The Lord be with thee!" Work went on. A scene took place about Dan's employment, which ended in his services being secured by "the master," in spite of all the threats of yesterday, simply because "good men are scarce," and Dan was too valuable in his capacity as mason to be dispensed with just yet.

But as the men came home from work that night Hal and Curly—whose friendship seemed as close if not as well founded as that of David and Jonathan—were walking on in front of the rest of the gang, when a voice called "Henry King!" and close beside the men rode the builder's son. Throwing he reins over his horse's neck he alighted beside them. "You have given me a long chase," he said; "I wanted to catch you up. How are you, King? and how's William?" looking hard at Curly as he spoke.

"All right, I thank ye, sir," replied the individual in question.

Albert Eldridge, the builder's son, was neither unlike his father in feature nor in ability, but in moral character and in Scriptural principle he was his opposite. The responsibilities which the older man so lightly threw from him, were taken up by the younger on his very heart; and from the very fact of their utter rejection in the one quarter, they became a double burden in the other. So much was this the case, that Albert, who had learned his way by the shortest road to the Great Mercy Seat, found his only relief in casting his responsibilities upon his God! There he laid the burden of each day; and, thus strengthened and refreshed, he was able to go forth to his varied duties, and, as he went, to lighten the burdens of others.

He was only a young man, and he had not long learned this secret, but he was an apt scholar, and to-day a new page of life's book had opened up before him. As he walked beside those men, leading his horse, he had set himself to master the task.

While his father was haranguing this group in his rough way the evening before, Albert felt that mischief was being done. He had known it often before, but had striven to deafen his ears. This morning, however, he had been told by a clerk in the office, that "King and his mates was drunk last night." Something must be done; and he had ridden on to the ground with a determination that this should not happen again to-night, if he could help it.

"Are we going to have much of this fog, do you think, King?"

"Don't know, sir. Never can't tell much about the weather in these 'ere parts. I was brought up near Crawley way; and we didn't have them fogs and rains and that kind o' thing down there."

"They say it's going to be a bad winter," chimed in Curly.

"So they say," replied Albert. "And if they're right, what then? or wrong either? What's your advice, Mr. King?"

"'Vice?" repeated Hal. "I'm sure, I donno. I ain't got much of that 'ere article to throw away. I wants it mostly for myself, I think;" and he chuckled, emptying his pipe, and looking sideways with a knowing but rather sheepish smile at Curly.

"Do you?" said Mr. Albert. "Then you and I are in the same box. For so do I."

"Ha! that there place ain't good for nobody and a bad winter coming," said Hal, as they passed at this moment the swinging signboard that had done all the mischief the night before, and which brought with its view anything but pleasant recollections.

"You are right," said Albert decidedly, but with that hopeful smile on his face that told of a heart at peace with God and full of love to man; that told, too, of an expectation of victory because of that steady inner consciousness, through faith (notwithstanding his inexperience), that the Almighty Friend was on his side, because he was striving for the right. Such a smile does wonders, and it was going to serve Albert in good stead while carrying out, by God's grace, his self-chosen work, or rather, let us say, the work to which God had called him.

"Couldn't we all agree to give up going in to them altogether!" he continued brightly, as if he saw a new prospect before them.

That little "we" did wonders! It associated him with Hal, placing the trio on the same level. A reproof Hal would not have brooked. He was not in a humor for "a talking to," as he would have said, and especially from the son of his master. Anything approaching to this would have brought a parting touching of his hat, and a quickened footstep, and Albert would have lost his man. But by the tact of love and interest, the opprobrious was avoided, and for the moment, at any rate, Hal was won.

After a moment's pause, Hal replied, "But, what's a feller to do? He don't want to go in 'em"—and then, recollecting to whom he was talking, he "shut up," as he would have expressed it, "tight enough," replaced his pipe in his mouth, stuffed his hands into his pockets, and looked at the weather!"

PREACHING THE KINGDOM.

S. S. Lesson for March 27th, Luke 9: 1-6. Golden Text, Luke 9: 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

EVERY Christian ought to be a missionary. "Let him that heareth say, Come" (Rev. 22: 17). Still the call to the ministry, either as missionaries, evangelists, or pastors, is a special one. It was God Himself who called Jeremiah and ordained him "a prophet unto the nations," and who said unto him, "Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth" (Jer. 1: 6-9). Amos said to Amaziah, the time-serving priest of Bethel, "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son: but I was an herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go prophesy unto my people, Israel" (Am. 7: 14, 15). When God has called a man to the ministry, and he has solemnly answered to the call, neither outward discouragements nor his own sense of unfitness need have power to make him turn back.

The Lord Jesus chose His twelve disciples for two purposes, that they should "be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach" Mark 3: 14): "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder." The Roman Catholic Church has put asunder those two parts of the apostolic vocations, she looks upon a life of prayer and seclusion as one special vocation, and a life of activity in service as another, while God has made the one a necessity for the other. The ideal of a monastery is beautiful, it is that of living sacrifice; but because there is no natural outlet for the spiritual forces which should there be gathered in seclusion, the very self which is supposed to be crucified, reigns in the strongest measure, and even with those who live such a life from the purest motives, personal advancement in holiness is the one idea, and self, not Christ, is the centre. On the other hand, the ideal of a true evangelist is lovely, one who is consumed by zeal for the cause of God and for the salvation of souls, whose earnestness causes him to work without interruption. But after a time, for the want of a more close life with God, either his work suffers and becomes shallow, or the Lord is obliged to take away his physical strength lest in his activity his own soul should suffer. A true minister, a true Christian worker, needs much stillness, that his words may be with power; and God's remembrances need active work that the spiritual power which is engendered by close communion with God should be put to its true use, that God and His kingdom, not themselves and their state may become their life's centre.

Jesus "called His twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases." There are some who stand strongly upon apostolic succession; let us come to facts. Do these men evidence a power over all devils, and do they cure diseases? if not, what proof have they that apostolic succession is theirs? "The tree is known by its fruit." Paul said, "Truly, the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (2 Cor. 12: 12). We look for this patience, for signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds, and when we see them not can we recognize the signs of an apostle, for the Bible speaks of none other? Notice here, the Lord gave both power and authority to His apostles, they had both the right and the might to cast out devils, would that this power were manifest among us now! God has not withdrawn it, "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. 11: 29); the Church of Christ possesses still in her living Head, all the power which He has bestowed upon her, but her members are paralyzed and dead. Oh, for the living breath of the Holy Ghost to circulate the life-blood in Christ's body, that she may again become a power for Him in the world!

Jesus sent His disciples then "to preach the kingdom of God and to heal the sick;" He has sent His disciples now to do the same, and His command has never been recalled, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." The substance of this command was spoken, not to the twelve apostles alone, but also to the little church of a hundred and twenty souls which waited for the Holy Ghost (Comp. Luke 24: 33, 46-48 with Mark 16: 15-18; Acts 1: 13-15). And it is most striking how, in the Gospel of St. Mark, and after the resurrection, the Lord continues, "And these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

The casting out of devils and the healing of the sick were made parts of one ministry by our blessed Lord, and it is only the unbelief of His Church which has caused them to be separated. He who bore our sins, took also our infirmities and bore our sicknesses (Mat. 8: 17), and wherever a man of God has the faith to bring the sick in contact with their Lord, and wherever the sick turn from all other help to His immediate healing, there the Lord proves that He is unchanged, and that He has not recalled either the power or the authority to cast out devils and to cure diseases. We hear of blessed healing work by simple faith in Christ, in Sweden, France, Germany, and Switzerland; in China, Bulgaria, and Australia as well as in England and America. The preaching of the kingdom and the power of the kingdom ought to go together, and it is the experience of many, if not all of those who have been healed by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, that with the conscious contact with God which brought about the physical healing, an intense sense of nearness to Him and of belonging to Him has followed, leading the healed one to a life of consecration and devotion which the sickness had never produced.

The Lord Jesus laid before His apostles a life of absolute dependence upon Him for all their needs. He would have them a standing proof in their own lives of the real intervention of God in all the details of life. "Take nothing for your journey," He said, neither staves nor scrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have two coats apiece." In the Gospel of St. Matthew He adds (10: 10) "for the workman is worthy of his meat." "But," some may say, "suppose difficulty should arise, that they should need to travel over a road so rough that the staves were a necessity; suppose they should not be well received in some place, and no one should give them bread, suppose some demand for money should be made upon them, and they had none, suppose their one coat should be torn?" Faith never supposes, but counts on God. They were to go forth counting on the resources of Him who brought 603,500 people (not counting the Levites) out of the land of Egypt, and "there was not one feeble [sick] person among their tribes" (Comp. Num. 2: 32, 33 with Ps. 105: 37). They were counting on the God who had fed His people with bread from Heaven, and who fed Elijah by the ravens. They went forth at the command of Him who, when the tribute money was demanded, sent Peter to cast a hook into the sea and to take the first fish that should come up, and He said unto him, "When thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money, that take, and give unto them for thee and me" (Matt. 17: 27); they were reckoning on the same God who reminded the children of Israel at the end of their journey, "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years."

Later He said unto them, "When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye anything? And they said, Nothing" (Luke 22: 35), and then it was that He reversed the command for the same disciples; they had already learned a lesson of absolute confidence in Him for every need, and if they had now a purse, scrip, or sword, they must take it. But we may conclude if they did not possess these things, they were not to forget that God was pledged to supply the needs of all who were sent of Him to do His service. God would not have his servants cumbered with care, anxiety, or fear about those things which are needful for the body, our Father which is in Heaven knoweth that we have need of all these things.

And He would have His apostles quiet, "Whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart." They were not to seek their own convenience and think, "If I go to such and such a house, I shall have more comfort and convenience than I have here," they were to have no will of their own, no choice, and to accept all the circumstances which surrounded them as coming from, and arranged by God. That house was to be their parish, their care for the time being, they must salute the house where they stayed (Matt. 10: 12), and a salutation in the name of Jesus must be in the power of that holy name, and must bring the whole house under His influence.

But however great and real may be the power of men who are sent of God, He does not compel an involuntary submission to Him, the will of man must be exercised to receive or to reject Him. Thus the Lord says, "And whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet, for a testimony against them." The authority to do this can only exist with those who can prove by patience, signs, wonders, and mighty deeds that they are sent of God, those who cannnot call upon God to bear witness by incontrovertible proofs that they are sent of Him, can have no right to shake off the dust of their feet against those who reject them. God sends the living faith, the power, the holiness of the first apostles upon our evangelists, ministers, and missionaries, and men must be aroused to take their part unmistakably for God or against Him. "And they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the gospel and healing everywhere." So let it be, O Lord, among us "Grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak thy Word, by stretching forth thy hand to heal, and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus" (Acts 4: 30).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Czar of Russia was Assassinated on Sunday, March 13th. While returning from a parade about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, in company with his brother, the Grand Duke Michael, a bomb was thrown under his carriage, but its explosion did no further damage than to shatter the back of the vehicle. The Emperor and the Grand Duke immediately alighted, when another bomb was thrown, which exploded at the Emperor's feet, mutilating his legs below the knees in a terrible manner and inflicting other serious injuries. The wounded monarch was conveyed to the Winter Palace, where, in the course of an hour and a half, he expired, surrounded by the members of the Imperial family.

Intense excitement prevailed in St. Petersburg, and a general rising of Nihilists was expected. Prompt measures were taken to repress an insurrection, and vigilant watch was kept for the appearance of fires. The Nihilists, however, were apparently satisfied with the success that had attended this, which is the sixth attempt on the life of the Czar, and no outbreak occurred. The men who threw the bombs were arrested, and did not attempt to deny their act. The bombs used were made of thick glass and filled with nitro-glycerine; they are known as Orsini bombs, and were similar to that used by Orsini when he attempted to assassinate Napoleon III. in 1858.

This diabolical crime will have an important effect in Europe. The government of Russia being despotic, the character of the sovereign has a more potent influence there than in other countries, and it is expected that both the foreign and domestic policy of the empire will undergo a transformation in the hands of the new Czar.

The Arrests in Ireland Under the Coercion Act are not so numerous as was anticipated, and none of the prominent leaders of the Land League have as yet been committed to prison. Those who have been seized have also been treated with kindness and consideration; they are placed on the same terms as imprisoned debtors, and are allowed to communicate with their friends and to purchase any luxuries they may desire. Michael P. Boyton, one of the men arrested, claims that he is a naturalized citizen of the United States, and has written to Mr. Lowell, the American minister, claiming the protection of the United States Government. Mr. Lowell is inquiring into the case, and it is probable that Boyton will be released on condition that he leaves the country and does not return to it without the permission of the British Government.

A Clergyman Boycotted.—Canon Fleming, an eminent minister of the Church of England, who was recently fired at, has been "boycotted" on account of sectarian animosity. He has endured the infliction for a long time, and on Friday last a relief party, consisting of seventeen laborers engaged by the Emergency Committee, set out from Broadstone to his assistance. The laborers are armed with rifles and revolvers, which they are allowed to carry by a special Government license. Canon Fleming was one of the original missionaries of the Irish Church Mission Society, and his reports on the progress of Protestantism among the Catholics of that part of Connaught have often been attacked in the Dublin and London press by Archbishop McHale and others. The correspondent of the New York World telegraphs that since the League agitation set in he has written somewhat violent appeals to the Government and to the Orangemen of the north, calling upon the latter to "maintain Protestant principles."

An Armistice has been Arranged Between Great Britain and the Boers which may lead to the proclamation of peace. Many English journals protest against treating with a victorious enemy, and believe that the loss of prestige will seriously injure British supremacy in Africa. The Liberal journals, on the other hand, contend that the annexation of the Transvaal was wrong, and that England is morally bound to concede the demands of the Boers. At the interview between the British and Boer commanders when the terms of the armistice were settled, M. Joubert said that the Boers are ready at any time to return to their homes provided their leaders are granted a full amnesty, and that the complete independence of the Transvaal for all time is guaranteed by the British Government.

The British proposals are said to be that the country shall be governed under a constitution similar to the confederation under which Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick were merged into the Dominion. Each state to elect its own legislature and to return a certain number of members to a Federal Parliament, which shall have supreme power, subject to the Colonial Office. The Governor of the colony to be appointed by the Imperial Government, the Federal House to have control of the defences of the colony and of the enactment and administration of the criminal law. It is feared that the Boers, intoxicated by their late victory, will reject the British terms, and insisting on their own, cause a renewal of the conflict.

A Ministerial Crisis has Arisen in Portugal out of the British war with the Boers. The Portuguese Government negotiated a treaty with Great Britain, granting that country jurisdictional and tariff rights in the colonies of Portugal on the east coast of Africa, besides the right of passage for troops and railway material free of duties for ten years. This concession would enable the British to penetrate to the heart of the Transvaal by a much shorter distance than they now have to traverse, and facilitate the operations in the present war. The ministry have rendered themselves unpopular by the imposition of a heavy income tax, and the people who sympathize with the Boers are exasperated by the treaty with England. When the subject was under consideration, on Friday, March 11th, there was a formidable manifestation in the streets of Lisbon and in the lobbies. In the courts of the Chamber of Deputies troops had to charge the mob, which uttered republican cries and protested against the treaty and the Cabinet. The ministers' carriages were hooted. Similar manifestations and monster meetings have been held in Oporto, Faro, Coimbra, and other towns, to protest against the income tax and British influence.

The Rupture Between Spain and the Pope of Rome continues to increase. The Papal minister at the Spanish court protested in the name of his master against the appointment of anti-Catholic and republican professors to schools and universities, and the proposed extension of tolerance to Protestants. The Cabinet has informed the Nuncio that while desiring the friendship of the Pope it is determined to maintain its sovereign right to "decree reforms." This is a very significant piece of intelligence, for Spain has long been the abject slave of the Papacy, and has in consequence sunk in the scale of nations.

In Spite of the Peace Negotiations in Progress at Constantinople, both Turkey and Greece are actively preparing for war. The Porte is preparing four squadrons of war vessels, one of which, in the event of war, will blockade the Greek ports, and the others will protect the Turkish ports. A cartridge manufactory has been opened, provided with American machinery capable of turning out 50,000 cartridges daily. A dispatch from Bucharest to the London Times says: "The Roumanians are evidently convinced that war is imminent, and quiet military preparations are the order of the day. The Turkish delegates and the Foreign ambassadors have held their second meeting on the Greek question. They had under consideration the frontier line proposed by the Berlin Conference, the line claimed by Greece and the Ottoman proposals of October last."

An International Monetary Conference is to be held in Paris next month. Germany, Spain, Great Britain, and other European nations have accepted the invitation. Two propositions among others are to be submitted to the convention; one of them is that in all nations there shall be unlimited coinage at the rate of fifteen and a half of silver to one of gold; the other, that silver coin shall be made legal tender. Francs would not be legal tender in the United States, nor our dollars legal tender in France, but American dollars might be taken to the French mint and coined into francs, or francs sent to the American mint and coined into dollars. So with the coins of all other agreeing nations. Ex-Secretary Evarts and ex-Senator Thurman and Howe have been appointed by the President to represent the United States. The principal difficulty to be surmounted is that the value of silver fluctuates, and the relation of fifteen and a half to one of gold is liable to be changed at any moment, and the coins would not then be of their face value.

An Outbreak of the Plague in Mesopotamia is reported. There have been eighteen deaths at Nefer and thirty at Cuaaro. The most energetic measures have been taken to prevent the spread of the disease. It is also officially announced in Rome, Italy, that a disease supposed to be the plague has appeared in the province of Bagdad, and in consequence vessels from Turkish and Egyptian ports would be examined before being allowed to disembark passengers or cargo in Italian ports. Thirty-five persons have died of the plague in Kerbela, Nedjeff, and Djagra, in the province of Bagdad.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Infidel Member of the British Parliament, has made himself liable, according to the decision of a justice of the Queen's Bench, to a fine of $250,000. Under an existing statute, any person sitting and voting in the House of Commons without taking the oath is liable to a penalty of $2500 for each offence. It will be remembered that Mr. Bradlaugh was permitted to sit without taking the oath, under a law which allowed the substitution of an affirmation for the oath. An information against Mr. Bradlaugh was laid by a gentleman named Clarke, and the decision of the court was announced last week. The judge said that the act under which Mr. Bradlaugh took his seat applies only to courts of justice, and not to the House of Commons. Mr. Bradlaugh having sat fully a hundred times is therefore liable to pay a fine of $250,000. He has appealed to a higher court, and in the mean time has been advised to absent himself from the House.

Mr. William Noble, the eminent Temperance advocate, whose work at the Hoxton Hall in London, in the blue ribbon movement, has been so specially blessed, has been suffering from inflammation of the lungs, and brain fever, resulting from overwork, which has greatly prostrated him. He was thought to be dying, but felt great joy in the prospect of being with Christ. He is ordered to take a voyage to Cape Town, Africa, for his Health.

A Beautiful Girl, Known in Paris as "the Comet," on account of her wealth of long golden hair, died two weeks ago in a hospital, absolutely destitute. She was notorious in Parisian society when Napoleon III. was emperor, for her splendor and lavish extravagance. At that time she owned one of the finest mansions in the fashionable quarter, had twelve horses in her stable, and a heap of valuable diamonds in her dressing-case. Some years ago one of the French dukes made her an offer of marriage, which she declined. Since that time all her property has been squandered in dissipation, and when she was stricken with the disease which has terminated fatally, she had neither friend nor a coin to pay a physician. Those who are attracted by the glitter of a vicious life should study the end of one of its queens.

The tendency of the times toward Republicanism, and the growing development of the power of the people, even in European lands, have robbed the matrimonial alliances of royal houses of the absorbing interest they once possessed. Two centuries ago the whole policy and destiny of a nation might be changed by the marriage of a king or his heir; the grave question of peace or war was then involved in the choice of a bride; but in our day the personal influence of the monarch has become a matter of much smaller account, and the people have claimed, and in many cases have acquired, a controlling influence in national affairs.

There is still, however, a high degree of social interest evoked by a royal marriage, for the influence of royalty on the moral life of a nation is potent and it is always important that that influence should be exerted on the side of virtue and purity. The king who, like the despicable creature George IV. of England, makes vice fashionable in his realm, incurs a responsibility absolutely appalling, which, while it relieves none of his imitators of their individual guilt, adds a thousandfold to his own. It is, therefore, not a matter of indifference to a nation, even when its liberties are hedged about by constitutional defences, what is the personal character of its king. A corrupt king has usually a corrupt court, and a corrupt court has in it seeds after its kind, which it scatters broadcast over the nation. We cannot wonder, therefore, that German patriots feel an interest in the character of the young man who is heir to the throne of the Fatherland, and of the young lady who has become his bride.

It is now twenty-three years since the eldest was united in marriage with the present Crown Prince of Prussia. The occasion was one of general festivity. Rejoicing, genuine and spontaneous was caused throughout Great Britain by the auspicious event, and the enthusiastic loyalty of the English people to their Queen was manifested in every conceivable form. Not much was known of the young princess, then in her eighteenth year, whose marriage constituted the first separation in the royal circle; but it was known that all that careful and judicious training could do for the young princess and her brothers and sisters, had been done under the watchful eye of their father, and the tender, loving care of their devoted mother. It was with the hearty good wishes of the British people that the Princess Royal departed from British shores to her new home in Germany.

THE BRIDEGROOM.

On January 27th, 1859, was born to the young pair Prince Frederic William Victor Albert, the first grandson of the Queen of England and of the King of Prussia. In accordance with the traditional custom of the German court the young prince has received an eminently thorough and practical education. Not only has he passed with credit through the University of Bonn, where he acquired a knowledge of the higher branches of knowledge but he has been taught a mechanical trade in which he has displayed considerable skill. His conduct at the university was marked by the absence of that hauteur which often characterizes young men of distinguished parentage, and he won the esteem of his fellow-students by his genial good nature and of his professors by his application to study. When he left the university at the end of his curriculum, the Academic Rector, in the course of a farewell address, said of the royal student that he had shown all those good qualities by which his ancestors had become great. The students signified their appreciation of his character by proposing his health with the usual honors, to which the prince replied: "Gentlemen, I thank you first of all for the salamander you have so heartily drunk to the health of my grandfather, and then of me, and I cannot but express the deep pain I feel at the thought of having to leave your joyful ranks."

THE BRIDE.

When the young man's father, the present Crown Prince, was studying at the same university there was among his fellow-students a young man who has since died, who was heir to the Dukedom of Schleswig-Holstein, and an intimacy was formed between the young men which has now resulted in the union of their children. The duke's daughter, Princess Augusta Victoria, was well known in Berlin, and her union with the young heir to the throne has been greeted with popular approval. She was born on October 22d, 1858.
